COMMITTEE SERVICE.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I ask that an order be entered relieving the Senator from New York [Mr. WADSWORTH] from membership upon the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry and the Senator from Kansas [Mr. CURTIS] from the chairmanship of the Committee on Indian Affairs. I further ask that it may be ordered that the Senator from New York [Mr. WADSWORTH] be made a member of the Committee on Foreign Relations and that the Senator from Kansas [Mr. CURTIS] be made chairman of the Committee on Rules.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The order was reduced to writing, as follows:

Ordered, That the Senator from New York [Mr. WADSWORTH] be excused from further service as a member of the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry and assigned to service on the Committee on Foreign Relations, and that the Senator from Kansas [Mr. CURTIS] be excused from further service as chairman of the Committee on Indian Affairs and assigned to the chairmanship of the Committee on Rules.

POSTAL SAVINGS BANKS.

Mr. SHEPPARD. Mr. President, I ask permission to have inserted in the RECORD two brief letters to the chairman of the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads from the Secretary of the Treasury and the Postmaster General with reference to the postal savings bank bill (S. 2033), together with my reply. I ask this because the letters were included in the hearing on this measure before a subcommittee of the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads and the hearing published before I had opportunity to reply.

There being no objection, the letters were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

STATEMENTS OF POSTMASTER GENERAL AND SECRETARY OF THE TREASURY ON THE BILL S. 2033, INCREASING THE UTILITY OF THE POSTAL SAVINGS BANKS, AND REPLY OF SENATOR SHEPPARD.

OFFICE OF THE POSTMASTER GENERAL,
Washington, D. C., August 2, 1921.

Hon. CHARLES E. TOWNSEND,
Chairman Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SENATOR TOWNSEND: You have been good enough to ask me for my opinion of the bill introduced by Senator SHEPPARD, S. 2033, "A bill to increase the utility of the postal savings bank, and to encourage savings among the people, to secure the largest returns for such savings consistent with adequate security."

The Post Office Department, as you know, hopes to develop postal savings, and, by bringing up to date some of the most important points of the service, to encourage its usefulness, and most particularly to go further than we have ever gone in the past in the direction of encouraging thrift and economy. To that end we welcome a free and frank discussion of the problem from every angle.

I am, however, convinced after considering Senator SHEPPARD'S bill that his plan would not so much advance the interest of postal savings as it would completely revolutionize the banking system of this country. We have already encountered the opposition of certain savings banks to any change in postal savings, and I can only wonder what the opposition would be from the banking institutions of this country to the very radical changes proposed by Senator SHEPPARD, changes that would certainly affect all banks even more than any changes that we have in mind for postal savings might affect the mutual savings banks.

I feel that Senator SHEPPARD'S bill is more a matter for the Secretary of the Treasury to express his views on than it is for me, because while the bill ostensibly takes advantage of the existing Postal Savings System, the changes are so radical as to constitute a fundamental change of policy on the part of this Government toward the whole question of banking.

I shall be very glad to have a copy of the hearings on this bill.

With kindest personal regards, I am,

Sincerely, yours,

WILL H. HAYS.

THE SECRETARY OF THE TREASURY,
Washington, August 16, 1921.

Hon. CHAS. E. TOWNSEND,
Chairman Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads,
United States Senate.

MY DEAR SENATOR: I received your letter of August 6, 1921, inclosing a copy of S. 2033, and a copy of a letter dated August 2, 1921, received by you from the Postmaster General. You request my opinion regarding the merits of this bill.

While the Treasury has consistently favored the liberalization of the postal savings laws so as to permit of a greater coordination between the Postal Savings System and the sale of Treasury savings securities, the Treasury is unequivocally opposed to any such legislation as that proposed by this bill. The removal of all limitation upon the amount of deposits and the provisions for the loaning of the funds deposited in the postal savings banks would involve the Government extensively in the business of commercial banking. The banking needs of the country are already adequately met by the Federal reserve system and the numerous national banks and State banks and banking institutions. There is no call for an extensive Government banking institution of the character which this bill seeks to establish.

The provision of section 11 of the bill for the issue of certificates of deposit which may pass from hand to hand in the manner of certified or other bank checks, and which shall be receivable by the United States in payment of obligations due the United States, not specifically made payable in gold, would result in the issue of an enormous amount of demand obligations which would inevitably pass from hand to hand in lieu of currency, with consequent inflation and unsettlement in business and price conditions. The issue of certificates of deposit in this form would make it impossible to protect the depositor in the case of the loss of the certificates and would destroy one of the most salutary features of the present Postal Savings System, namely, the absolute safety of the deposit. The issue of bearer certificates of deposit in denominations of 5 cents, 10 cents, 25 cents, and 50 cents, as provided in section 11(d), would create a large mass of paper fractional currency. The provision of section 11(h) for the maintenance of checking accounts by depositors in large cities would directly involve the Government in ordinary commercial banking. The provision of section 12 authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury to deposit any money in the Treasury in the postal savings bank without requiring security therefor is in direct conflict with the policy of the laws governing the deposits of public moneys in the national bank depositories.

The measure is quite impracticable and would require the creation of an extensive administrative machinery and greatly increase the already heavy burdens on the local post-office services.

Very truly, yours,

A. W. MELLON, Secretary.

REPLY OF SENATOR SHEPPARD TO STATEMENTS OF POSTMASTER GENERAL AND SECRETARY OF TREASURY.

I have noted the replies of Postmaster General Hays and Secretary of the Treasury Mellon to the inquiry of the chairman of the Senate Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads regarding the bill under consideration (S. 2033).

Mr. Hays states that the measure would not so much advance the interest of postal savings as it would completely revolutionize the banking system of this country, that it is so radical as to constitute a fundamental change of policy on the part of this Government toward the whole question of banking, that his own suggestions as to certain changes in the Postal Savings System have encountered such opposition from savings banks, he can only wonder what the opposition would be from banking institutions to the "very radical" changes in the bill under discussion. Mr. Hays adds that he will be glad to see a copy of the hearings.

Mr. Hays does not say why he thinks the bill revolutionary and radical. He says merely that this is his opinion of the bill after having considered it. He does not tell us in what particulars the bill uproots existing banking methods. My contention is that the bill evolutionizes our banking system and does not revolutionize it. The bill does not change any existing banking law. It leaves the present banking institutions unchanged and intact. It brings into postal savings banks three billions of money which existing banks have failed to attract. It provides that all banks now in operation may act as agents in loaning these postal funds. It provides that the cash reserves of existing banks may be deposited in the postal banks, receiving therefor interest-bearing certificates countable as reserves. It creates new sources of profit and strength for existing banks. It makes the postal savings bank a gigantic ally of existing banks, not an enemy.

It will be recalled that commercial banks almost unanimously opposed the Federal reserve system, a system which has proved to be their salvation. Surely their supposed opposition to the plan involved in the bill before us is not in itself a conclusive argument against it, especially when the bill makes so much new capital available at a time when new capital is the supreme need of America and the world, and moreover adds immensely both to the profits and the stability of the present banking and financial system.

When Mr. Hays reads the hearings, I trust he will modify his position. He is entitled to great credit for having denounced the unfairness of the present Postal Savings System, and for the constructive steps he advocates.

Mr. Mellon states that while the Treasury has consistently favored the liberalization of the postal savings law so as to permit of a greater coordination between the Postal Savings System and the sale of Treasury savings securities, the Treasury is unequivocally opposed to any such legislation as that proposed by this bill, that the removal of all limitation on the amount of deposits and the provision for the loaning of funds deposited in the postal savings banks would involve the Government extensively in the business of commercial banking. I submit with all respect that the bill does not involve the Government in commercial banking. Vastly the greater portion of the Nation's business is based on personal and corporate credits, on personal and corporate commercial paper, not an iota of which will or can be touched by the postal savings bank, which under this bill can make no investment whatever except in United States bonds, can make no loans except on unquestionable collateral security, specified by law or regulation of the board, or when guaranteed by undoubtedly good commercial banks. Indeed, most of its loans will be made through such banks at a legitimate, liberal profit to such banks.

Mr. Mellon next says that the banking needs of the country are already adequately met by the Federal Reserve System and the numerous national banks and State banks and banking institutions, and that there is no call for an extensive Government banking institution of the character which this bill seeks to establish. Mr. Mellon evidently overlooks the fact that existing banks and banking institutions have failed to attract and mobilize $3,000,000,000 of actual money now held by the American people. The benefit to the country of its present wonderful banking system is the fact that it mobilizes funds for business, commerce, economic growth, financial development. Thus it makes every actual dollar do the work of hundreds, and gives impetus to the advancement and prosperity of the Nation which nothing else can supply. But practically half of the $6,000,000,000 of actual money in the United States—about $3,000,000,000—still remains outside the banks, unutilized for business and credit and trade and progress, going to waste in this respect as much so as the unharnessed waters that pour over a dam and not through a turbine. Experience of other countries has shown that the people will deposit money with the Government when they will trust no private institution. Think of the enormous value to the United States and the world if $3,000,000,000 of additional savings could be banked here, doubling the credit and banking resources of the leading financial power of the earth! To say that there is no need for this additional credit power at a time when the crying need of the United States and the world is for new capital is to ignore a plainly evident fact.

Mr. Mellon confines his specific objections to sections 11 and 12 of the bill. He says that the provision of section 11 for certificates of deposit which may pass from hand to hand in the manner of certified or other bank checks and receivable by the United States in payment of obligations due the United States, not specifically made payable in gold, would result in the issue of an enormous amount of demand obligations which inevitably pass from hand to hand in lieu of currency with consequent inflation and unsettlement in business and price conditions. This is a remarkable contention in the face of the fact that the Nation's commercial banks are now safely supporting nearly $50,000,000,000 of liabilities that are mainly demand obligations. In practice these obligations are never called for but are, on the contrary, increasing as the country's business increases and reflect legitimate banking operations. So it will be with the demand obligations of the postal savings bank, its investments and loans being conservative beyond comparison with those of commercial banks. The solidity and credit of the postal bank will be backed by the resources and taxing power of the whole Nation, so that fear of runs and insolvency will not be sanely conceivable.

Mr. Mellon then says that the issue of certificates of deposit in this form would make it impossible to protect the depositor in case of loss of the certificates and would destroy one of the most salutary features of the present postal savings system, namely, the absolute safety of the deposit. This argument would be equally good against Federal reserve notes, Liberty bonds, or the gold and silver certificates. If a person loses one of these or mutilates or burns it beyond identification, does the Federal reserve bank or the Government make the loss good?

Mr. Mellon next states that the issue of bearer certificates of deposit in denominations of 5 cents, 10 cents, 25 cents, and 50 cents, as provided in section 11(d) would create a large mass of paper fractional currency. It should be remembered that these forms of currency would not issue except as the people preferred them to cents, nickels, silver, etc. And if they are thus preferred they are only similar to, and more convenient, more available, than war savings stamps. To the extent that they are thus preferred the economic consequence would be that some hundreds of millions of dollars in good coin would be poured into commercial bank vaults and become good assets for greater and more profitable bank credits to customers or be sent to the Orient where they would multiply markets for American goods. There are still some gray heads among us who remember the so-called "shinplasters" of 1862 and later. They would buy anything and were "good" in gold in due time. These gray heads tell us of a common, cheap, pocket folder that automatically kept the fractional currency sorted, clean, convenient for ready use, wearing no holes in one's pocket. We can stand the shinplasters if the people want them; if not, they can instantly get rid of them for "thrift" deposits in postal savings banks at any post office.

Mr. Mellon then mentions subparagraph (h), section 11, saying that the maintenance of checking accounts by depositors in large cities would directly involve the Government in ordinary commercial banking.

The bill limits checking accounts to depositors with an average balance exceeding $500 and to such cities as the board may designate. However, this provision is unessential and is not insisted on. Indeed, such a statement was made at the hearings. Let me say here that the bill is open to amendment and that criticisms and suggestions are freely invited. Neither Mr. Hays nor Mr. Mellon have attempted to show us how the bill may be made more effective, but have limited their reports to expressions of unqualified condemnation.

Mr. Mellon, continuing his report, says that the provision of section 12 authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury to deposit any money in the Treasury in the postal savings bank without requiring security therefor is in direct conflict with the policy of the laws governing the deposits of public moneys in the national-bank depositories. Why should a nation exact security of itself? Besides, this bill repeals all laws inconsistent with its terms. If, however, it is deemed best to exact security from the Nation for the Nation's own funds, the bill may be so amended.

Mr. Mellon concludes with the general assertion that the bill is quite impracticable and would require the creation of an extensive administrative machinery and greatly increase the already heavy burdens on the local post-office services. The proponents of the measure earnestly believe that its benefits will more than offset any administrative burdens it may impose. The greater part of the necessary machinery is already in existence. We believe it therefore to be practicable, sane, and sound; that it will create with comparatively little added burden the greatest and strongest financial institution on earth—a people's institution mobilizing the people's funds in the interest of the people; that it will infinitely strengthen the credit of the Government, bring its obligations to par, reduce interest charges for the fundamental operations of the people, and create a reservoir of new credit and capital available to all individuals and institutions on fair and equal terms.

The burden will be abundantly worth bearing. Every civilized nation has its postal savings bank. Such banks contain no suggestion of benevolence, philanthropy, or paternalism; they represent simple justice and opportunity—opportunity for industry, thrift, patriotism. I say patriotism because the people will be glad to intrust these savings that now lie unused and idle outside the banks to a savings institution identified with and backed by the Nation. Justice to depositors pays. They are morally entitled to the market price for their money—the market price which this bill offers instead of the almost fraudulent—to adopt a similar expression by Mr. Hays in his Sullivan (Ind.) interview on the present postal-bank system—less than half price of the existing postal savings bank. At present the price of money is high, and this bill provides that any profit on loans in excess of the 4 per cent for depositors shall go to the Treasury for the benefit of all citizens, including depositors. As normal times return the price of money will drop and the postal bank board will reduce the rate of interest to depositors in accordance with the market price. There is more profit in cheap articles than in dear ones, in money, muslin, or automobiles.

It will pay to give the best service possible to depositors at the least cost possible. Hence the various forms of certificates of deposit, etc. Business men of all degrees now keep their accounts with commercial banks, and there will be no reason at all for them to leave such banks for the postal savings bank while the commercial banks give good service; and under this bill they can give the exact service of the postal bank itself, so the commercial banks are no more than put on good behavior.

Let me say again that the unshackled postal savings bank will be the greatest, strongest bank in the world, one vast national reservoir of thrift and savings, equally open to all, equally serving all, stabilizing finance and credit as no other financial institution has ever done. More than anything else, it will enable our Nation to become in reality and truth the world's banker, doubling our bank resources, and multiplying the prosperity of the individual and the Nation.

MORRIS SHEPPARD.

ENROLLED BILL PRESENTED.

Mr. SUTHERLAND, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that on the 20th instant they had presented to the President of the United States the enrolled bill (S. 2504) providing for the readmission of certain deficient midshipmen to the United States Naval Academy.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Bills were introduced, read the first time, and, by unanimous consent, the second time, and referred as follows:

By Mr. SMOOT:

A bill (S. 2612) for the relief of Jane Z. Tolman (with accompanying papers); to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. SPENCER:

A bill (S. 2613) granting an increase of pension to Elizabeth C. Loughborough; to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. KING:

A bill (S. 2614) to establish a standard decimal system of weights and measures for the United States; to the Committee on Manufactures.

By Mr. SUTHERLAND:

A bill (S. 2615) to enlarge, extend, and remodel the post-office building at Parkersburg, W. Va.; to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

ASSISTANT CLERK, COMMITTEE ON INDIAN AFFAIRS.

Mr. CURTIS submitted the following resolution (S. Res. 157), which was referred to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate:

Resolved, That the Committee on Indian Affairs of the Senate be, and hereby is, authorized and directed to employ an assistant clerk at the rate of $2,200 per annum, to be paid out of the miscellaneous items of the contingent fund of the Senate until otherwise provided by law.

TAX REVISION.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 8245) to reduce and equalize taxation, to amend and simplify the revenue act of 1918, and for other purposes.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will state the pending amendment.

The READING CLERK. The pending amendment is the amendment of the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. MCCUMBER] to the amendment of the committee. On page 12, lines 9, 10, and 11 in lieu of the matter proposed to be inserted by the committee amendment insert the following: "merger or consolidation (including the acquisition by one corporation of at least a majority of the voting stock and at least a majority of the total number of shares of all other classes of stock of another corporation, or of substantially all the properties of another corporation)," and a comma.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Mr. President, I believe on yesterday at the close of the session I had asked the acting chairman of the committee [Mr. MCCUMBER] to make some explanation of the purpose for which this amendment was offered. He stated at that time that he did not know, that he had not prepared the amendment, and further stated that it was handed in as an amendment to be proposed by the chairman of the committee. We have had no explanation of the amendment or why it is offered. I should like to inquire whether there is any information to be presented this morning before we pass upon the amendment? I deem it rather an important amendment, and if there is any information to show why the amendment should be adopted I think the Senate ought to have it. Thus far there has been no reason whatever given for the amendment.

I should simply like to inquire whether there is any information to be had this morning from the committee. If not, I propose to make some observations about it myself, but I think the Senate is entitled, in the first place, to some information. There must be a reason for the amendment and the Senate ought to know what it is.

Mr. PENROSE. Mr. President, the Senator from New Mexico is a member of the Finance Committee and has ample opportunity to know as much about the bill as any other member. He had a full explanation of this provision given yesterday by the Senator from North Dakota. How many explanations he requires I am at a loss to know. If he has any objection to the amendment, either I or the Senator from North Dakota or any other member of the committee here present will be glad to answer and explain, but having been a member of the committee during the four weeks in which the bill was being considered, he certainly does not wish now to come on the floor of the Senate and repeatedly be asking for information. I appeal to the Senator whether it is an attitude that is fair to the great committee of which he is a member, and supposed to be an active member.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Pennsylvania yield to the Senator from North Carolina?

Mr. PENROSE. I yield.

Mr. SIMMONS. I think the Senator from Pennsylvania is in error. The amendment which the Secretary read a little while ago has never been adopted by the Finance Committee.

Mr. PENROSE. It has been discussed by the committee.

Mr. SIMMONS. No; it is not the amendment offered by the Finance Committee and incorporated in the bill as reported back to the Senate by the Finance Committee. It is an amendment which was adopted by the majority members of the Finance Committee in the session where the famous compromise was reached. Neither the Senator from New Mexico nor myself was present to hear the reasons for the change made at that time. Has there been any explanation upon the floor of the Senate as to the reason why the change was made?

Mr. PENROSE. In fairness, I must concede that to the extent of a change in the form of the amendment, the Senator from North Carolina is correct. The amendment printed in the copy of the bill which I have before me is the committee amendment, but it is true that it has been modified and the modified suggestion by the majority of the committee is now pending.

Mr. SIMMONS. The modified amendment comes to the Senate merely as an amendment offered by an individual Senator.

Mr. PENROSE. In that respect, the Senator is correct, but I still maintain that it has been fully explained.

Mr. SIMMONS. I have nothing to say about that.

Mr. PENROSE. There are reasons why it may be that every Senator did not understand the explanation which I shall not go into now.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I have no desire to prolong this discussion if those who understand the proposition as it is now do not wish to explain it, but I say frankly that I gave the bill such attention as I was able to give it under somewhat trying circumstances, for which the committee were not responsible, and I do not know now what this particular amendment will do.

Mr. MCCUMBER. Will the Senator from Missouri allow me to try again to explain it?

Mr. REED. Certainly.

Mr. MCCUMBER. This amendment relates to the exchange of property. The law is general as to the exchange of property. If a man exchanges a farm which is worth $5,000 for another farm which is worth $5,000, he has neither lost nor gained; but if a man exchanges a farm that is worth $5,000 for another farm which is worth $6,000, he has made a gain of $1,000, if that is the realizable market value of the exchange. However, suppose one corporation exchanges its stock for the stock of another corporation under a merger, so that there is to be an exchange of stock in corporation A for stock in corporation B. Under the law as it was first proposed to be amended by the committee, in the merger there would have to be substantially all of the stock of corporation A turned over, and the question often arises what is substantially all of the stock. That left the question somewhat difficult; but, as a matter of fact, the directors or those representing the majority of the stock in corporation A have a right to control the corporation, and therefore can vote for a merger with merely the controlling stock. If stock in corporation B is obtained by a holder of stock of corporation A, even though every share of stock of corporation A was not represented, he would still have the right to hold that it was an exchange of the property, stock for stock. That is all there is in this proposed amendment. It is a question of whether that has been a profit. It is often in such reorganizations impossible to get hold of every dollar's worth of stock; the stock may be scattered around; some one having such a small portion which is so valueless that he neither assigns it nor does anything else with it except to hold it. It would be improper, it seems to me, in an exchange to say that the reorganization could not be recognized for the purpose of a trade unless all of the stock or even what one might say was substantially all of the stock was voted.

A majority of the committee believed, on a further reconsideration of the matter, that it was better, inasmuch as the corporation A could reorganize and could take the stock of corporation B, that upon the exchange of the stock as represented by the reorganization, effectuated through a majority of the stock, if the property were of the same value, of course there should be no question of gain or loss. The only question is whether in the transfer or trade the law will recognize the controlling stock in bringing about the reorganization.

Mr. MCKELLAR. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator from North Dakota a question?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from North Dakota yield to the Senator from Tennessee?

Mr. MCCUMBER. I yield.

Mr. MCKELLAR. In other words, as I understand, if one corporation buys the majority of the stock of another and reorganizes it by consolidation then no tax is to be imposed?

Mr. MCCUMBER. If the stock which is received from corporation B by the stockholder represents exactly the same value as his stock which was held in corporation A, and which stock was taken in lieu of the stock in corporation A, then there would be no tax imposed.

Mr. MCKELLAR. Is there any such limitation in this proposed act? Would not this provision, with the amendment suggested by the Senator, cover any transfer of the majority of the stock of any corporation to another corporation for the purpose of consolidation? Would the stock have to be of equal value, as the Senator now suggests?

Mr. MCCUMBER. The only question here, if the Senator will again pardon me, which I tried to make clear, is not the question of the taxation; that is determined by whether there is a gain or loss; but what will be recognized is the reorganization to effectuate the exchange of all stock. A company can reorganize and can allow itself to become a part of another corporation by vote of the controlling stock; and under the law as it is without this amendment it must have at least substantially all of the stock instead of simply a control of the stock in order to effect a reorganization.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from New Mexico desire the floor in his own right?

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Yes.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from New Mexico is recognized.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Mr. President, I think there is a great deal more in this matter than the explanation made by the Senator from North Dakota would indicate. The present law is quite different and was framed to cover quite a different situation. I desire to call attention to the provisions of the present law which this bill seeks to change, and then to suggest some reasons for making the change. Section 202 of the present law does provide for the reorganization of corporations. It reads as follows:

When in the case of any such reorganization, merger, or consolidation the aggregate par or face value of the new stock or securities received is in excess of the aggregate par or face value of the stock or securities exchanged, a like amount in par or face value of the new stock or securities received shall be treated as taking the place of the stock or securities exchanged, and the amount of the excess in par or face value shall be treated as a gain to the extent that the fair market value of the new stock or securities is greater than the cost (or if acquired prior to March 1, 1913, the fair market value as of that date) of the stock or securities exchanged.

That provision was framed upon the idea that there was merely a swapping of shares of stock of a definite par value, and that it would really amount only to an exchange of shares of stock of a definite par value, each being equal to the other in par value. The amendment proposed by the committee goes much further than that, as, indeed, the House bill goes much further. It provides that no loss or gain shall be considered whenever there is an exchange of securities without reference to their par value and, in fact, without reference to any value at all; it simply contemplates an exchange of securities. This particular provision ought to be designated a law for the purpose of pumping water into securities, for that is what it amounts to.

Mr. PENROSE. Mr. President, will the Senator permit an inquiry?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from New Mexico yield to the Senator from Pennsylvania?

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. PENROSE. I think the Senator, as a man of wide experience, will concede that there is an object to be reached here that may be occasionally laudable; I think it is quite often laudable. The Senator, I know, has a very comprehensive knowledge of this phase of the measure, and I should be glad if he would suggest an amendment to safeguard any of the stockholders in a corporation or any interest which, perchance, may be neglected. The committee will very cheerfully consider any amendment the Senator may have in mind, even to the point of permitting the matter to go over until the Senator may consider that phase of the question.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I will say to the Senator that the only remedy which I can suggest is that the amendment now offered by the committee be withdrawn. I say "the amendment offered by the committee." I may be in error about that; I do not understand that it is a committee amendment.

Mr. PENROSE. No; the amendment was offered at the last moment by the majority of the committee; and a majority deemed the amendment a good one, or they would not have sponsored it. If the Senator desires an opportunity to consider it further—it has not been before the Senate so long as other portions of the bill—I will very cheerfully ask that it may go over until a little later, so that the Senator may have an opportunity to consult the experts and deliberate on it.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Of course, if the Senator from Pennsylvania desires that the matter go over, I have no objection at all, but for my own purposes I do not feel disposed to ask that it go over. I think I understand it well enough now.

Mr. PENROSE. I do not ask to have it go over. If the Senate does not choose to sustain it, the bill, in my opinion, will merely be receiving an injury such as it has been receiving on account of absenteeism and other causes, such as failure to understand the proposition, and we will have to go along as best we may.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I think if the Senator will listen to me a little further that he himself may feel like withdrawing the amendment.

Mr. PENROSE. I do not think so, but I will be glad to listen to the Senator.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I am sure the Senator does not think so now, but here is the effect of the amendment: Suppose that there were two individuals, each of whom owned a majority of the stock of separate corporations. Suppose, for instance, that there are two steel manufacturing concerns, and I own a majority of stock in one and the Senator to my right, the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. GERRY], owns a majority of stock in another. We propose to consolidate the management of those two concerns. We have a right under this provision to organize a new corporation, and I put in my stock for any number of shares which I may see fit to have issued for them and a like number of shares are assigned, of course, to the Senator from Rhode Island, who owns a majority of the stock in another concern. It is a specific plan, adapted primarily to permit the consolidation of the control of corporations and putting water into their capitalization. If it means anything, that is just what it means. You can organize a holding company for the purpose of taking over a majority of the stock—not the property, as suggested by the Senator from North Dakota, simply because they can not get in a few outstanding shares of stock, because we all know that in order to transfer the property you have to get the consent of all the shareholders in the case of the ordinary corporation; so it is not for the purpose of transferring the property at all. It is simply for the purpose of transferring the control of the stock of the corporation, and it is intended primarily to permit that kind of thing to be done under this sanction of law, and that there shall be no gain or loss considered in the transaction.

If I am able to understand this amendment, that is just what it means. It means, as I say, that you organize a holding company and then every person who owns a majority of the stock of another concern can put into the new holding company simply his majority of that stock, and then the holding company issues stock in any amount in payment for the majority stock of these various subsidiary corporations. It simply means, as I said in the first place, a very convenient device for the purpose of pumping water into the capitalization of corporations, and that is the purpose for which it would be used.

It strikes me that there is no reason for this amendment providing for a majority of the stock.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President, can the Senator explain so that Senators can understand it what the present law is on the subject, and what the difficulty is that this amendment is supposed to be aimed at?

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I read the present law just a few moments ago. Perhaps the Senator was not in the Chamber when I read it. The present law provides that there may be an exchange of the stock of one corporation for the stock of another upon the same par or face value without the exchange being considered as a matter of gain or loss in the transaction.

Bear in mind, it must be an exchange of par for par. That is the present law. Now they seek to take away from it the idea of par for par and all of the stock of the corporation, which would really be a mere organization, and say by this amendment that if you have a majority of the stock of a corporation you can organize a new corporation and put that majority into it, and issue securities or shares of stock of the new corporation in any amount in which the parties may see fit to issue it.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, if the Senator will pardon me, I wish to ask him if this is not true: If they get merely a majority of the stock in exchange, may not the minority of the stock represent the gains resulting from this reorganization and the gains which would otherwise be taxed, thereby enabling them, through this process, to escape taxation?

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I do not quite catch the point which the Senator has suggested.

Mr. SIMMONS. The point is this, Mr. President—the Senator has evidently studied this matter more than I have, and I am simply asking him this question:

Here is a proposition to exchange property for property, to exchange stock in one corporation for stock in another corporation, brought about by a process of reorganization, it may be, of two corporations. If that exchange results in merely giving value for value, no tax is due the Government as a result of the exchange; but if, in that exchange, there is a gain to either party of the transaction, that gain is subject to tax, is it not?

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Of course.

Mr. SIMMONS. Here is this definition of a reorganization which would be treated as a mere exchange. That is the proposition—a reorganization which is a mere exchange. There is neither profit nor loss; but in this scheme, by reason of the definition which they give to "reorganization," it seems to me they leave a loophole for a gain in this process of exchange which would escape taxation. Now it is said that in the reorganization, if the stockholder of the old corporation acquires the majority of the voting stock in the new corporation and a majority of the other classes of stock, that shall be treated as a mere exchange; no taxable gain results.

Is it not apparent, however, that if he gets merely a majority of the stock, the corporation may issue stock of a very large amount in the reorganization scheme, and the minority stock, which may be acquired by an outsider, will be the profits that will result from that reorganization scheme, and, as profits, would escape taxation?

I still do not know whether I make myself clear.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I can see how the Senator may be right about it.

Mr. SIMMONS. If the Senator will pardon me a minute to make it clearer, in the amendment as it was originally reported by the committee this was the definition of "reorganization," which meant nothing more than a mere exchange of stock. That is the purpose of this reorganization. It is a reorganization which means nothing more than a mere exchange of stock. When they defined "reorganization" in the amendment originally submitted by the committee, they defined it in this way:

The word "reorganization," as used in this paragraph, includes a merger or consolidation (including the acquisition by one corporation of substantially all the stock or substantially all the properties of another corporation).

The new amendment which it is proposed to insert reads in this way:

The word "reorganization," as used in this paragraph, includes a merger or consolidation (including the acquisition by one corporation of at least a majority of the voting stock—

Not substantially all, but a majority of the voting stock—and at least a majority of the total number of shares of all other classes of stock—

Not practically all, or substantially all, as in the original amendment offered by the committee, but merely—a majority of the voting stock and at least a majority of the total number of shares of all other classes of stock of another corporation, or of substantially all the properties of another corporation).

That is in the disjunctive, "or of substantially all the properties"; but when it comes to the stock, it is only necessary under this amendment that the acquisition by one corporation shall be of practically one-half, while in the original amendment it was necessary for the corporation to acquire substantially all.

The point I am making is that that change in the amendment leaves out of consideration altogether, in connection with this reorganization scheme which is merely to be an exchange, the minority stock; and if that is left out, could not that be sold in the reorganization scheme to outsiders, and that money covered into the corporation as part of the property of the man who owned one-half of the voting stock? In that way, as a result of this reorganization scheme, instead of merely an exchange, the corporation would obtain something of real value, for which it ought to account to the Government as gains.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Mr. President, I think that result might follow under the next paragraph of the bill, which provides that these people transferring their stock to the new corporation are not necessarily required to obtain more than 80 per cent of the stock of the new corporation in exchange where they transfer the property for the stock of the new corporation. I really believe, however, that the vice of this amendment arises from the fact that it especially authorizes and warrants the organization of holding companies and the increase of their capital stock, perhaps at the expense of a minority of the stockholders of these corporations.

Under the present law they have to transfer all of the stock, and under the bill as presented by the committee they have to get substantially all of it; but this would enable them to organize a holding concern by obtaining a bare majority of the stock, and leave the minority stockholders out in the cold.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me right there?

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I yield.

Mr. McCUMBER. I want the Senator's explanation. He says that this law allows the majority stockholders of a corporation to make the exchange. The corporation has that right, anyway, has it not? The holders of a majority of the stock can always reorganize, can they not, without reference to this law at all? Under the present law, under any law, the holders of a majority of the stock represented in any meeting can reorganize, even though the minority opposes it.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. No; I can not accept the Senator's premise. What he has stated is not permissible under the laws of one State that I know about. I do not know what the law of other States may be, but you can not even increase your stock in New Mexico without the consent of at least two-thirds of the stockholders, and you can not dispose of all of the assets of the corporation unless you treat all of the stock alike.

Mr. McCUMBER. Of course, there may be different laws in the different States, but I assume the general rule is that the holders of a majority of stock in a corporation can reorganize for any purpose. They may reorganize and then change their name. They may take in other property and issue additional stock for that property. We are not seeking to change the law. I ask the Senator just to bear in mind that the only thing this amendment does is to recognize the general rule that the holders of a majority of the stock represented in the corporation can reorganize. If I have stock in Corporation A, whether it is majority or minority, and Corporation A reorganizes, even though substantially all of the stock is not recognized, and I receive new stock in place of it in a corporation which is named B, which is substantially the same corporation, and if I have substantially the same property, there has been no gain or loss. I call the Senator's attention to the fact that the whole purpose of the amendment and all it does is shown by the language. It reads:

The word "reorganization," as used in this paragraph, includes a merger or consolidation (including the acquisition by one corporation of at least a majority of the voting stock and at least a majority of the total number of shares of all other classes of stock of another corporation).

The majority stock referred to means the majority stock in the other corporation which is obtained. It does not mean necessarily what is done by the majority of the stockholders in the corporation which is making the exchange, or reorganizing as a new corporation. It seems to me that the only question being to define what reorganization is, we can settle what the tax shall be when we come to the taxing provision. I agree with the Senator that if there is a profit made, of course they should pay on whatever that profit may be in the exchange.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. The trouble with the statement of the Senator from North Dakota is, I think, that his statement does not go far enough. The word "reorganization," as defined by this amendment, does not mean reorganization at all. It means something besides reorganization. It means the organization of a holding company which shall acquire only a majority of the stock of subsidiary corporations. We have had plenty of illustrations of just this sort of thing in the business world. We all know about them. As I said a while ago, it simply means that people owning only a majority of the stock may, under this provision, transfer that majority to a new corporation, get two or three times the number of shares in exchange for it, and those shares in the aggregate will become at once worth more on the market than the original shares. That has occurred time and again.

Mr. WATSON of Indiana. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from New Mexico yield to the Senator from Indiana?

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Gladly.

Mr. WATSON of Indiana. I think the all-sufficient answer to that is simply this proposition: If the Senator owns $100,000 worth of stock in one corporation, and under the provisions of this amendment he transfers those shares of stock to another corporation and receives shares of stock of the new corporation to the value of $1,000,000, he will carry that $1,000,000 worth of stock at the value of the $100,000 worth of stock. He must carry it at that old value until he sells it, and when he sells it he accounts by way of taxation for the gain which he makes. That is all that this amendment provides. It is purely a paper affair. It is the exchange of the stock of different corporations for business purposes; and at a time when so much reorganization is going on in the business world, it is thought by all those interested in the upbuilding of the industries of the country at this time that this is a very helpful provision.

I call the Senator's attention to the further fact that it prevents the registration of losses quite as much as the registration of gains, and at this time, when many of these transfers are being made, losses will occur more frequently than gains. Therefore, on the whole, this seems to be amply safeguarded, for if the Senator will read the language on page 13 in this very section, on the subject of gains and losses, he will see it is provided that—

Where property is exchanged for other property and no gain or loss is recognized under the provisions of subdivision (c), the property received shall, for the purposes of this section—

That is, for the purposes of ascertaining either gain or loss—

be treated as taking the place of the property exchanged therefor.

That is all there is to this whole proposition. Therefore, the holder could not, by exchanging his $100,000 worth of stock in one corporation for $1,000,000 worth of stock in another corporation, acquire a greater value in that corporation than his $100,000 represented; nor can he sell his $1,000,000 worth of stock of the new corporation for more than the value of the $100,000 of the stock of the old corporation without accounting for it for taxation purposes whenever he sells it.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Mr. President, I am glad we have now had an explanation of the reason why this provision was brought in.

Mr. PENROSE. I would like to ask the Senator from Indiana to supplement that, if the Senator from New Mexico will permit me. Does not the point referred to by the Senator from Indiana, about holding the stock at $100,000, correct an abuse which the present law permits?

Mr. WATSON of Indiana. That is my understanding of it.

Mr. PENROSE. It is to correct an abuse on the public.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I would like to know what abuse it corrects.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, may I suggest to the Senator from New Mexico that he read paragraph (e), on page 14 of this bill. The object of the amendment being discussed is to remove a misunderstanding which has occurred in the enforcement of the existing law, and there is no question in my mind but what the amendment will bring more revenue to the Government of the United States, by preventing colorable losses from wash sales, than anything there is in this bill, and the question of a holding company has nothing whatever to do with it, in my mind. I am simply giving the Senator my idea.

The substance of this is in paragraph (e), page 14, and it is amply protected in every way by paragraph (d), which has just been read by the Senator from Indiana. If the Senator will read it in that way—that is, beginning on page 14 with (e), and then read the amendments we are now discussing, and take them into consideration along with paragraph (d)—I think myself he will conclude that it is very much better than existing law.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, I must confess that the amendment now offered by the Senator from Pennsylvania, not the committee amendment, has gotten me into a state of some confusion. I wish to ask the Senator from Utah, who probably has studied this more thoroughly than I have, because he was present at the hearings when the substitute amendment was adopted and I was not, if he regards the change made in the Senate committee amendment, by substituting the words "a majority of the voting stock" for "substantially all the stock," as a material and necessary change?

Mr. SMOOT. I do. I think it is necessary and advisable.

Mr. SIMMONS. What does the Senator think is accomplished by that change?

Mr. SMOOT. This is nothing more nor less than a paper transaction. Under existing law no tax is imposed in any way upon the gains on stock until it is sold. This provides simply for a paper transfer. But when a sale is made, I care not when, every dollar of increase is taxable under this provision. We provide in the amendment how that can be done. There can be no evasion under it.

Mr. SIMMONS. What is the purpose of saying that a merger or a consolidation shall depend upon the acquisition of half of the stock instead of the acquisition of practically all the stock in a concern?

Mr. WATSON of Indiana. If the Senator from Utah will permit me——

Mr. SMOOT. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. SIMMONS. I have not yet seen why the members of the committee wanted to enlarge the original amendment.

Mr. WATSON of Indiana. Only because with these large country-wide corporations, in which there are thousands of stockholders, it is a physical impossibility to get all the stock represented. For instance, there was a transfer made where there were 230,000 stockholders. It was physically impossible to reach all those. Therefore, if these reorganizations are to be made, they must be made by at least a fair majority of the stockholders. That certainly ought to be sufficient.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, in many cases fictitious exchanges are made to avoid the tax imposed in the existing law. When the time comes for paying their taxes under the present law it is not known really what to tax, but under this provision the question is clarified.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President, is not that just the weakness of this amendment? I have not been quite able to make up my mind about it. This is like all these other amendments; it might just as well be written in Greek, as far as I am concerned. Now, I understand the Senator to say that in case a man makes an exchange of stock which results in giving him, perhaps, a stock of much greater dividend value, and therefore of much greater value, an exchange which results in a gain to him for that year, no tax is to be levied upon it at that time, and no tax is to be levied until he sells that stock, and then, if he sells it at a higher price than his original stock was worth, he is to be taxed upon the gain that is made.

Mr. SMOOT. That is exactly the same as existing law. There is no change at all in that, and that is the policy of taxation. This is simply a transfer of title, a man receiving another title that is supposed to be of equal value. In other words, the Senator may exchange his certificate of stock in one company, where there is a merger with another, and get the same number of shares exactly; or, if there is a different value between the two companies, his company being more valuable than the other, he may get two shares for one. But there is no difference in the value of his property under such an exchange as that, because the present value of each of the properties is taken into consideration at the time the merger is made, and when the merger is made his property represents no more than it did before the merger was made. It is not likely he is going to receive any more profit upon it. But if he later sells it, then, of course, he has to pay the tax upon whatever profit there may be. There may be no profit; there may be a loss, and in that case he is allowed, under the law, to deduct the losses which occur, just the same as under existing law.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Do I understand the Senator to say that at the present time if a man exchanges one lot of real estate for another lot, he is not taxed upon the amount of the profit he may make in that transfer?

Mr. SMOOT. Oh, yes; that is a sale, and if there is a profit he is taxed upon it; but in a merger he is supposed to receive just exactly what he gives.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I am not talking about suppositions. Suppose that instead of exchanging real estate he exchanges stock; under the present law is no attempt made to tax the gain which he may make by that transaction?

Mr. SMOOT. This is quite a different proposition. If a man sells real estate, the title of the real estate is out of his hands and he receives another piece of real estate, and he has a new title for another piece of property, and of course if there is any gain he is bound to pay a tax. But in a merger the same property which the man held he still has an interest in, and that is all there is to it. It is not a sale.

Mr. REED. Mr. President——

Mr. SMOOT. He not only has an interest in that property but in the property it is merged with.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from New Mexico yield to the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I yield to the Senator from Missouri.

Mr. REED. The Senator from Utah said that when a man trades one piece of real estate for another the title goes out of him for the piece he owns and the new title comes to him for the piece he acquires, and that being a completed transaction the profits, if any there are, can be ascertained; but that if a man owns stock in a company which has merged with another he simply exchanges stock for stock and acquires nothing new. The Senator did not mean to leave the statement that way——

Mr. SMOOT. I qualified it.

Mr. REED. Because, of course, when Corporation A is consolidated with Corporation B the shareholder in Corporation A acquiring the consolidated stock has acquired something new; he has acquired an interest in the property of the other corporation.

Mr. SMOOT. Yes; and he has given away a part of his interest in the company that he originally owned.

Mr. REED. Certainly. He has done in principle just exactly what the man has done in the real estate transaction.

Mr. SMOOT. In paragraph (d) it is provided for and protected in every way.

Mr. REED. Just to follow that a moment, the Senator's statement, which I am speaking of to get straight and not by way of criticism, would be correct if Corporation A concluded to reorganize itself, to create perhaps a larger stock and change its form, and therefore Corporation B is organized and takes over the assets of Corporation A, and nothing else, unless it is new money put in on an exact parity with that already invested. In that case there would be an exchange of stock in one corporation for substantially the same stock in another. But that is not what this amendment is intended to deal with at all.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. The Senator is quite right in his statement that the amendment is not intended to deal with that sort of a situation. The present law deals with that sort of a situation and is a very simple and plain law upon the subject. Perhaps I should have read the preceding paragraph of the present law, the one preceding the paragraph which I did read, which shows that the present law contemplates just such a situation as the Senator from Utah has stated, and nothing more. I will read that paragraph. It will be found on page 4 of the present law, if any Senator happens to have the present law before him:

> When property is exchanged for other property, the property received in exchange shall for the purpose of determining gain or loss be treated as the equivalent of cash to the amount of its fair market value, if any; but when in connection with the reorganization, merger, or consolidation of a company a person receives in place of stock or securities owned by him—

Bear in mind that that means in connection with the reorganization, merger, or consolidation of a corporation. That is where the whole thing is taken over by the new concern. If in such case—a person receives in place of stock or securities owned by him new stock or securities of no greater aggregate par or face value, no gain or loss shall be deemed to occur from the exchange.

While the amendment refers to what is called a reorganization, when we come to the definition of the word as stated in the bill itself we find it does not necessarily mean a reorganization, it does not necessarily mean a merger or a consolidation, but what it does mean is that persons controlling a majority of the stock may meet and organize a new concern which will own nothing but a majority of the stock, and in payment for that majority of the stock issue the stock of the new concern in any amount which they may choose.

Mr. REED. Free from tax.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Yes; free from tax. I will state the effect of it, and I can not illustrate it any better than in the organization of the United States Steel Corporation today. When that concern was organized it did not take over the property of the various other steel concerns. I think in most cases it took over practically all the stock, but under this arrangement it would not need to do that. It could simply take over a majority of the stock, control the stock, freeze out the minority stockholders, control the new aggregation and issue new stock in an unlimited amount in payment for the stocks of the subsidiary corporations, and pay no tax on it, although the next day the market value might be very much greater than the market value of the aggregate securities of the subsidiary corporations.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, will the Senator let me give him an illustration?

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I should be glad to have the Senator do so.

Mr. REED. The Rock Island Railroad scandal is a good illustration. There were two or three railroad companies. The majority of their stock or a control of the stock was acquired and put into a holding company and it issued its stock. Then a majority of the stock in the holding company was acquired and issued by the holding company for the holding company. Then the majority of the stock in the holding company for the holding company was acquired, and it repeated the operation. My recollection may be a little in error, as I have not looked it up for some time, but I think that process was gone through with five times. In the end a majority of a majority of a majority of a majority controlled the companies which were the only companies earning any money or having a dollar of honest investment. The result was that that great system of railroads was placed in a very distressful condition for a considerable period of time.

I would like to know how the kind of scheme which I have thus outlined would be taxed under this amendment?

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I will state to the Senator that it can not be taxed at all. We all recall the incident to which the Senator from Missouri has just referred. As he has very properly characterized it, it was one of the financial scandals of our country a few years ago. This amendment is intended to permit that sort of thing being done without reference to the value of the properties exchanged at all.

The bill as reported by the committee in the first place was a bill just such as the senior Senator from Utah outlined, a bill just such as the Senator from Indiana [Mr. WATSON] outlined, where you turn over your properties, or practically all of the stock of the corporation, and simply take in exchange the shares of stock of another. That is an innocent transaction.

The committee action, in the first place, I do not think was objectionable, but when they come in now with another amendment, which is not a committee amendment, but is proposed here, as stated, by a majority of the majority of the committee——

Mr. KING. By the "bloc."

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. It may be called the "bloc." I think the "bloc" was referred to yesterday and it was suggested by the Senator from North Dakota that the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LENROOT] ought to be called on to explain this amendment, because he thought it might have come from the "bloc." But it is immaterial where it came from; it is the effect of it that I am considering.

This is not a reorganization or a merger at all. It simply permits the few people who own a majority of the stock, by a freezing-out process, to organize a holding concern, and then the few people who may own the majority of that holding concern to then organize and consolidate with somebody else, and this is to be permitted to be done without inquiring into the value of the stocks exchanged for the purpose of taxation.

Mr. REED. The original stockholder would be as helpless as the Senate finds itself when a majority of the committee meets and permits a "bloc" outside of the committee, which represents a minority of the Senate, to control the majority of the committee and thus undertake to control the whole Senate. We have the transaction illustrated in the method pursued in bringing in this amendment.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I prefer to make my illustration in shares of stock rather than in Senators.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, may I interrupt the Senator?

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I gladly yield to the Senator from Utah.

Mr. KING. I confess to some embarrassment in even attempting to make an inquiry respecting this apparently intricate proposition. But are we not inclined to confuse this proposition with the wrongs which have been done and may be done by corporations in affecting mergers to the disadvantage of minority stockholders? Are we not inclined or liable to confuse this question with the mere question of income tax?

As I understand, the matter under discussion relates to the income tax of individuals. It does not relate to corporate taxes or corporation profits or corporation wrongs or corporation virtues. The question is, If I own stock in a corporation and that corporation is merged with another and I take stock in the merged or partly merged corporation, have I any gain as a result of that transaction for which I should pay an income tax? How am I to determine the gain? Stocks fluctuate.

Suppose the transaction has been consummated and I have received stock in the merged or partly merged company. It may have a fictitious value for a short period following. Then there may be a subsidence to a much lower level. How, in the administration of the law, if the views of the Senator shall prevail—and I am not combating them, but only seeking information—are we to so apply it as to do no injustice to the Government or to the taxpayer? If returns should be required upon the day following the merger, the fictitious value might be very great, far above the level of the true value of the stock, thus resulting in the demand for a heavy tax to be paid by the holder. It is possible that the merger may have eventuated in a decline in the market value of the stocks, so that the owner would have sustained a loss, which would have to be deducted from gains in some other transaction. It occurs to me that in the administration of the law, if it assumes this form, there will be found serious difficulties. Of course, that would not be sufficient reason to adopt a different policy if there were other good and sufficient reasons therefor.

Is not the only other way—and I am asking for information and not by way of expressing an opinion—to treat the transaction just as if there has been no merger, just the same as if the owner's holdings in the merged companies were the same as his holdings in the other company, and if there are any increased dividends in the merged companies then tax him upon the increased income by reason of such augmented dividends?

If the result of the merger is that his dividends are less than they were the year before, then, of course, his taxes are less; in other words, because of the fluctuating, fictitious value that always results from such mergers, how is the Government going to reach it in a rational, intelligent, just way both to the Government and to the taxpayer, other than by waiting until the dividends are declared?

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Mr. President, the analytical mind of the Senator from Utah, I am sure, has a very comprehensive grasp of this subject, but I should like to call his attention to the fact that his argument, I am sure, would carry us very much further than he would be willing to go. If the principle laid down by the Senator is to be accepted as governing all transactions, it would amount to this: That wherever there may be an exchange of property no account should be taken of the value of the property so exchanged. This provision of the proposed law would not give to an individual stockholder owning 100 or 200 shares of stock the right to exchange those shares for 100 or 200 shares of the stock of another corporation without taking into consideration the actual cash value of the stocks, respectively. The bill does not go that far, but it seeks to single out and give a special privilege to those who control a majority of the stock of a corporation.

If it is desired to reorganize a corporation and simply to issue shares of stock of the reorganized corporation, which was, perhaps, reorganized with a new name and with a new capitalization, and was a mere transfer on paper of the interests represented by the property, the Senator is quite right in assuming that there is no use to take that into consideration, and it would not be advisable to do that; but this provision does not propose to go to the extent of affecting all exchanges of property. It singles out the properties where there is a majority control of the stock of a given corporation, which stock may be swapped for the stock of any other corporation, no matter what it is, and not have to make any accounting as to the loss or gain in the transaction.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President——

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Just a moment, please. The stock of the new concern may be worth very much more, or, as the Senator suggested, it may be worth less. But that is perhaps the least vice of the proposition when considered from the standpoint of wholesome legislation that takes care of the tax feature of the matter. By so doing, however, we simply enable the people controlling the majority of the stock to trade it as they see fit without giving the same right to the minority stockholders. If they want to exchange their stock later on they would not have that right, but it would enable those in control of the majority of the stock to treat the minority stockholders as corporations sometimes do treat minority stockholders.

Mr. McCUMBER. Now, Mr. President——

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I yield to the Senator from North Dakota.

Mr. McCUMBER. I think the Senator from New Mexico has made this proposition far more complex than it really is. Let us see if we can not simplify it by a concrete illustration which I think is pertinent.

We will say that one corporation owns 160 acres of land worth $100 an acre, or a total of $16,000. Another corporation owns 100 acres of land worth exactly the same amount per acre; that is, $100 an acre, or a total of $10,000. Another corporation owns 40 acres of land worth $100 an acre, or a total of $4,000. The interests of the three corporations amount in the aggregate to $30,000. Now, the corporations unite and put all of their stock into a new corporation, issuing $30,000 worth of stock to the owners of the land in the proportion of 16, 10, and 4. The Senator from New Mexico would not say that they had either gained or lost by that transaction; they would have exactly the same interest which they previously had; and the Senator would not allow the Treasury Department to say to those stockholders, "You have made a gain even though you have not sold a single acre of the land."

Now, let us carry the illustration a step further and say that the stockholders of the corporation owning the 40 acres will not come into the consolidation, but the other two corporations purchase 51 per cent of the stock of the corporation which owns the 40 acres. Then they have fifty-one one-hundredths of the stock of the corporation owning the 40 acres; that is their interest in that 40 acres of land. All this amendment does is to apply the same rule to those who have purchased that stock, so that they shall not be held to have gained or lost by the issuance of the new stock, because the new stock, even though it represents only fifty-one one-hundredths of the 40 acres, nevertheless exactly measures what they have received, and there is no gain and no loss in the transaction.

Now, let me put a question to the Senator.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Before the Senator from North Dakota does that, I should like to ask him a question.

Mr. McCUMBER. Very well.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. What would be the inducement to the two corporations just referred to by the Senator in his illustration to buy 51 per cent of the stock of the other corporation? Why would they want it?

Mr. McCUMBER. The reason for their action might be that they could operate the three farms together to better advantage; they might think it would be more profitable; but the very fact that they thought that it might be more profitable to do so would not of itself increase the value of the stock. Its real value is increased only when the stockholders are able to sell the new stock for a sum greater than the old stock was worth. If they are able to sell it, and the sale is made, then they pay a tax upon their profits.

Let me carry the illustration a step further, as I was going to do. Suppose the Senator from New Mexico 20 years ago purchased a piece of land for $10,000, and there was another piece of land next to his 20 years ago also worth $10,000. His land has increased in value to $20,000, and so has the other piece of land increased in value to $20,000. He trades one piece of land for the other piece of land. If he does not trade the one piece of land for the other he may not be taxed because the land has become more valuable. Should he therefore be taxed because he trades one piece of land which is worth $20,000 for another piece of land which is worth $20,000?

Under the present law we can do that. We can say to him, "Ten, fifteen, or twenty years ago you only paid $10,000 for that land, whereas you have traded it to-day for a piece of land worth $20,000, although you traded a $20,000 piece of land for another $20,000 piece of land." I do not think the Senator would insist that he should pay a tax on such a transaction.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Mr. President, the Senator multiplies his illustration so that it is somewhat difficult to keep in mind all of them, but let us get back to the first illustration which he gave, where there are three corporations owning three adjoining farms, and the owners of two of those farms think that if they get hold of all three of the farms they would have a more profitable investment. Those controlling two of the corporations are willing to enter into a consolidation, but there is the third farm, which might go into the truck business or some other kind of business in competition with the owners of the first two farms, and so the owners of the two farms say "we want that other farm." They are not able, however, to get all of the stockholders of the corporation which owns the third farm to agree to a consolidation, and so they go out and acquire 51 per cent of its stock. There was some advantage in that transaction or there was not. If there was an advantage in the transaction, if the transaction itself involved any increase in the value of the stock, then it seems to me a tax ought to be paid. But it goes further than that—and it is this point which I wish to emphasize—I do not believe that we ought to encourage that kind of a transaction.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President——

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I yield to the Senator from Nebraska.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I think the Senator from North Dakota has been quite resourceful and ingenious in presenting a case which is not likely to happen. Such consolidations do not occur where men seek to unite real estate; they are brought about in commercial operations in order to get rid of competition. Now, let me present a case to the Senator from New Mexico. Suppose in a city there are three hotels in competition with each other; the capital stock of each amounts to $500,000, but their competition with each other is such that the $500,000 of stock is worth only $300,000; that is, they are only making $30,000 apiece, and their stock, therefore, being on a 10 per cent basis, say, is only worth $300,000. They unite in one corporation.

The owners of the $500,000 of stock in each of the corporations put their shares in at $300,000 and take stock in a $900,000 corporation. By the consolidation they wipe out competition; they are able to raise their rates so that instead of making a profit of $30,000 each, as they formerly did, making a total of $90,000, they are able to make a total profit of $300,000, as would be quite possible. That transaction, that trade of stock, has resulted in immediate profit to those participating in it; and yet I understand the proposition is not to tax that gain, but to wait until the owners of the stock sell the stock, which may be 1 year or 15 years, before they are required to pay a tax upon it.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, will the Senator from New Mexico allow me to ask a question of the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I yield for that purpose.

Mr. McCUMBER. How is it to be known that they have made a profit immediately upon the exchange? That is the basis on which it must be figured. It is a question that is to be determined in the future as to whether they have made a profit. Perhaps at the end of a year they will have made a profit, and perhaps at the end of the year they will have sustained a loss. If they sustain a loss, would the Senator say they should deduct that loss in the payment of their taxes?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Nine-tenths of such commercial transactions are entered into for the purpose of getting rid of detrimental competition. The case I have instanced is not merely a fictitious case, but cases of the kind have actually occurred in towns where hotel ownerships have been consolidated for the purpose of getting rid of unprofitable competition. They have been thereby enabled to raise their rates, and, although they may do no more business in the aggregate than they did previously, by raising their rates they are able to double or treble their profits. That, I repeat, is not an imaginary case, but is one that has occurred frequently, as we know, in the business world; and it seems to me under such circumstances the Government ought to be able to levy a tax upon the gain or profit which the stockholders make on the transfer..

Mr. McCUMBER. Of course, the Government gets a tax out of whatever profits may accrue.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Yes; by way of income tax from year to year.

Mr. McCUMBER. If there are any profits, the Government, of course, derives revenue; but the question whether the individual shall make a profit depends entirely on future business. The individual does not know at the time he makes the exchange whether it is going to result in a gain or a loss. If he sells and makes a profit, of course, he is taxed upon that profit.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President, of course the individual does not know it. Sometimes individuals make mistakes; but should you not leave the administration of the Department of Internal Revenue to find out whether he has made a profit, and tax him on it if he has, and are you not preventing that very thing?

Mr. WATSON of Indiana. Mr. President, how in the world do you propose to find that out?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. If you find that he is now making 20 per cent on his investment, and formerly made 5, it does not take any argument to demonstrate that he has made a profit.

Mr. McCUMBER. But the Senator forgets that if he has made a profit or a loss he makes it when he makes a sale, and you must figure it at that time. That is the time when you are to determine whether or not he made a profit—when he sells.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. But you do not figure your tax on him until the following year. You have plenty of time to find out whether or not he has made a profit. If he has been getting a much greater return, you find that he has increased his principal, and that is profit.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, if the Senator from New Mexico will pardon me——

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I think I will yield the floor.

Mr. REED. I do not desire to have the Senator yield the floor; but the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. McCUMBER] makes the argument that in the case of a consolidation you can not ascertain the profits that have been made. He says, "How are you going to ascertain the profit?" Well, how are you going to ascertain it in the case of an exchange of real estate between two individuals? They swap even, but one of them made $10,000 in the transaction. The Government ascertains that now. It ascertains it under this bill. If you can do it in that case, you can do it in the other case.

I do not want to take the Senator from New Mexico off his feet. I understand that the Senator had concluded.

Mr. President, I do not think we need to go outside of well-known facts to get to the kernel of this matter. As was well said by the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. HITCHCOCK], we need not deal with real estate transactions. We can take transactions which occur very frequently in the consolidation of great companies, and that is the very kind of company with which this clause proposes to deal; for the excuse offered for changing the language of the present law, which requires substantially all of the stockholders to be participants in the consolidation, to language which requires only a majority of the stock, is that the very great corporations have their stock widely scattered, and hence it can not all be gathered up. So we may as well understand now, when we consider this question, that it is proposed to apply to very large corporations, and to permit their consolidation tax free, although enormous profits may be immediately realized to the corporations by virtue of the consolidation, and thereby the stockholders be immediately benefited.

Let us take an illustration which I do not choose in order to make an appeal to anybody's prejudice or feeling, but an actual illustration, nevertheless—the organization of what is known as the Steel Trust. A large number of independent steel companies existed. They were highly competitive, and, being highly competitive, their profits were moderate. It was desired to wipe out that competition in order that the stockholders of the corporations might be benefited thereby. Accordingly, they proceeded to the organization of one very large company with an enormous capital, and they took in these independent companies, giving them stock in the large company. The actual values going into that concern, as I remember the figures, were probably less than $750,000,000 of property; but they issued stock for approximately two billions of property in one form or another, either by carrying the subsidiary stock or by a direct issue. Whether or not my figures are exactly accurate will make no difference in the illustration. The stockholders in the various companies entering into the consolidation received that new and largely inflated stock issue, an issue far above the physical values of the property which had been put in. That stock was issued to represent the new value which had been added by virtue of the fact that competition had been wiped out. There was no longer any danger of an industrial war or a market war between these companies. They could fix their own prices, control the market, and be certain of having no future losses and of always making a profit.

Did that add to the value of the stock which these individual holders in the small companies had exchanged? Manifestly it did, or the transaction would not have taken place; and it added enormously to that value. It is a well-known fact that this transaction was regarded as so profitable that Andrew Carnegie was paid $100,000,000 more for his property than the valuation he had placed upon it only a short time before, and he took his pay very largely in the securities of the new company. Am I right in regard to its being $100,000,000, or was it a larger sum? I may have my figures very much too low. He took that profit partly in the shape of the bonds which were issued to him in that case and partly in stock; and it is those very bonds which have constituted a large part of the great fortune which he distributed as benefactions of various kinds.

Now, it is proposed that that sort of transaction can take place; that there shall be no ascertainment of the profits made and taxed to these people at the time of the consolidation; that the Government shall wait for its taxes until the various shareholders in these coroporations may have sold their stock and realized a profit; and now how will you discover whether or not they have made a profit? You are at once confronted with the fact that they only exchanged stock for stock, or bonds for bonds, or stock and bonds for stock and bonds; so that if they afterwards sell their new stock, who shall say that the new stock is of any more value to them than the old stock was which they put into the new concern? Manifestly the Government must ascertain that by some process. So that the question raised here that you can not ascertain the profits at the time the transaction takes place confronts you in the same manner when you seek to ascertain the profits at the time the individual stockholder may sell his stock; and there is, therefore, in my humble judgment, nothing whatever in that argument. Indeed, as suggested by the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. HITCHCOCK], it is easier to determine at the time the transaction takes place whether there has been a profit than it is to determine 10 years afterwards whether there was a profit made in the exchange of this stock.

Mr. BROUSSARD. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me for a question?

Mr. REED. Certainly.

Mr. BROUSSARD. On page 11, I call the attention of the Senator from Missouri to the fact that section (c) says:

> But even if the property received in exchange has a readily realizable market value, no gain or loss shall be recognized.

And then it proceeds to the consideration of the question under discussion.

Mr. REED. Yes.

Mr. BROUSSARD. So that even if there were a gain, the Government would not attempt to collect it.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, if the Senator will allow me right there, so that we may understand exactly what we are trying to get at, suppose that I have stock in a corporation. That stock is exchanged, by vote of the corporation or a majority of it, by a reorganization, and I receive new stock. If I should sell that stock to-day it might sell, by reason of the reorganization, for several points above what it sold for before; but I have not sold it. I still own it. I do not intend to sell it. I intend to keep it, and I do keep it. Perhaps I could have gotten a profit of 20 points to-day. But can the Government come in and tax me for a profit on a thing on which I have not received a dollar, on the assumption that it is worth more—a mere paper profit—when possibly at the time when I do sell it, perhaps a year from now, as in the case of some stock that the Senator has mentioned, it may have gone down, so that I will have a loss of 20 or 30 points instead of a gain?

Mr. REED. Mr. President, that—and I say it respectfully, of course—is a mere argument upon one possible phase of this matter. Let me proceed from the point I was discussing. I am trying to get at the facts. The fact is, now, that although—and I will use his name, and I use it respectfully and kindly; he has passed into the great beyond—Mr. Carnegie sold his properties at an advance of more than $100,000,000 over and above what he had asked but a short time before, and obtained that price for the stocks and bonds of the Steel Trust, because they had to have his property in order to complete the transaction, and to have their combination powerful enough so that it could control prices, and although that fact was ascertainable and knowable at the time, under this scheme of taxation no tax would have been levied on Mr. Carnegie, and if he afterwards gave the property away to the public, or in any other way disposed of it to any kind of an eleemosynary institution he might set up, like the Carnegie Institution, it would go tax free.

Bearing in mind that this is intended to apply to these great institutions which are consolidated, and bearing in mind that the Senator from North Dakota is absolutely right when he says that the stock may be held, and in fact that the stock is to be held, by the large stockholders, it comes to this, that a consolidation may be effected, and the large stockholders may make an actual profit by virtue of that consolidation of many million dollars, and not pay a dollar of taxation upon their profit thus realized, because it happens to be represented in certificates of stock, until and unless, at some time in the distant future, they may sell the stock; in which event, if they realize a profit then, it can be ascertained and charged.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President——

Mr. REED. Please let me conclude the point. The difference is at once observable. If the individual sells property which he owns as an individual, and makes money, he must pay, and pay now; but if a consolidation is effected by the masters of these great institutions, and they can hold their stock, no matter how much they make, they pay nothing, until ultimately, at some time in the future they may sell their stock, and it is very difficult then to ascertain what their profits may be.

Mr. McLEAN. Mr. President——

Mr. REED. I will yield in a moment to any question. I want to conclude this.

This bill proposes to make that sort of a transaction all the easier, and to say that the law, instead of applying, as it did originally, to an actual reorganization of the same corporation, in which event a man simply took down a different share of stock for his original share, it shall now apply if a majority of the stock is carried into the consolidation.

I am only repeating what the Senator from New Mexico [Mr. JONES] said so well when I add to what I have tried to say that in that case any corporation which can start out and acquire 51 per cent of the stock of another corporation can make a consolidation, however large and however profitable, and do it tax free.

In other words, we are getting away from the proposition which was originally in the bill, that if corporation A wanted to reorganize itself for some purpose it should be permitted to do so without paying a tax, and we are proposing to apply that to the organization of great trusts and combinations, and to give them that advantage, and to give it to them, not when they have acquired all of the stock and paid off all the minority stockholders and settled with them, so that the Government gets its money on that transaction, if it is coming, but to give them this advantage when they have simply acquired a majority control. The bill is distinctly in favor of the creation of great trusts and combinations, and I say that in my judgment it is an unsound proposition.

Now I yield to the Senator from Connecticut.

Mr. McLEAN. Mr. President, it seems to me that if we apply this to the reorganization of corporations the same principle would have to apply to any private transaction. Suppose, for instance, the Senator from Missouri had a Cremona violin, and suppose he did not know anything about music and knew nothing about the value of that violin and should sell it to somebody for $5. The person to whom he sells it may know all about it, and he may be able to make $500 a night out of the use of that violin. He ought to be taxed not on the value of the violin, but on the income which may result later on.

A man may have a patent right and not know its value at the time he sells it, but in the hands of the vendee it may produce enormous profits. All those profits, of course, are taxed, and if he sells it when its value is known it is taxed.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I think I can show the Senator where the distinction lies. I do not care to follow the violin illustration, because I think it is quite a distance from the real point in argument.

Suppose that corporation A has $100,000 of stock and $50,000 of surplus. All of the assets of that corporation belong to the stockholders. It sees fit then to reorganize and call itself by some other name, perhaps to broaden its powers a little and to issue stock for a hundred and fifty thousand dollars where it had a hundred thousand dollars before and give the proportionate amount of the stock to each of its stockholders. They still have the same interest in the same property, and the Government should take nothing from them. But if corporation A sells itself and all its assets to corporation B then the stockholders in corporation A, making a profit, must pay their taxes. That we will all agree to.

Suppose that corporation A, instead of selling itself outright to corporation B, sells its interest in corporation A to corporation B, which has taken in four or five other corporations, and gets the cash. But suppose that instead of getting the cash, stock is issued. What is that stock? It is stock in an entirely new thing, stock in an entirely new corporation, which takes in a lot of new elements of value. It partakes of the nature of a sale, and not of the nature of an exchange of property.

Let us see about it. These things are difficult to make plain, particularly when one is trying to reason them out on his feet. I will go back to my steel corporation illustration. If Mr. Carnegie had seen fit to organize Carnegie's Steel Corporation No. 2, and had taken over into that the property of corporation No. 1, and issued back to the shareholders shares in corporation No. 2, it would have been merely an exchange of evidences of ownership, for that is what a share is. But suppose he put his corporation into a new corporation that had taken in 20 other concerns, and instead of cash for his corporation took stock in the new corporation which represented 20 concerns. He has, in fact, sold his concern for stock in a new concern, and it is just as much a sale as though he had sold it for cash and afterwards gone and bought stock in the new concern.

The trouble with this arrangement as you have it figured out now, Senators, is that you are dealing with a transaction which is, in fact, more of a sale than an exchange—as though it were an exchange. It is, in fact, a sale, and should be treated as a sale, and if there have been profits made by that sale, then those profits should be ascertained and taxed.

Mr. SIMMONS obtained the floor.

Mr. McLEAN. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from North Carolina yield to the Senator from Connecticut?

Mr. SIMMONS. I yield.

Mr. McLEAN. I simply wanted to suggest to the Senator from Missouri that it seems to me he fails to recognize the fact that the increase in the capital value is entirely due to the anticipated increase in price, due to a possible monopoly which may be created. The same thing would result in the event there were no reorganization, provided three or four or five companies might silently agree to raise their prices to a certain point. The additional capital value would result to each one of these single institutions, although there was no reorganization at all. The increase in capital value is based upon the anticipated profits which are to be received because of this silent agreement.

You can not go back and tax any one of those single institutions on an increase in capital value, in the event it should sell basing that increase on anticipated profits.

Mr. REED. That is not involved in the transaction at all.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, I have not taken the floor for the purpose of discussing the controverted features of the amendment, but for the purpose of saying that I have reached the conclusion that in the position I impliedly took in the inquiry I made of the Senator from New Mexico I was in error, and I think it is due the Senate that I should say that. I did not take into consideration at the time I made that statement some subsequent sections of the bill which have been called to my attention and which I think cover the point I had in mind at the time.

Mr. PENROSE and Mr. WATSON of Georgia addressed the Chair.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Pennsylvania.

Mr. PENROSE. I hope we can get a vote on this amendment.

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Pennsylvania yield to the Senator from Georgia?

Mr. PENROSE. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

So Mr. MCCUMBER'S amendment to the amendment of the committee was agreed to.

Mr. PENROSE. Mr. President, the amendment to the committee amendment having been adopted as a matter of form, I now ask to have the committee amendment agreed to as amended.

Mr. REED rose.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the committee amendment as amended.

Mr. REED. I have no objection to that.

Mr. PENROSE. I did not suppose so. It is only a matter of form.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. If there be no objection, the committee amendment, as amended, is agreed to.

Mr. REED. I desire to reserve, and do reserve, this entire proposition for a separate vote in the Senate.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, on yesterday the Senate adopted an amendment which was proposed by the senior Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE] in relation to the taxation of foreign corporations which, as I view it, if the amendment were concurred in by the Senate, would practically render nugatory the so-called China incorporation act.

Mr. PENROSE. Will the Senator permit me to make a suggestion at that point?

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Certainly.

Mr. PENROSE. I call the Senator's attention to the fact that some 20 Republicans were absent from the Chamber when the amendment to which he refers was adopted.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I was painfully aware of that fact, Mr. President, and I am glad to have it accentuated by the Senator from Pennsylvania.

This morning I received from Mr. J. B. Powell, who is secretary of the American Chamber of Commerce in China, at Shanghai, a letter in relation to the taxation of China corporations, inclosing a memorandum by the foreign-commerce department of the Chamber of Commerce of the United States, which sets out the claims of these chambers of commerce as to why foreign corporations of the United States should be exempted from taxation. I should like to have this communication printed in the RECORD.

Mr. PENROSE. I should like to have the communication read.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. It is quite a lengthy document. I do not ask for its reading, although I have no objection to the Senator from Pennsylvania having it read.

Mr. PENROSE. I ask to have it read. It relates to a very important subject.

Mr. President, this gives me an opportunity to call attention to the fact that questions of paramount importance involved in the pending bill are being decided by the apparent indifference and absence of a large number of Senators. I can not accentuate that fact before the Senate and the country more emphatically than I now do.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Is it not a fact that, while there may have been 20 Republican Senators absent on the occasion to which the Senator from Pennsylvania has referred, there were 11 Republicans present who voted against the Senator's amendment?

Mr. PENROSE. That may be.

I desire, Mr. President, to refer to another situation which constitutes an abuse. We call for a quorum; we obtain a quorum; and immediately the Chamber is emptied and the debate goes on for an interminable length of time with about five Members of the minority and six Members of the majority party present in the Chamber. The condition well merits comment and condemnation.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will read the communication presented by the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. BRANDEGEE] as requested by the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. PENROSE].

The reading clerk read as follows:

AMERICAN CHAMBER OF COMMERCE OF CHINA.

HOTEL WASHINGTON,
Washington, D. C., October 20, 1921.

HON. FRANK B. BRANDEGEE,
The United States Senate, the Senate Chamber.

DEAR SENATOR: We are inclosing herewith a pamphlet issued by the Chamber of Commerce of the United States which explains the status of American business in China from the standpoint of taxation exemption in relation to our competition with the British.

In this pamphlet you will find an authoritative statement from the American Chamber in China regarding the three forms of British corporations that operate in China and the methods which the British Government has adopted in exempting these firms from taxation. It should be understood that the great proportion of British business in China is conducted from the British colony of Hongkong, which is British territory located just off the coast of China. All British firms that maintain headquarters in Hongkong or under British extraterritorial protection at Shanghai are exempted from the operation of the income and excess-profits taxation of Great Britain. It is these firms that Americans in China must compete with rather than with the home British company, with headquarters in London, which does pay the British income and other taxes.

The statement which has been made to the effect that the British Government has permitted the development in the Far East of a system of business which is beyond the power of the home Government to tax is, in our opinion, erroneous. The British merchant in China is fully within reach of the British Government and is subject to British law. In its farsighted trade plan, the British Government has seen fit to exempt its trader in China from the home taxes, believing doubtless that Great Britain will gain more from the trade in keeping her home factories in operation than through placing burdensome restrictions upon trade operations that are conducted wholly outside of the home country.

Since this matter has been referred to in the Senate in connection with the consideration of the general revenue act, we hope that the foregoing information may be of some service to you.

With best wishes, I am,

Very truly, yours, J. B. POWELL.

AMERICAN COMPANIES IN CHINA ASK FEDERAL INCORPORATION AND TAX EXEMPTION.

FOREIGN COMMERCE DEPARTMENT,
CHAMBER OF COMMERCE OF THE UNITED STATES,
Washington, D. C.

Americans engaged in business locally in China are asking Congress for legislation which will enable them to incorporate and conduct business as American companies on a basis similar to that open to companies made up and controlled by British business men. There are two points which Americans most familiar with the situation in China regard as essential: First, the Federal Government should authorize the privilege of Federal incorporation, and second, American enterprises operating locally in China should be exempt from the payment of American income and excess-profits taxes.

NEED FOR FEDERAL INCORPORATION AND TAX EXEMPTION.

Federal incorporation is sought in order that companies made up and managed by Americans, in which more than 50 per cent of the enterprise is controlled by American capital, may operate under a single set of clearly understood requirements. For the success of a China business it is often advantageous to encourage Chinese capital to come into the corporation with American capital. In order to gain the confidence of the Chinese investor and of the Chinese business men who may enter into contractual relations with the corporation, it is regarded as most important that companies should operate under a single set of known requirements rather than under the varying regulations of the individual States. It is urged further that control of such companies should be strictly by Americans and that legislation enabling Federal incorporation should be of such a character as to keep these enterprises conducted on a high plane of organization and business integrity. State incorporation has been greatly abused by certain companies, State incorporated, which have conducted operations in China without any substantial American supervision or restraint.

The second point, exemption from Federal and State income taxes and excess-profits taxes on such corporations, is of very immediate importance. American companies are meeting with hard competition in China, especially from British companies, for British laws have recognized the special requirements of the China situation and made it possible for British companies operating in China to do so without paying corporate taxes in England. American companies are at a distinct disadvantage in competition with such British companies, and apparently are at a similar disadvantage in comparison with French companies and Japanese companies.

THREE FORMS OF BRITISH INCORPORATION.

In testifying before the Committee on Ways and Means of the House of Representatives in Washington, D. C., January 17, Mr. C. L. Seitz, special delegate representing the American Chamber of Commerce of China at Shanghai, who has had wide experience in corporate business in China, filed the following statement on this subject:

"There are three recognized forms of British company operation applying to trade in the Far East, viz:

"1. A 'British company' is generally accepted to mean a company with its head office in England, incorporated under the laws of Great Britain, and operating in China through a branch office there. Such a company is subject to British income tax on the profits earned by the branch in China and remitted to England.

"NOTE.—Companies in China so operated are notably the Alfred Holt, or 'Blue Funnel' steamship interests, the P. & O. S. S. Co., and the Chartered Bank of India, Australia, and China. [Few purely local British companies operate on this basis.]

"2. A 'Hongkong-China company' means a company incorporated under the Hongkong company's ordinances, which may carry on some part of its business within the territory of China, but is directed and controlled by a head office in the colony of Hongkong.

"3. A 'British-China company' means a company incorporated under the Hongkong company's ordinances doing business within the territory of China and registered with the registrar of British-China companies at Shanghai, where the head offices of such companies are usually located.

"In the operation of a 'Hongkong-China company' or of a 'British-China company' there is no burden imposed in the form of income or excess-profits taxation. The only charge made by the British authorities is a fee to the registrar which is based on a sliding scale up to $300 annually.

"Up to the 31st of December, 1915, all British companies operating in Hongkong or China were known as 'Hongkong-China' companies. Apparently the possibility arose that the British colony of Hongkong might become subject to income taxation. It was then arranged by the British Government, in protection of British trade in China, to make a distinction between 'Hongkong-China' companies and 'British-China' companies. The principle involved was simply that while it would be justifiable to tax companies doing their principal business and having their head office in the colony of Hongkong it would not be policy to tax British companies operating solely in China, on the theory that such companies, having no representation, could not properly be made subject to taxation.

"Regulations for the separation of 'Hongkong-China' companies and 'British-China' companies were published on the 17th of December, 1915, and came into force on the 1st of January, 1916.

"Eventually income taxation was not enforced on 'Hongkong-China' companies, so that to-day neither the 'Hongkong-China' companies nor the 'British-China' companies registered at Shanghai with the British registrar of companies there are taxed.

"French companies in China are not taxed in trade there. No special laws seem to have been framed covering French incorporation of companies for operation in China, but it is positively known that under French consular regulations French companies do operate in China free from income or excess-profits taxation. Japanese companies operating in China are placed in the same position as the French companies, in that no special laws seem to exist giving such companies freedom from income taxation, but it is definitely known that Japanese companies do not pay taxes on their profits in China. In this connection Mr. Julean Arnold, commercial attaché to the American legation at Peking, makes a positive statement in his evidence given on August 8, 1920, at Shanghai, China, and published in 'Hearings, Committee on the Judiciary, House of Representatives, on H. R. 7204, serial 13, part 2,' page 39, paragraph 3, in which he states:

"'The Japanese meet this situation, in order to encourage their nationals in trade and in other enterprise in China, by stipulating that in lieu of Government taxes Japanese corporations in business in China may expend the equivalent in purchases of real estate in that country.'"

BRITISH LAW EXCLUDES AMERICAN MANAGEMENT.

This matter became acute in 1920 through a British order in council of 1919, which came into force March 15, 1920. Prior to that time a number of companies, American controlled and American managed, in China had operated under the British laws, but the changes in the order in council made it necessary for management and control of all such companies to be in the hands of British subjects. Americans in China had previously urged the need for American legislation which would enable American companies to operate as such rather than to be forced to incorporate under the British laws to be on an equal footing of competition with British and other companies. The present status of the British laws makes it impossible for American companies longer to do business under the British requirements.

PECULIAR REQUIREMENTS OF THE CHINA SITUATION.

Some opposition to the proposal to exempt American-China companies from Federal taxation has been voiced on the ground that Americans doing business in China would thereby be receiving favors which Americans in no other foreign country could enjoy. The Americans in China, however, claim that as a matter of fact they simply want to be put on a basis of equal competition with other foreigners in China and that Federal legislation is necessary because of the peculiar nature of the laws of China and the existence of extraterritorial court jurisdiction there. For example, if a group of Americans in France get together and organize a corporation for doing business in France, the chances are that they will incorporate as a French company under French law. The corporate entity being French, the corporation is subject to French taxation requirements, but although all the shareholders of the corporation are Americans, the corporation as such does not have to pay corporation taxes in the United States. French corporations made up of British subjects or any other foreigners are on the same basis. In China, however, Chinese laws are not regarded as adequate to enable corporate conduct of business under them. There are British courts, French courts, Japanese courts, and American courts in which individuals or corporations of British, French, Japanese, or American nationality may be used. If a group of Americans in China form a corporation for China business—and are forced by the inadequacy of Chinese law to obtain American incorporation—they ask why such a corporation, doing a local business in China, should be subject to American taxes any more than a corporation made up of Americans doing a local business in France or any other foreign country.

Americans have spent a great deal of money and a large number of Americans have spent many years of their lives in building up American trade in China. Without the support of the United States Government in putting them on a basis of competitive equality with merchants of British and other nationality they are now facing ruinous competition. They want ease of operation and competitive conditions that will enable them to attract Chinese capital to operate with them to assure the success of their enterprises.

PRINCIPLES APPROVED BY DEPARTMENT COMMITTEE.

The American Chamber of Commerce in China has carried on active propaganda among chambers of commerce in the United States to get support for these contentions. The foreign commerce department of the Chamber of Commerce of the United States has considered this matter from various angles and has taken testimony from Americans actively engaged in business in China. At its meeting in New York December 15, 1920, the department committee gave its approval to the two following principles:

"(1) American companies formed primarily for China business and operating in China should be given the privilege of Federal incorporation in order that they may have a standing as American companies, under a single set of legal requirements and regulations, which it has been difficult for them to get and maintain when operating under the laws of the individual States, the requirements of which vary and are not generally known in China.

"(2) Such American-China companies, so far as taxation is concerned, should be placed on an equal footing with the companies of other competing countries."

In substance this second recommendation means the recognition of American-China companies as quite distinct from American companies operating in and from the United States and as entitled to exemption from the taxation requirements applicable to such companies domiciled in the United States.

In the opinion of the members of the foreign commerce department committee the filing and recording of articles of incorporation and the recording of certificates relating to the corporation should be made available locally in China where there is a United States court.

A number of different bills have been introduced in Congress with these general purposes in view. There is a wide variation in the requirements and terms of such bills, and the foreign commerce department committee of the chamber has deemed it more important to go on record on the matters of principle rather than to attempt to go into the various provisions of a number of separate bills.

C. D. SNOW,
Manager Foreign Commerce Department.

FEBRUARY 5, 1921.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, in view of the rule that the Public Printer has adopted that unless the Senate orders otherwise all such matters as this will be printed in that small, microscopic type which can not be read, I ask that the Public Printer be instructed to set up this matter in the regular type of the RECORD.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. President, I do not intend to delay the Senate about this matter. It has been passed on once by the Senate, and may come up again, and that is my only justification for saying anything.

Mr. President, that is an able plea for special privilege which has just been read from the desk. The most vicious things in any system of taxation are the exemptions from taxation, as a rule. It is rarely that you may find a just exemption from taxation. All taxation is hard. All taxation is unpopular. All taxation is difficult, but it may be just. Its only justification at all is that the Government must have the money, and that it is justly and fairly distributed. If it is a tax on wealth, it should be justly distributed in proportion to wealth, without exempting special classes from the burden of taxation. If it is taxation on consumption that must go to the masses of the people, the only justice in levying that tax is to distribute it far and wide, so that every man bears his just share of the burden.

I listened for many years to arguments in favor of this man or that corporation being exempted from the burden of taxation. They are like all special pleaders; they always have a special cause, a special ground, present their case ably, and as a rule behind the special plea stalks in the shadow the real person or corporation that is going to get the benefit of the exemption.

This argument is all being made on the basis that at the point of contact we should exempt the American taxpayer from the burden of taxation because he has to meet the contact of foreign trade; but under the terms of the amendments that are offered the exemption will apply to more men at home who are doing business in the regular channels of business to-day than it will at the point of contact.

That article sounds well when you read it; but Hongkong is like all other British possessions. More than a hundred years ago, after the Revolutionary War in this country, the British Government realized that it could not tax its colonies and the people that lived in its colonies, and since that time it has not done so. Taxation in the colonies is local taxation. No taxes for the British Government are levied in Canada, none in the Bermuda Isles, although the great British battleships lay off those isles for the protection of the people there. None of their taxes go to the British Crown, and there are no British taxes, of course, in Hongkong; but I think, if you would investigate the question further, you would find that the British corporation that is doing business in Hongkong is owned to a large extent, as a rule, by British subjects living in the British Isles, and that when the profits of those corporations come to be distributed they go back to the British Isles and are subject to taxation, as a rule.

I did not intend to delay the Senate, but I think this is all specious argument. It is an effort to secure exemption from taxation by people who want special privilege, when the only justice in a bill of this kind is to distribute the burden equitably and evenly and to make as few exemptions as possible.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, I want to say to the Senator from Alabama and to the Senate that not being a member of the Finance Committee I am not at all expert on their general scheme for the exemption to any particular extent of foreign corporations, so called—corporations in the foreign trade—and I am not discussing that question. I have not even made up my mind on the wisdom of the policy of exempting these China trade corporations about which we are now talking. That matter was not discussed in our committee at all, because, as I said yesterday, the Finance Committee requested us to let them formulate a general policy on that subject. It does seem to me, however, that if we hope to have trade with China it is going to be very difficult for us to compete with the corporations whose governments do exempt them, if they do.

It may be, as the Senator from Alabama says, though I have no information upon the subject, that in some way or other the profits of the British China trade corporations, when they are distributed to their ultimate owners, are taxed in the hands of those owners; and I am not prepared to say that if it should prove to be the policy of this Government to exempt from taxation to a certain extent our corporations trading with China we might not reach and tax the profits of those corporations when they were ultimately distributed here. My purpose in putting that article into the RECORD was, inasmuch as the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE] on Wednesday made a very able speech in opposition to this proposal, that both sides of this question should be in the RECORD for the information of such Senators as were interested in the subject.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, as I understand the Senator from Connecticut, he is offering this document here as an argument in favor of some special arrangement to meet an exceptional situation in China, and not as an argument in favor of the general exemption of domestic corporations from taxation upon their earnings in foreign countries.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. The Senator is entirely correct. I want to say that I agree most heartily with the general statement of the Senator from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] that everybody is trying, by all sorts of specious arguments, all the time to make it appear that he occupies a special place and should be exempted from taxation. I have no sympathy at all with that sort of claim. I do think, however, that if our business men and if our Government want to develop oriental trade in a country like China, which is almost without the kind of laws and corporation mechanism that we know as being necessary to modern commerce, we ought to consider pretty carefully whether we will not have to place capital and those who own it in as favorable a position as possible to compete in China with the capital of Great Britain and France and other continental nations. I know nothing about the wisdom or the governmental policy of doing this. I must confess that I was surprised when I found that the British did exempt their concerns from taxation; but China is an exceptional place.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. If the Senator will allow me, they do not exempt their concerns from taxation. If this were a British concern dealing in Hongkong it would be taxed; Hongkong is recognized as a separate entity, as Canada is, and a corporation there pays the taxes to the government of Hongkong. It does not pay on the home income, but it is not exempt entirely from taxation. It is only the Hongkong corporation which gets the benefit of that.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I know it. But when I say a British corporation, I mean those corporations existing under the so-called Hongkong orders. It is a British colony there. We have a peculiar position in China of extraterritoriality, as the Senator knows, and we have an American court sitting in China and doing business there. All I mean is that if it be ascertained before we finish the debate—not on this bill but on the China corporation bill—that there is a proposal to put any sort of a tax-exemption feature into that bill we must find out exactly to what extent the British and other nations exempt their corporations, or the stockholders in their corporations, engaged in this China trade before we can act intelligently upon it; and then we will have to decide whether we will try to put ours on the same basis, so that they can compete; we shall have to decide whether it is necessary to do so.

From some remarks made by the distinguished Chinese gentleman from whom the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE] quoted Wednesday, it would appear that he claims it is not necessary for us to be put upon the same plane with other nations in the competition for the China trade. But all those are questions about which most of us know very little, and, of course, before we put into the China trade or corporation act any tax-exemption provision we must know what we are about and act as we think is for the best interests of this Government.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I have not favored the proposition to grant Federal charters to corporations to engage in foreign trade. The Federal Government ought not to grant charters for private enterprises. Indeed, in my opinion, there is no authority vested in the Federal Government to create corporations to engage in purely private business. Of course, corporations may be organized by Congress to engage in governmental activities. There are individuals who are desirous of obtaining the advantages which they believe will result from operating under Federal charters. Aside from the prestige which follows a Federal charter, many believe it will protect corporations so engaged from any form of control by the States.

I can not accept the view that those who desire to engage in foreign trade and commerce should be clothed with Federal authority and enjoy the benefits—if such there be—of a national incorporation. The States have full authority to deal with corporations; and every State in the Union has enacted broad and liberal provisions for the organization of corporations. If persons desire to engage in any form of business in China and wish to conduct their business as a corporation, there can be no objection; but let them avail themselves of State laws. Every State in the Union contains statutes authorizing the formation of corporations for such enterprises. It is clear that the purpose of those desiring Federal charters is to escape taxation and to represent to the world that they are operating as a corporation organized by the Government of the United States. They believe that such an announcement would give them a higher standing and greater prestige in their business activities than if they were incorporated under the laws of a sovereign State of the Union.

Of course, it is desirable that our foreign trade and commerce should expand. The prosperity of the United States is in part dependent upon our foreign trade. The Democratic Party has always believed that commerce produced wealth, that the isolation of nations was inimical to growth and progress. The members of that party have always contended for a foreign policy that would enlarge foreign trade and commerce. Recent events have confirmed the wisdom of Democratic policies. It is apparent, even to the most unsophisticated, that the prosperity of our agriculturalists and, indeed, of our manufacturing industries, is indissolubly connected with the prosperity of other nations. We must find markets for our surplus products and for our raw materials. This Nation produces hundreds of millions of dollars worth of surplus agricultural products every year. Our manufacturing plants can supply not only our domestic wants but can annually export products of the value of billions of dollars.

No country in the world is so rich in raw materials as is this Republic. The world is not a water-tight compartment organism, but there is an interdependence among individuals and nations. The oceans vanish and nations are drawn together, and science and the genius of men contribute to the unification in spirit, if not in fact, of peoples of diverse race, language, and thought.

Even the most reactionary and provincial are clamoring for foreign markets. Those high protectionists who have advocated a tariff wall to cut us off from other nations are now insisting that our prosperity is dependent upon the finding of markets for our surplus products. The eyes of the American people are being lifted to a wider horizon and they are beginning to think internationally and to see that all peoples and nations must be friends if not allies, and must shape their legislation and their international policies so that not only the thoughts but the products of nations may be the inheritance of other nations.

We have been discussing China and the steps to be taken in order to secure oriental trade. I have upon a number of occasions called attention to the fact that there were 1,000,000,000 people living in the Orient. The nations in the Orient are not bankrupt as are the nations in Europe. While the wants of the orientals are much less than those of the Europeans, nevertheless, India, China, Japan, and Siberia can absorb hundreds of millions annually of American products. The Pacific and the Orient will prove to be theaters not only of national but international importance in the coming years. We will find in a developing Siberia markets for our steel products as well as many other commodities produced in this country. Japan and China and India can absorb American products of the value not only of hundreds of millions but billions of dollars. If we act with wisdom and equity and justice the Orient will be drawn to us, and it will materially contribute to our economic and industrial development.

The discussion respecting China challenges attention in an acute way to the wrongs which have been inflicted upon that unhappy land. European nations have sought to dismember China, or at least to destroy her solidarity. She has been divided so that various European nations have not only spheres of influence therein but exercise potential and, indeed, actual power. It may be said that China has been the subject of exploitation by European nations and that Japan has sought to obtain exclusive commercial and political influence in various Provinces of northern China. There should be no further exploitation of China; and those nations that have secured special advantages and privileges ought to make reparation and join in the rehabilitation of China. In all relations existing between China and other nations the latter should seek the welfare of the Chinese people.

This country occupies a most advantageous position with respect to the Chinese people. America has been regarded by them as a modern knight-errant—a great and altruistic force in the world which has sought to protect a helpless people and to restore to them rights and authority if not territory of which they claim to have been deprived. America has been regarded as the steadfast friend of China. Our Nation remitted the Boxer indemnity and in many ways demonstrated its profound interest in the welfare of the Chinese people. The coming conference which will convene in Washington on the 11th of next month will afford an opportunity for this Nation to renew its assurances of deep solicitude for the future of China.

The time has come when there must be a square deal for China and her people. They must no longer be the subjects of exploitation; and the United States must demonstrate in the future as in the past that its oriental policy not only demands the open door in China but calls for an intelligent, sympathetic, and just treatment of all questions relating to the welfare of the Chinese people.

Senators have devoted considerable discussion to the method of extending our trade in the Orient and have contended that in the fierce competition that exists and will perhaps become intensified the American business men are at a disadvantage in China and can not compete with Europeans who are engaged in Chinese trade. Generally speaking, the American business men for many years were content with the home market and did not push their activities into foreign lands. Great Britain, Canada, and Germany, without any particular efforts on our part, became the purchasers of a large part of our surplus products. The greater part of our foreign exports for many years were agricultural products and certain raw materials. Only in recent years have American business men begun to see not only the importance but the necessity of finding world markets for American products. We have not given that intensive study to foreign trade and commerce which other nations have done, and many of our business men have exhibited but little zeal and very imperfect judgment in their treatment of the matter. If we do not increase our world trade we are alone at fault.

In every continent and in nearly every land the people earnestly want American products. They want our trade; they want to buy the things which we produce, and are willing to pay for the same with the things which they produce. Most of the nations have been drained of their metallic money and therefore can pay for American products which they desire but a small part of the value thereof in gold. If we adopt a policy of excluding foreign imports, obviously we shall erect barriers which will prevent American exports.

Trade is reciprocal, and if we build up a great export trade it can only be done by our importing foreign products. The world is not suffering from overproduction; the world to-day is hungry and millions are dying from cold and hunger. The people of the world need not only all our surplus products but they could consume our production if it were trebled or quadrupled. The business men of the United States must, if they desire to expand their foreign trade, formulate broad and liberal plans. They must meet in a sympathetic way the peoples with whom they desire to deal; banking facilities must be provided and arrangements made to meet the demoralized exchange situation now existing. Generally speaking, we have not met the foreigner in our business dealings in the sympathetic and liberal spirit which has characterized the Germans and other European nationals in their foreign business activities. I have talked with many of our ministers and commercial representatives who have been abroad, and the testimony is almost uniform to the effect that American business houses have not shown that sagacity, that tolerance, that wisdom and business skill that have characterized the business men of other countries.

America has stood in such a position to the Central and South American Republics that we should have had the major part of their foreign trade. But Europe has furnished markets for most of their products, and they have annually taken from Europe hundreds of millions of the latter's products which should have been purchased in the United States.

If the American business men had exhibited the same genius, vision, and sagacity in their attempts to obtain foreign trade as they have developing a domestic market, America would have been the dominating factor in most of the countries of the world. When I say "dominating factor," I mean in a commercial way. Of course, America occupies a world eminence which no nation can challenge; but there is much room for the expansion of our foreign trade and commerce, and with any general revival of business conditions in Europe we shall find that in many countries where our trade should be controlling we shall be compelled to occupy an unimportant position.

During the war our foreign commerce expanded beyond all expectation. It amounted to nearly fourteen billions for the fiscal year 1920. It was inevitable that when the war ended there would be a great subsidence in our foreign trade. The capital of most European nations was not only impaired but largely destroyed. The stupendous debts resulting from the war and the disruption of the entire economic system resulted, as was to have been expected, in a financial and economic collapse. But Europe will revive. She needs and will continue to need our goods and raw materials. Asia, as I have stated, is a broad field for American enterprise. If the American people address themselves with energy and with a broad and catholic spirit to the great economic and industrial problems, they will not only bring our domestic business to a high stage of development but they will materially contribute to the business welfare of the world, and thus, while advantaging other peoples and other nations, add to the prosperity and wealth of the American people.

If we shall adopt a proper system of taxation and practice economy and thrift in governmental as well as in private affairs, we may expect the doors of the prison house of business depression to open wide, so that we may step therefrom out into the sunlight and enjoy the full radiance of a bright and glorious day. No narrow, partisan, or provincial policy in dealing with the domestic or foreign questions should be adopted. The World War has demonstrated the "exterritoriality," if I may be permitted the expression, of all peoples. We are interested primarily in our own country, but we can not disassociate ourselves from other countries. We have built a merchant marine for the transport of our products to other lands and to bring to our shores the commodities which will contribute to our happiness and welfare.

If the party in power will approach the problems before us in a broad and statesmanlike manner and deal with them in a liberal and progressive spirit, the recovery from our present ills will be speedy.

This is no time for granting special privileges to wealth or to any other class. Now, more than ever, should the spirit of justice and equality characterize legislation and national policies.

The business men of the United States, with the advantages which this Nation enjoys, with the favor with which it is regarded among the inhabitants of China, should not find it necessary to demand exemptions from taxation and governmental favors. With the genius and courage of the American people, there is no reason why they can not meet in China or elsewhere the nationals of any other country and secure for themselves and for this country the trade and commerce desired. I repeat, the primacy of America can not be challenged by any nation. We lead the world in a material way; we must lead it in a spiritual way.

There will be national progress in everything that the word "progress" implies if we follow the paths of justice and equity. America's opportunity has come. Nations have risen and gone to destruction. This Nation, by its devotion to justice and righteousness, must live throughout the centuries and constitute a guide to peoples everywhere who desire liberty and to live in the light of truth and justice.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, as long as we are having a little post-mortem over the vote yesterday evening, I would like to say, in reference to the statement made by the Senator from Pennsylvania this morning in attempting to account for the failure of the committee amendment yesterday upon the ground that 20 Republican Senators were absent, that a rather careful examination of the vote shows that there were 16 Republicans absent or not voting and 12 Democrats absent or not voting. I just desire that that shall go in the RECORD.

Again, Mr. President, I want to make one general observation with reference to the document which has just been read from the desk. As I understood it, the reason which the committee gave for its proposition to exempt from taxation domestic corporations upon their earnings in foreign countries was that other nations exempted their nationals from taxation on incomes derived from trading in other countries, and that it was necessary that we should do the same thing in order to put our nationals who are likewise doing business in other countries upon a parity with them in the matter of taxation, so that they might have equal opportunity in competition with other countries.

That was the sole reason, as I understood it, why the committee proposed this sweeping exemption, an exemption which would apply to every domestic corporation trading anywhere in the world, or doing business anywhere in the world.

It now develops that the only instance in which it has ever been so much as claimed that other Governments exempt their citizens from taxation on incomes derived from business done in other countries is the case of Great Britain, which is supposed to have granted some sort of a concession in the case of corporations doing business in China; so that the reason which the committee gave for its proposition seems to fall to the ground, except possibly in the case of China. There is a contention, and will be if this bill comes up again, that there is no such exemption as is proposed in this bill granted by Great Britain in the case of China. I do not know that this matter will come up again, but surely if there be reasons why we should make an exemption in the case of our nationals doing business in China, there is no reason so far assigned why that exemption should apply to our nationals doing business anywhere else in the world.

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, I simply rise to inquire if a motion has been made to reconsider the vote on the amendment on page 5? We have been spending an hour or so on it, and I simply wish to inquire if that is before the Senate.

Mr. SIMMONS. I presume, Mr. President, that this proceeding was taken this morning with a view to having a vote in the Senate, and trying to forestall action when the bill is in the Senate.

Mr. ASHURST. We have heard a great deal of discussion of the amendment on page 5, which was stricken out on a roll call yesterday. We have consumed an hour and a half on what we did yesterday. There has been no motion made to reconsider that vote, and I do not perceive the necessity of taking an hour and a half to explain what we did yesterday. I think we did right.

Mr. SIMMONS. The time has been taken up, however, in reading a long document offered by the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. BRANDEGEE].

Mr. ASHURST. I am not complaining about the Senator from North Carolina. I am only asking that the Republican majority proceed with more celerity on the bill.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, I want to detain the Senate just a moment to say, with regard to this matter, that I am very glad indeed that the communication addressed to the Senator from Connecticut was presented, and that it has gone into the RECORD. It shows very clearly on how slender a foundation this great system, this network of provisions that runs all through the bill, must rest.

It shows, furthermore, that whatever British corporations are incorporated in Hongkong and escape income tax to the British Government must be purely local corporations, just exactly as the corporations in the Philippines incorporated under the American flag. American citizens in the Philippines have incorporated under the American flag, have local corporations, and can prosecute their trade in China and pay no income tax in the United States.

Mr. SIMMONS. No such exemption would hold under the proposed committee amendment.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. No. That is a very different proposition from the committee provisions. However, if the matter is to be taken up again in the Senate the whole thing will be argued at that time.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, was the amendment on page 12, line 12, agreed to?

The VICE PRESIDENT. It is the next amendment. The next amendment will be stated.

The READING CLERK. The next amendment is, on page 12, line 12, to strike out the words "a mere" and insert the word "mere."

The amendment was agreed to.

The READING CLERK. The next amendment is, on page 12, line 13, to strike out the word "corporation" and the semicolon and insert the words "corporation (however effected)"; and in line 14 to strike out the word "and" and insert the word "or."

The amendment was agreed to.

The READING CLERK. The next amendment is, on page 12, line 15, to strike out the words "such property" and insert the words "property, real, personal, or mixed"; in line 18 to strike out the words "a group of" and insert the words "two or more"; in line 18 to strike out the word "transfers" and insert the word "transfer"; in line 20 to strike out the word "is" and insert the word "are"; in line 20 to strike out the word "corporation" and the semicolon and insert the word "corporation" and a comma; in line 21 to strike out the word "when"; in line 23 to strike out the word "interest" and insert the word "interests"; in lines 24 and 25 to strike out the words "or group of persons is" and insert the words "is, or two or more persons are"; on page 13, after the word "and" in line 2, to insert the words "at least"; and after the words "per centum of" in line 2 to insert the words "the total number of shares of," so as to make the paragraph read:

(3) When (A) a person transfers any property, real, personal, or mixed, to a corporation, and immediately after the transfer is in control of such corporation, or (B) two or more persons transfer any such property to a corporation, and immediately after the transfer are in control of such corporation, and the amounts of stock, securities, or both, received by such persons are in substantially the same proportion as their interests in the property before such transfer. For the purposes of this paragraph, a person is, or two or more persons are, "in control" of a corporation when owning at least 80 per cent of the voting stock and at least 80 per cent of the total number of shares of all other classes of stock of the corporation.

The amendments were agreed to.

The READING CLERK. The next amendment is, on page 13, line 4, where the committee proposes to strike out "(e)" and insert "(d) (1)"; in line 6 to strike out "(d)" and insert "(c)"; and in line 8 to strike out the word "therefor" and the period and insert "therefor, except as provided in subdivision (e)," so as to make the paragraph read:

(d) (1) Where property is exchanged for other property and no gain or loss is recognized under the provisions of subdivision (c), the property received shall, for the purposes of this section, be treated as taking the place of the property exchanged therefor, except as provided in subdivision (e).

The amendment was agreed to.

The READING CLERK. The next amendment is on page 13, after line 9, where the committee proposes to insert:

(2) Where property is compulsorily or involuntarily converted into cash or its equivalent in the manner described in paragraph (12) of subdivision (a) of section 214 and paragraph (14) of subdivision (a) of section 234, and the taxpayer proceeds in good faith to expend or set aside the proceeds of such conversion in the form and in the manner therein provided, the property acquired shall, for the purpose of this section, be treated as taking the place of a like proportion of the property converted.

Mr. SMOOT. This amendment went over at the request of the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. KELLOGG]. He is not in the Chamber at this moment. We can agree to it, however, and then when the Senator enters the Chamber if he desires a reconsideration we can take that course.

The amendment was agreed to.

The READING CLERK. The next amendment is, on page 13, after line 18, to insert:

(3) Where no deduction is allowed for a loss or a part thereof under the provisions of paragraph (5) of subdivision (a) of section 214 and paragraph (4) of subdivision (a) of section 234, that part of the property acquired with relation to which such loss is disallowed shall for the purposes of this section be treated as taking the place of the property sold or disposed of.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. KELLOGG entered the Chamber.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I will say to the Senator from Minnesota that the amendment which he asked to go over, on page 13, after line 9, has just been agreed to with the understanding that if he desired, upon entering the Chamber, to have it reconsidered that action might be taken.

Mr. KELLOGG. I will examine it further.

Mr. SMOOT. I will say to the Senator that the amendment we have just reached on page 14, at the top of the page, was passed over at his request also.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will state the next amendment.

The READING CLERK. The next amendment is, at the top of page 14, to insert:

(e) Where property is exchanged for other property which has no readily realizable market value, together with money or other property which has a readily realizable market value, then the money or the fair market value of the property having such readily realizable market value received in exchange shall be applied against and reduce the basis, provided in this section, of the property exchanged, and if in excess of such basis, shall be taxable to the extent of the excess; but when property is exchanged for property specified in paragraphs (1), (2), and (3) of subdivision (c) as received in exchange, together with money or other property of a readily realizable market value other than that specified in such paragraphs, the money or the fair market value of the property received in exchange shall be applied against and reduce the basis, provided in this section, of the property exchanged, and if in excess of such basis, shall be taxable to the extent of the excess.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, to correct the amendment, in line 13, at the end of the line, I move to strike out the word "the" and insert in lieu thereof the words "such other," so as to read: "fair market value of such other property."

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

The READING CLERK. The next amendment is, on page 14, after line 17, to insert:

(f) Nothing in this section shall be construed to prevent (in the case of property sold under contract providing for payment in installments) the taxation of that portion of any installment payment representing gain or profit in the year in which such payment is received.

The amendment was agreed to.

The READING CLERK. The next amendment is, on page 14, after line 22, to strike out:

(f) The basis for ascertaining allowable deductions for loss, exhaustion, wear and tear, obsolescence, amortization, and other like deductions, except those authorized in paragraph (10) of subdivision (a) of section 214 and in paragraph (9) of subdivision (a) of section 234, shall be the same basis as that provided by subdivisions (a) and (b) of this section.

The amendment was agreed to.

The READING CLERK. The next amendment is on page 21, passed over at the request of the junior Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LENROOT], where the committee proposes to strike out lines 6 to 21, inclusive, in the following words:

(b) In the case of any taxpayer (other than a corporation) whose ordinary net income and capital net gain together exceed $29,000, there shall be levied, collected, and paid, in lieu of the taxes imposed by sections 210 and 211 of this title, a tax determined as follows:

A partial tax shall first be computed upon the basis of the ordinary net income at the rates and in the manner provided in sections 210 and 211, and the total tax shall be this amount plus 12½ per cent of the capital net gain, or minus 12½ per cent of the capital net loss, as the case may be; but in no such case where the taxpayer derives a capital net gain shall the total tax be less than 12½ per cent of the total net income. The total tax thus determined shall be levied, collected, and paid at the same time and in the same manner and subject to the same provisions of law, including penalties, as other taxes under this title.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Mr. President, the change proposed on page 21, by striking out lines 16 to 22 and inserting the new section "(b)," is one of the most important changes proposed in the bill. The proposed new section reads:

(b) In the case of any taxpayer who for any taxable year derives a capital net gain, such capital net gain shall, under regulations prescribed by the commissioner with the approval of the Secretary, be stated separately from the ordinary net income in the taxpayer's return; and only 40 per cent of such capital net gain shall be taken into account in determining the amount of the net income upon which taxes are imposed by sections 210, 211, and 230 of this title.

What shall be done with gains and losses which arise from the sale of capital assets?

The present income tax law taxes the gains from the sale of capital assets the same as the other income of taxpayers. For illustration, an individual purchased in 1915 a piece of land for $5,000, and in 1918 he sold it for $10,000. Under the existing law he would include in net income the $5,000 gained from this transaction for the year of the sale and pay the same tax on this gain as on the other items of his income.

Section 206 of the proposed Senate bill provides that only 40 per cent of the gain from the sale of capital assets shall be included in the net income. For example, using the illustration above, this taxpayer under the pending amendment would pay a tax on only $2,000 instead of $5,000, as under the present law.

The reason given in favor of this change is that the provision of the present law taxing at graduated rates the gain from the sale of capital assets is tying up sales and exchanges of property and making the sale of property which has gradually appreciated in value over a period of years impossible, because it throws the entire gain in the year in which the sale is made and thus subjects it to the higher surtax rates. In other words, for the purpose of avoiding the payment of surtaxes upon gains received from the sale of tangible and intangible property, sales are held up in the hope that some time in the future modifications may be made in the present law or the surtax abolished so that the payment of taxes now imposed may not be necessary.

Whatever may be said in favor of this contention—and I am in sympathy with the need of a change—the abuses that can grow out of the proposed change would seem to argue very strongly against the insertion of this clause without some modification in the pending bill. There is no distinction made between increased value in tangible or intangible property extending over a long period of years and that sudden and speculative increase that develops within a short period of time. Under this amendment the stock speculator who buys early in the year stocks at a small valuation and sells them later at a much enhanced value would have to pay a tax on only 40 per cent of the gain from such sales, while gains in income from every other source of income would be taxed to the full amount.

Under the proposed amendment and bill a lawyer or any other professional man who derived as a fee from a large case or a merchant who through a substantial increase in sales derived an income of, say, $100,000 per year is taxable upon the full amount of income. The speculator who derives an income of $100,000 a year upon the New York Stock Exchange or in any other manner would be taxable only on 40 per cent of his net income, or $40,000.

If there is any merit at all in the contentions made by those who are in favor of this amendment it seems to me in all fairness and equity to taxpayers other than those who are making money in a speculative way upon sudden increases in the value of property which they hold that there should be a limit in the time allowed for holding capital assets before the reduced rate of taxation would be applicable. I suggest a time limit of at least three years.

If the benefits of this amendment are limited to cases of the sale of capital assets which have been owned by the taxpayer for a period of three years or more the just cases and the cases in which relief should be afforded will not be affected; but the speculator will not be included and will be forced to pay a tax upon his entire net income, the same as every other taxpayer. And in view of the fact that one of the important changes in this bill allows taxpayers to charge their net losses in income against incomes in future years, it is but fair and equitable that such taxpayers should be taxed upon the full amount of their income on capital gains.

It is to be noted that even in the proposed bill the taxpayer can deduct the full loss which he sustains by reason of deflation in the value of his capital assets. Thus his income which he derived from speculation is to be reduced to 40 per cent, while the loss which he sustains is to be charged against his income at the rate of 100 per cent, assuming, of course, that the loss comes in a different year from the gain.

Therefore I propose an amendment which will place a time limit upon the period that capital assets can be held by the taxpayer in order to get the benefit of this proposed tax change when a sale is consummated. My proposal is that it be three years.

I understand that the junior Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LENROOT] is in accord with the criticism which I have made of the pending amendment. I do not know that he proposes to go so far as I do as to the limit of three years, but if the Senator has not some other suggestion to make so as to remove speculative profits from the provisions of the proposed law, then I shall propose my amendment restricting the period to three years.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, the Senator from Massachusetts, I understand, desires to fix a three-year period so as to cover speculative stock transactions. I think his period is a little long. Would the Senator be satisfied with fixing a period of one year?

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. I think the period should be more than one year.

Mr. McCUMBER. So as to compel a holding for at least one year?

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. I shall be satisfied with two years. I think the period ought to be more than one year.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, so far as I am concerned, in order to settle this matter, I shall be satisfied with the proposition of the two Senators if the Senator from Massachusetts will add to the amendment that it shall apply purely to speculative stocks and securities.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. President, I think I ought to say to the Senator from North Dakota that I would not be satisfied with an amendment applying to purely speculative stocks, because the amendment as reported by the committee, with the purposes of which I am in sympathy, was based on the idea that the present law prevented sales of property, particularly of real property; but, under existing conditions, if a man buys a piece of real estate for speculation to-day—and the Treasury Department can not determine whether he buys it for speculation or for investment—and sells it to-morrow, I do not know why he should have the benefit of this provision. I think a limitation, whether it be of one or two years, should be inserted, so that no one could have the benefit of this section unless he had owned the property, whether it be stock or otherwise, for a period of one or two years, as may be agreed upon.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Would the Senator be willing to have the period limited to two years?

Mr. LENROOT. Yes.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. I think the Senator from North Dakota has agreed to that.

Mr. LENROOT. I understood the Senator from North Dakota desired to limit the provisions entirely to speculative stocks.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. I did not so understand him. I do not favor such a limitation.

Mr. McCUMBER. I suggested that the limitation should apply merely to speculative stocks.

Mr. LENROOT. Would the Senator from North Dakota be willing to have it limited to all sales of property?

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. On the theory that all sales within two years are speculative, more or less?

Mr. LENROOT. Yes.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, I do not think that I should object to that.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. I do not think the Senator from North Dakota would object to that.

Mr. McCUMBER. If the Senator from Massachusetts will offer the amendment, so far as I can I shall accept it.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. I will send the amendment which I suggest to the desk, and ask the expert who is sitting with the Senator temporarily in charge of the bill to see if it does not cover the suggestion I make.

We have no objection to the provision beginning on page 21. It is only as to the time within which the principle shall be applied that we object. The objection we make can be covered by the amendment which I send to the desk, which refers to the paragraph at the beginning of page 20.

Mr. McCUMBER. If the Senator will allow me, I desire to say that I think the proper place for his amendment would be in the paragraph commencing with line 22, on page 20, which reads:

The term "capital assets" as used in this section includes property acquired and held by the taxpayer for profit or investment—

The words "for more than two years" should be inserted at that point—whether or not connected with his trade or business.

If the Senator would be satisfied with inserting the words "for more than two years" after the word "investment," in line 24, I think that would meet his suggestion.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. That will be satisfactory. The amendment which I have sent to the desk was drawn by experts and was submitted to me by them as a proper way of meeting the objection which the Senator from Wisconsin and I make to the provision. I think perhaps the change suggested by the Senator from North Dakota will be simpler than the language used in my amendment.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment proposed by the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH] will be stated.

The READING CLERK. On page 20, line 24, after the word "investment," it is proposed to insert the words "for more than two years."

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the amendment is agreed to.

Mr. McCUMBER. The amendment which I just suggested was a substitute for the amendment proposed by the Senator from Massachusetts. The one amendment, I think, is all that is necessary.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the amendment at the bottom of page 21 and extending over to the top of page 22, which has already been stated, is agreed to.

The next amendment passed over will be stated.

The READING CLERK. The next amendment passed over, upon the request of the junior Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LENROOT], is on page 22, beginning in line 5.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. President, I asked that the amendment be passed over for the reasons that have now been urged by the Senator from Massachusetts; but, as the object which I had in mind has now been taken care of in another way, I have no further objection to urge concerning it. I should like to say to the Senator from Massachusetts, however, that I am not entirely clear that the amendment which has been adopted covers what is really desired.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. I have thought that the Senator from North Dakota met the situation, and if later a correction might have to be made, there would probably be no difficulty in making the change, because we are all in accord as to the principle. The amendment which I first sent to the desk was the one which the experts advised me would cover the difficulty, but I judge the Senator from North Dakota has been in consultation with the experts at his elbow and they have suggested the change which has now been made was simpler.

Mr. McCUMBER. The Senator is correct; but, if it is found that the amendment which has been adopted does not meet the requirements of the situation we can go back to it.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, in view of the language found on page 22, permitting the commissioner to make rules and regulations, may I inquire whether the purpose is to give greater flexibility to the existing law with reference to determining losses and gains?

Mr. McCUMBER. The amendment which has been adopted is simply a limitation on the profits in connection with the sale of capital. It is under the head of capital sales; so that where a person parts with a portion or all of his capital, instead of taking the entire profits that he might possibly make, a practice which to-day is holding up a vast number of sales, we simply take 40 per cent of that profit as the basis of the tax, where the capital itself is sold.

Mr. KING. I had reference, if the Senator will pardon me, to the words on page 22, "shall be determined under rules and regulations to be prescribed by the commissioner with the approval of the Secretary."

Mr. McCUMBER. I assume that refers simply to the rules and regulations that will be necessary to secure proper returns. It does not change the rate or the law itself.

Mr. KING. I have been absent from the Chamber for a moment. Do I understand that there is no amendment proposed which gives greater flexibility in the administration of the law to the taxing department of the Government?

Mr. McCUMBER. I think not; not at this point, at any rate.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Mr. President, I will say to the Senator from Utah that he has referred to a feature of this bill which is unique. In more than 20 places in the bill the commissioner is given flexible authority for the first time. That is a great departure from previous tax legislation. Such a system is said to have worked very satisfactorily in Great Britain and other countries where flexible authority has been given; but it is the first departure in this country from the rule of defining accurately and in detail the tax law. In this bill in very many instances great power is given to the commissioner, as well as great discretion, in the interpretation of the law.

Mr. KING. May I say, Mr. President, that in the English statute I think it was very wise to allow a certain flexibility and to bestow a considerable amount of discretion upon the tax authorities in the enforcement of the law. In the first place, the business interests of Great Britain are practically compact; it can be very easily ascertained what the profits and the activities of business and corporations are; but it seems to me that the rule of flexibility as applied in Great Britain is no particular argument for giving wide discretion to officials here and providing for great flexibility in the administration of our law. I ask the Senator whether or not, in view, to use his expression, of this unique feature of the bill, he considers it wise to confer such discretionary power upon the administrative officers of the Government and to allow such great flexibility in the administration of the law?

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. I think it is a very serious question whether we ought to make this departure. I wish to say to the Senator, however, that the language of this bill is so involved and the meaning in many places is so obscure and almost nonunderstandable that somebody ought to have discretion in administering its provisions. As has been suggested already, there are many sections of this bill which it is almost humanly impossible for a man who is not an expert to understand or comprehend. Under such circumstances there ought to be intrusted to some authority the power to interpret them and to exercise some discretion.

Mr. KING. Certainly the Senator does not mean to assert, in view of the promises which were made before the election and during the election, that we were to have a scientific and rational and very easy to be understood revenue law, that the pending measure is not clarity itself?

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. All I can say to the Senator is that I have heard experts say that they do not know exactly what certain sections of the bill mean, and I know that experts have differed themselves on the construction of certain parts of the bill. I do not think anybody, even those who are urging the bill, will contend that the bill is any improvement over the language of the previous revenue bill. In fact, I think it is generally admitted that it is very much more complicated and its meaning more obscure.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, of course I knew that the Senator must answer in that way. It is simply a revelation of the fact that our friends—if I may be pardoned for a political interjection—made very many promises which they have utterly failed to fulfill. We have here a bill that is so cumbersome, so complicated, and—to use the word of my friend from Massachusetts—so nonunderstandable, that even Senators who have worked upon the bill for months do not understand it.

Experts probably do not understand it, or, if they do, they differ; and so now we are to commit to the Treasury Department discretion, flexibility, so that they may place upon the bill such interpretation as in the light of the exigencies of each particular case they may deem proper.

I suggest that it might be wise for us to annex to the bill a chart stating what the Senate understands the provisions to mean, hoping that it may be a guide to the experts and to the department who are to enforce the bill when they come to explain its provisions and apply it to the collection of taxes from the taxpayers of the United States.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will state the next amendment passed over.

The READING CLERK. The next amendment is, on page 22, line 7, where it is proposed to strike out the word "income" with a comma and insert the words "income and."

The amendment was agreed to.

The READING CLERK. On line 8 of the same page, strike out "or capital net loss."

The amendment was agreed to.

The READING CLERK. The next amendment passed over is, on page 22, after line 15, "Part II—Individuals—Normal tax," passed over at the request of the senior Senator from North Carolina [Mr. SIMMONS].

Mr. GERRY. Mr. President, I understand that the Senator from North Dakota has an amendment to offer to this section. I also have an amendment to offer to it, but I should prefer to have the section left open to further amendment until after the amendments on the surtaxes are offered and passed upon. I ask unanimous consent that that be done.

Mr. McCUMBER. I have no objection.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, may I inquire of the Senator if this section does not deal with the surtax?

Mr. GERRY. I will say to the Senator from Utah that the section deals first with the normal tax and then with the surtax.

Mr. KING. It seems to me that they are so closely related——

Mr. McCUMBER. Section 210 deals only with the normal tax.

Mr. GERRY. Section 210 deals with the normal tax and section 211 deals with the surtax. If the surtax can be taken up and passed upon first, then I have certain tables that I intend to put in the RECORD which will be more easily understandable after the surtax has been agreed to. That is why I ask that it go over until then.

Mr. KING. If the Senator will permit me, I have an amendment to offer which brings into one compact form both the surtax and the normal tax. Instead of having normal taxes and surtaxes in different columns, I have an amendment which consolidates them, and treats them as one tax.

Mr. McCUMBER. I would suggest that we first pass upon these amendments which the committee desires to offer which are to make corrections; and then, after the amendments have been adopted and the corrections made, the Senator from Utah can move as a substitute the amended form, and the Senator from Rhode Island can also do the same thing.

Mr. GERRY. Mine would not be in the form of a substitute; it would be an amendment to section 210.

Mr. McCUMBER. That can be done at that time.

Mr. GERRY. Then may I ask the Senator from North Dakota if I can take up my amendment after the surtaxes have been agreed to?

Mr. McCUMBER. I think there will be no objection to that.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, that will be agreed to.

The READING CLERK. On page 22, after line 15, it is proposed to insert:

PART II.—INDIVIDUALS.

NORMAL TAX.

SEC. 210. That, in lieu of the tax imposed——

Mr. SIMMONS. That section is to be passed over.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, before the word "That" and after "Sec. 210," I desire to insert a small "a" in parentheses.

Mr. KING. Will the Senator state that amendment again?

Mr. McCUMBER. I desire to make two parts out of section 210, so that the first part will read "Sec. 210. (a)", and the other will be "(b)." I therefore ask to insert "(a)" after the figures "210" on line 18.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment to the amendment will be stated.

The READING CLERK. On page 22, line 18, after the numerals "210," it is proposed to insert "(a)."

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. GERRY. Then I understand that by unanimous consent I can offer an amendment to that section subsequently?

Mr. McCUMBER. That is understood, Mr. President.

The READING CLERK. It is also proposed to insert the following words:

That, in lieu of the tax imposed by section 210 of the revenue act of 1918, there shall be levied, collected, and paid for each taxable year upon the net income of every individual a normal tax of 8 per cent of the amount of the net income in excess of the credits provided in section 216: Provided, That in the case of a citizen or resident of the United States the rate upon the first $4,000 of such excess amount shall be 4 per cent.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, I now offer an amendment to this amended section. On page 23, after line 2, I move to insert a new section, to read as follows:

(b) In the case of the head of a family or a married person living with husband or wife, the tax imposed by this section shall not exceed the sum of (1) the amount of the tax that such person would pay if his net income for the taxable year were $5,000, and (2) the excess of his net income over $5,000 for such taxable year.

I will state that the purpose of this amendment is as follows: Under the provisions of the bill as drafted, a married person living with his or her spouse is allowed an exemption of $2,500 provided the income does not exceed $5,000. If it exceeds $5,000, there is allowed only $2,000 exemption. You can easily see that there would be an effort to bring it down just below the $5,000, if possible, because if a person had an income of $4,999 he would have an exemption of $2,500, but if he had an income of $5,001 he would have an exemption of only $2,000. This amendment is to bridge the matter over, so that in any event there would be no excuse for reducing the amount of the income, because the taxpayer will pay upon the excess over $5,000.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, in addition to what the Senator has already stated, I will just add this by way of an example:

If the income of a man were $5,001, he would pay $20 tax on that $1. If it were $5,000, he would not pay the $20 at all. In other words, if he had an income of $1 more than $5,000, his tax under the provisions of this bill without the amendment would be $20 on that $1 of additional income. This is simply a provision to bridge over that break, which comes in all brackets of taxes; but having made the difference in the amount of exemption based upon the amount of income, a radical change occurs, and that is all that this amendment is for.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Does it make a difference in the revenue that the Government would receive?

Mr. SMOOT. I do not think it will amount to very much. There could be such a case as that, but it is only in case it should happen in this way. There may be a hundred of them, or something like that, or there may be a few more; but as far as the amount is concerned, it does not amount to much.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. It seems to be an amendment that is an improvement over the House provision dealing with this same subject. I ask to have the amendment stated again.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will state the amendment.

The READING CLERK. On page 23, after line 2, it is proposed to insert:

(b) In the case of the head of a family or a married person living with husband or wife, the tax imposed by this section shall not exceed the sum of (1) the amount of the tax that such person would pay if his net income for the taxable year were $5,000, and (2) the excess of his net income over $5,000 for such taxable year.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I should like to inquire of the Senator whether it is congruous to offer this amendment at this place? Are you not breaking your sections in two and introducing an exemption into the section which imposes the tax, so that you would have to recur to exemptions at a different place and treat exemptions in another section, though you would deal with exemptions in part right in the midst of the section which deals with the imposition of the tax? Is it not incongruous to offer it at this place?

Mr. McCUMBER. I think not, Mr. President. While I admit that the language as drawn by the experts seems a little bit abstract, nevertheless when you study out what it means the purpose is, as has just been explained by the Senator from Utah and myself, to bridge over this difficulty that arises from the temptation of a person who may have an income of a little over $5,000 to bring it a little below $5,000 in order to get the benefit of the $500 exemption.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Mr. President, the suggestion first made by the Senator proves to my mind one of the faults I find with this bill, as I do with the existing law. The Senator refers to the fact that the experts use certain language. What I am complaining about is that there is too much expert language in the bill. It is not experts who are paying the taxes in the country; it is the ordinary fellow, who ought to understand what the law is, who is being called upon to pay the taxes. I have heard it said so frequently with reference to a provision of this bill that the experts have so worded it. That is the explanation which is generally given. I am just an ordinary individual, not very well versed in finance. It does not take me a great while to make out my income-tax return, but I do have a little difficulty, even with the few thousand dollars that I have to report, and I think it is largely due to the use of too much expert language that the ordinary individual does not understand. When an explanation is offered, I wish we could have some better excuse than that that is the way the experts presented the provision to the Senate.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, the Senator from Michigan has just now expressed the difficulty that he has experienced in making his tax return under a law which the Senator from Michigan helped to make.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Allow me to correct the Senator right there. Mr. President, I did not vote in the committee for the law now on the statute books, and I voted against it on the floor of the Senate, for the very reason that I could not understand it, and I thought it was complicated and confused beyond any possibility of clearing up.

Mr. McCUMBER. Then, Mr. President, every member of that committee would have been more than gratified to have had the assistance of the member on that committee from Michigan to simplify it, and we on the Committee on Finance would have been glad to have had the assistance of any person to simplify and attempt to make right a tax law that is applied to the most complex and diverse character of business in the United States. Every one of us discussed the matter in the committee over and over again to see if there was not some method by which we could simplify this tax bill and make it easy to understand. If we should adopt the amendment offered by the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT], and had just a sales tax, it would simplify it a little, until we began to apply it. Then it in turn would become somewhat complex, in my opinion. If we had a simple turnover tax on every sale, then we would have a simple tax that all could understand, but it would not be satisfactory to anybody. We have to have one kind of a provision in a law for those who are interested in a hazardous business—mining, for instance—and another kind of a provision that will pertain to the insurance business, and as there are about 200 kinds of insurance, we must have many definitions in order to cover them all.

We all would like to simplify this measure, but when you put a Senator right up to the proposition of simplifying it, of making it right, I would like to see the language he would write it in. I would be very glad if the Senator from Utah would write the amendment that is necessary to bridge over this matter of the difference between an exemption of $2,500 and $2,000 upon a $5,000 income, in order that it will not invite the taxpayer to make his return a little less, so as to get a lesser amount of tax to be paid.

Mr. President, I have heard a great deal of condemnation of these experts. They have worked diligently and earnestly, and they know more about the operation of the tax laws than any Senator on the floor, and they know the complexity of the business. They understand the old law. They have tried to correct the bill in accordance with the direction of the committee. I think we are spending a great deal of time uselessly in ridiculing and condemning those experts who have been called in to help draft the bill. They were utilized by the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. SIMMONS] in drafting the previous bill, and I think he will pay due respect to their efforts and their knowledge of the situation.

The Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. MOSES] the other day, in a well-prepared speech, ridiculed these experts for their work; but, Mr. President, the moment a Senator from the other side of the Chamber asked him how he arrived at the conclusion that the line of demarcation between the surtaxes on large estates should be 32 per cent he had to fall back on the experts and give as his reason that the experts of the department had so held.

Mr. MOSES. O, Mr. President, I beg the Senator's pardon. That was not the question addressed to me by the Senator from New Mexico [Mr. JONES] at all. The colloquy between the Senator from New Mexico and me was based wholly on the assertion which I made that the tax-free securities were taking up the available free capital of the country, and the question of the line of demarcation where the surtaxes on these large estates should begin or leave off was never in controversy between the Senator from New Mexico and me.

Mr. McCUMBER. I think if the Senator will look over his speech he will find that I am correctly stating the substance of it when I say that he stated that the experts had determined that the line was somewhere between 25 and 32 or 35 per cent.

Mr. MOSES. Mr. President, that occurred in the body of my speech, and my exact language, as I remember it, was that expert and intelligent opinion fixed it somewhere between those two points.

Mr. McCUMBER. Very well; the Senator fell back upon the experts. The Senator is not even a good Christian Scientist, for while he damns the doctors and ridicules them, whenever he gets in difficulty he comes back to the doctors.

Mr. MOSES. Mr. President——

Mr. McCUMBER. When the Senator found it was necessary to explain the situation he fell back upon the testimony of the experts who came from the Treasury Department. I am not contending that what the Senator is doing is not all right, but I insist that we really have to fall back on the experts for their knowledge of the subject. These experts have not, so far as I know, attempted to impose their own opinions and conclusions. The committee has determined what it thought ought to be the law and has called upon the experts to examine every section of the bill and so draft it that it would be harmonious with the committee's idea of what the law ought to be. They have rendered signal service, and with all of the intelligence in the Senate, I think as a body we would be entirely lost if we did not have the benefit of the expert testimony which has been given us from day to day. I am certain if the Senator from New Hampshire were present in the committee meetings he probably would call upon the experts for their information and their idea of the effect of any proposed amendment as much as other members of the Committee on Finance.

Mr. MOSES. Mr. President, if the Senator will allow me, I know he does not want to do me an injustice——

Mr. McCUMBER. Certainly I do not.

Mr. MOSES. I did not single out the experts from the Treasury Department. I simply spoke of expert opinion in general.

As for the experts who have worked upon this tax bill, Mr. President, I have nothing to recant regarding what I said of them in my comment upon this bill and in my comment upon the emergency tariff bill, with which they had very much to do. I believe that the experts have become a group of super-Senators, trying experiments in legislation for which they have no responsibility and attempting to try out on the country a lot of things which they have revolved in their minds until they think they are real machines that will work.

I have objected also to these particular experts, Mr. President, because they are of Democratic antecedents. They have been the foundation of Democratic tax legislation, and I think if the Republican Party in the Senate and on the Finance Committee want experts they should get some experts who are at least politically loyal.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, it is just such criticism of these experts that I take exception to. Of course, the Senator has a right to assume anything he sees fit. I think the experts have rendered signal service to the committee, both when the Democrats were in control and when the Republicans were in control. They have given the facts, the bills have been drafted, and in the language which is used to conform one part to the other and to explain one section with the other I think probably they have done as well as most of us could do.

Mr. MOSES. Will the Senator yield?

Mr. McCUMBER. I yield.

Mr. MOSES. Mr. President, there is an old Russian adage, "Whose bread I eat, his song I sing," but I never thought highly of men who shape their lives upon it.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from North Dakota yield to the Senator from Michigan?

Mr. McCUMBER. I yield.

Mr. TOWNSEND. I want to say a word in reference to the statement of the Senator from North Dakota in reference to the part taken by me in the preparation of the bill which became the present law. I am making no complaint because the committee has sought the best sources possible for getting information on this most difficult subject. I am not complaining about that. I was complaining because after the experts had worked out some kind of a proposition it could not be put in language which I could understand and which the people themselves could understand.

In reference to the part taken by me in the last Democratic Congress in the preparation of tax legislation, I was at that time a member of the Committee on Finance. I attended every meeting of that committee, I believe, and participated to the very best and utmost of my ability in trying to shape a bill.

Now, I am entering upon another controversial point. After we had considered that bill, the night before we were to report out a bill the next day, a great many of our Democratic brethren, as members of that committee, a majority of whom never had attended any of the meetings of the committee, were called together, and they reported another bill to the whole committee, and reported it to the Senate the next day. That bill contained many of the provisions we had agreed upon or had discussed, but it contained some provisions we had not discussed. I could not support the bill. I did not understand it very well, although I had been very diligent. I have just ordinary intelligence, and I did not understand it. When that bill came before the Senate I could not support it, because I felt that it was a complex arrangement which the people could not understand. Experience has demonstrated that they did not understand it, and do not understand it yet, and that the consideration of the tax returns of 1917 and 1918 is not completed yet, and we are going back to them because of a misunderstanding of the forms.

I had hoped we might frame a bill at this time which we could at least understand, and I am giving my best thought and attention to it, and I am in perfect sympathy with the committee. I realize that they have a tremendous job on their hands and I do not want to unduly criticize them. But when this simple provision, apparently, as Senators think it is, this little provision which is before us to-day, has to be read a dozen times and be explained by Senators before I can get any sense out of it at all, it occurs to me that it will be a pretty difficult matter to make the people understand it when they are called upon to pay their taxes under it. I am not complaining at your taking advice, but I have thought that after the advice of the experts has been taken either they or the committee ought to be able to put the provision in such language that an ordinary fellow could understand it by reading it.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Mr. President, I want to call the Senator's attention to the fact that we are now not dealing with taxes upon corporations or dividends or gains or losses. This is a section which 2,000,000 taxpayers will have to read. It provides for the tax on the individual and ought to be in plain, simple language. I have not found one Senator on this side of the Chamber yet who understands what the language proposed means.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, the Senator from Massachusetts understands the purpose of the amendment, does he not?

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Yes; I think I do.

Mr. McCUMBER. Will the Senator from Massachusetts kindly formulate an amendment that will make it simple?

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. I will be glad to do so.

Mr. McCUMBER. If he will, the committee will adopt it very quickly.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. I will be glad to consider the matter if the Senator will pass it over and give me a chance to consider it.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. If the amendment is to be rewritten, I want to call attention to the fact that this language ought to be changed, "that the head of a family or married person living with a husband and wife."

Mr. McCUMBER. That is a misprint, and of course it will be corrected.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. It appears several times in the bill.

Mr. McCUMBER. That is the fault either of the person drafting it or of the printer. I can not tell which.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. It appears three or four times.

Mr. McCUMBER. It certainly ought to be changed.

Now, Mr. President, I wish to say in all fairness to the experts that I think the time has come for us, when we wish to make a change, and I think it needs to be simplified, to try to see if we can simplify it beyond what the experts have done. Remember these experts did not come before the committee of their own volition. They are a part of the Treasury Department. They perform their duties there and are then called to the Committee on Finance and do double duty, working Sundays and often long past midnight in order to accomplish some of the work that the committee has asked them to do. While they sit here on the floor to explain matters to anyone who desires to ask them a question or desires to get any information, they are here and ready to clear up any matter, but where they can not defend themselves against a charge made publicly against them. I say it is unfair to be eternally finding fault and condemning the experts who have worked on the bill. If Senators can simplify anything, if Senators can make it better, I am quite certain that the committee will be very glad to have it done.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I think the Senator is mistaken in assuming that there is any attack upon the experts. There is not. The attack is upon the committee for not writing the bill themselves. The experts are not legislators; they are experts; and having given the committee their expert advice, the committee should write the bill.

Mr. McCUMBER. If the committee wrote all the changes that are made from day to day, if they were to sit down and write out everything themselves, we would not have a bill of this kind before us for six months yet. It is impossible for the committee to sit down and write word for word, because every time we make a little change in the bill we have to go over the whole of it and revamp, if not the entire bill, at least the entire title. Very often where we cut out a tax here or there we have to put it in elsewhere. It is not an easy job. It is not a simple job. The Senator who has it in his mind that he can make a simple and easily understandable bill, so that any farmer or any workman can understand it, ought to know that it can not be done and applied to the complex business of the United States.

The bill is open to amendment. Any time any Senator thinks he can make any proposition more clear than is made here the committee would welcome it, as would, of course, the experts.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I think this charge has never been brought against a similar bill, and when members of the committee have undertaken to prepare amendments or prepare bills Senators have had no difficulty in understanding them. There has been no difficulty in understanding the bill presented by the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT] for a sales tax.

Mr. McCUMBER. Of course not.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. That is a brand-new thing, and yet everybody has been able to understand it. So I say if the members of the committee had taken the information given by the experts and had put the language into the plain, ordinary vernacular that the average man understands there would be no complaint.

Mr. McCUMBER. As I said before, if we could say a bushel of potatoes shall bear a tax of 5 cents, we would all understand it, but a tax bill applying to every character of business in the United States is an entirely different kind of proposition. When the Senator says the same criticism did not apply to the previous bill he is mistaken. The pending bill is modeled after the old bill, and a great deal of it is but a repetition; and much of the criticism that is urged to-day against the pending bill for some of its complex provisions was urged against the other bill when it was before the Senate.

The best way to settle it is this. The committee have done the best they could under the circumstances. They do not pretend to have supreme knowledge of these matters, nor do they pretend to be able to make everything so clear that everyone can understand it any more than any one man can understand all the business there is in the United States; it is absolutely impossible for him to do so. The committee welcome any suggestion or any amendment that will simplify any provision. If the Senator from Nebraska can criticize any particular section for being too complex, of course he has in his mind some way in which it can be simplified, and I would like to have him, instead of standing here so much of the time condemning it, simply to present to us a simplified form.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. The trouble is that many of the Senators have not been able to understand when they read a committee amendment what the committee was driving at. Members of the committee have stood here upon the floor of the Senate and have disputed with each other as to what the meaning of the amendment was.

Mr. McCUMBER. I have not heard any of their disputes. Possibly there have been such, but I think the Senator is mistaken. I do not think he will find in the RECORD a single instance where Senators who are members of the committee have disputed as to what any amendment meant.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I have listened to several very interesting discussions. I recall one between the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT] and the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. SIMMONS], both members of the committee. I have heard others; the committee members themselves have split upon the meaning. As the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH] said, it may be all right to have technical and involved and difficult language used in those sections applying to great corporations that can employ interpreters and experts; but when we come to tax two or three million people with incomes of approximately $5,000 we ought to have the language so plain and clear that they can understand it without compelling them to employ lawyers or experts in making up their income-tax returns.

Mr. WATSON of Indiana. Mr. President, all that sounds very nice, but we who sat in the committee day after day wrestling with these complex problems found we could not do that very thing which the Senator is speaking about. The Senator from Nebraska is a newspaper man, presumably an editor; he has been in the habit of writing editorials; he understands something about the use of the English language. He knows what the amendment is designed to do. I wish now as a matter of fairness he would take the amendment and write it out so that everybody could understand it.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. If the Senator will explain to me in a few words what it means, I will attempt it.

Mr. WATSON of Indiana. I can explain what it means, but——

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Will the Senator explain it?

Mr. WATSON of Indiana. But I am not going to explain it, because the Senator has said that it ought to be written out so everybody can understand it.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I will give the Senator from Indiana a nice large red apple if he will explain it in five minutes so that we can understand it.

Mr. WATSON of Indiana. I understand exactly what it means, and I will say that Dr. Adams has explained it all over to me within the last 10 minutes. I had him do it.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Ah, the Senator has to have an expert's explanation, just as I thought.

Mr. WATSON of Indiana. Precisely. I had it explained, because it was necessary that I should have it explained, and it is necessary that every one of these things shall be explained to us as we go over them. There is not a Senator here who can understand these complex propositions unless the experts go over and over them.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Will the Senator kindly give Dr. Adams's explanation, so that we can understand it?

Mr. WATSON of Indiana. I will not, because I rose for another purpose, and that purpose is simply this: I wish to ask the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. SIMMONS] if he did not say in the committee room one day—and I am not violating any committee confidence—that after his bill of 1918 had been brought out on the floor more than 600 amendments were offered to it and engrafted upon it?

Mr. SIMMONS. I think it was something like that number.

Mr. WATSON of Indiana. Yes; but the Senator from Nebraska said there was no complaint made of that bill.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Oh, no; the Senator from Indiana misunderstood me. I did not say that. What I said was that the complaint of unintelligibility was not applied to it. Of course, the bill was amended upon the floor.

Mr. WATSON of Indiana. And precisely the same complaints were made.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. But members of the committee did not violently discuss among thesmelves as to the meaning of certain amendments.

Mr. WATSON of Indiana. They certainly did, and certainly had to, just as members of the committee do now. Here sit the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH], who attended practically every meeting of the committee, and the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. SIMMONS], who attended practically all the meetings of the committee. All of us sat there day after day and discussed all these propositions over and over, and we tried as best we could to simplify the measure so that everybody could understand it. I remember when this matter was discussed, and we could not make it any plainer than it is now and carry out the objects we had in mind. That is my candid opinion.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. But this amendment was never before the committee.

Mr. WATSON of Indiana. It was before the Republican members of the committee.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Ah, that is a different proposition. I ask the Senator again to give to the Senate for our benefit in a plain, ordinary garden variety of English, an explanation of what the amendment means.

Mr. WATSON of Indiana. If I did, then what would the Senator do?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I would be enlightened.

Mr. WATSON of Indiana. The Senator would be enlightened, but he would not vote for it.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, when the Senator from Indiana asked me a little while ago, with reference to the 600 amendments, I understood him to mean amendments made in committee. The Senator from Utah calls my attention to the fact that he said they were made upon the floor of the Senate. Of course, that is not correct. They were made in committee.

Mr. SMOOT. I will say to the Senator from Nebraska that if he had been in the Chamber when this amendment was explained I think he would have known just exactly what it means.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I have been here. I ask the Senator from Utah to explain to us what it means.

Mr. SMOOT. It will take me only a moment to do so.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I thank the Senator.

Mr. SMOOT. I am perfectly willing to undertake it.

Mr. WATSON of Indiana. It has been explained four times.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. I wish the Senator from Utah would explain at the same time just what the difference in tax would be to those who have an income of $5,001 and those who have an income of $4,999.

Mr. SMOOT. That comes in the explanation. The exemption allowed to an individual depends upon the amount of his income to a certain extent. In other words, an individual with an income of $5,000 and over has an exemption of $2,000. Where his income is under $5,000—for instance, $4,999—the exemption is $2,500. What is the result of that difference in exemption? If a man has an income of $5,001, he has an exemption of only $2,000, and the tax on that $1 will amount to $20; in other words, he pays a $20 tax on a $1 increase over and above the amount provided for by the bill.

Mr. SIMMONS. In other words, he loses his $500 exemption, and that is all there is in it.

Mr. SMOOT. He loses it and this amendment simply bridges that over. I know it often happens in brackets of all kinds there is a discrimination, but this is a wise discrimination. As I said, the $1 over and above the $5,000 income would cost the taxpayer $20, and the amendment simply means that he would pay his tax upon the $1 over and above the $5,000 income. I think any Senator can understand what the amendment means.

Mr. WATSON of Indiana. Now, will the Senator from Nebraska either vote for the amendment or write it in simpler language? He said if it was explained to him he would be enlightened. The Senator from Utah has undoubtedly explained it, just as it has been explained over and over again. Now, will the Senator from Nebraska write it in different language that anybody can understand?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I will do so if it is passed over so that I can be given a few moments to prepare it.

Mr. WATSON of Indiana. And consult the experts?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. No; I do not need to do that.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I regret that the innocent suggestion which I made to the Senator from North Dakota some time ago, that the amendment which he had suggested was incongruous and was offered at an improper place and interfered with the continuity of the subject then under consideration, should have precipitated this discussion.

I had in view only the improvement of the bill, not the purpose to delay its consideration.

Just a few words in reply to the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. MOSES]. I submit in the utmost kindness that his criticism of the experts who have aided the committee was rather unfair. I think his challenge of their political antecedents is not warranted. May I mention the name of one expert—Mr. McCoy? There are few men who know more about the fiscal affairs of our Government than does Mr. McCoy. So far as I know, he has been the adviser of both political parties for many years, and his advice has been of incalculable benefit. In my opinion the Senator from New Hampshire has no grounds for inferring that Mr. McCoy has Democratic antecedents or that he has been influenced by any consideration in the services rendered by him to the Senate. There is nothing in the work of Mr. McCoy that would warrant an inference that any advice he might give or assistance he might render would be influenced by any party or political views. He has given advice as freely to Republicans when the Democrats were in power as he did to Democrats, and he gives advice as freely to Democrats now as he does to Republicans.

The same may be said of Dr. Adams. While I do not agree with some of the economic views of Dr. Adams, I pay tribute to his learning and knowledge of fiscal affairs. I think that tribute must be paid to him by all, whether they agree with him or whether they differ from him in some of his economic views.

Mr. President, I realize that it is easy to criticize our Republican friends, and they deserve criticism; but still when we come to write any kind of legislation we are confronted with the fact that language often fails to convey the desired thought. It not only conceals thought but sometimes it is imperfect and fails to express our thoughts. Some of the best lawyers have written wills in elaborate language and others in few sentences and courts have taken years to interpret them and have then failed. The Bible itself is the basis of many interpretations, and many creeds, diverse in their religious views, are founded upon the same texts of Scripture. Our courts are daily wrestling with laws which have been written by specialists, supposed to be as clear as the noonday sun, and yet the more that the courts construe them the more ambiguous do they appear and the more confused do lawyers as well as litigants become. So I have a great deal of sympathy with our Republican friends. I think they have attempted a bigger job than they were competent to perform. I criticize the bill which they have offered not alone because of its ambiguities and inconsistencies but also because it is not a sufficient departure from the war revenue act. I think it would have been better if our Republican friends had prepared a new bill, preserving, so far as necessary, the fundamental principles embodied in the war revenue act instead of adding patches and pieces to the old law.

I have here what our Republican friends said in their platform which they wrote to get votes, but which they constantly refuse to carry out in their practice. Under the head of "Taxation" our Republican friends declared with great solemnity, when they expected a "solemn referendum":

> Moreover, the whole fiscal policy of the Government must be deeply influenced by the necessity of meeting obligations in excess of $5,000,000,000, which mature in 1923.

Permit me to say parenthetically, Mr. President, that our Republican friends seem to have forgotten those obligations which are maturing; they are making enormous expenditures; they will be met with large deficiencies, notwithstanding the huge revenues derived from a war tax bill; they will not only be unable to meet maturing obligations, but they will not be able to meet with this bill or any measure projected by the Republican Party the current liabilities and obligations and expenditures of the Government—

> But sound policy—

This is the point which I want particularly to call to the attention of my Republican friends—> equally demands the early accomplishment of that real reduction of the tax burden which may be achieved by substituting simple for complex tax laws and procedure, prompt and certain determination of the tax liability for delay and uncertainty, tax laws which do not for tax laws which do excessively mulct the consumer or needlessly repress enterprise and thrift.

May I say that I have been advised that Dr. Adams's political antecedents are of such a character that he participated in the formation of the Republican platform and wrote the very plank which I am reading? So when my friend criticizes Dr. Adams because of his Democratic antecedents he is greatly in error. If the Senator had criticized him because he is Republican, I would have joined with him. That is the only criticism I have of Dr. Adams. The Republican platform continues:

> We advocate the issuance of a simplified form of income return; authorizing the Treasury Department to make changes in regulations effective only from the date of their approval; empowering the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, with the consent of the taxpayer, to make final and conclusive settlements of tax claims and assessments, barring fraud; and the creation of a tax board consisting of at least three representatives of the tax-paying public and the heads of the principal divisions of the Bureau of Internal Revenue—

And so forth. Our Republican friends have departed absolutely from that platform pledge. Let me read what President Harding said at the beginning of the present session of Congress:

> The most substantial relief from the tax burden must come for the present from the readjustment of internal taxes, and the revision or repeal of those taxes which have become unproductive and are so artificial and burdensome as to defeat their own purpose. A prompt and thoroughgoing revision of the internal tax laws, made with due regard to the protection of the revenues, is, in my judgment, a requisite to the revival of business activity in this country. It is earnestly hoped, therefore, that the Congress will be able to enact without delay a revision of the revenue laws and such emergency tariff measures as are necessary to protect American trade and industry.
> It is of less concern whether internal taxation or tariff revision shall come first than has been popularly imagined, because we must do both, but the practical course for earliest accomplishment will readily suggest itself to the Congress. We are committed to the repeal of the excess-profits tax and the abolition of inequities and unjustifiable exasperations in the present system.
> The country does not expect and will not approve a shifting of burdens. It is more interested in wiping out the necessity for imposing them and eliminating confusion and cost in the collection.

President Harding will not find in this bill any redemption of Republican promises, or any vindication of his announced fiscal policies.

Perhaps I should qualify this statement and add that the repeal of the excess-profits tax is promised in this pending measure.

My colleague—and I say it with the utmost respect and kindness—has suggested a plan which would, notwithstanding its undoubted merits, shift the burdens.

Mr. SMOOT. Will my colleague yield to me?

Mr. KING. I yield.

Mr. SMOOT. I can not agree with my colleague.

Mr. KING. I did not expect that my colleague would.

Mr. SMOOT. I say that my proposition can not be construed as a shifting of burdens, but on the contrary, it is designed to relieve the consumer from many burdens which are more onerous than would be a small tax on sales.

Not only that, but I wish to say to my colleague that if he desires that I shall carry out the Republican platform as well as the Democratic platform so far as favoring a simplified form of taxation is concerned, all he will have to do will be to vote for my proposition, and then we shall have such a system of taxation.

I desire, further, to say that if my proposition be adopted every taxpayer in the country will be able to make out his tax return on a short sheet of paper, and he will know with absolute certainty whether he is making it out correctly or incorrectly.

Mr. WATSON of Indiana. Mr. President, let me ask the Senator from Utah [Mr. KING], who is now occupying the floor, whether he himself was not in favor of a sales tax and did not make a proposition for such a tax only four years ago?

Mr. KING. When Congress, soon after we entered the war in 1917, was confronted with the problem of raising billions of dollars to meet the stupendous expenses which we knew would be incurred in the prosecution of the war, and when Representatives and Senators were endeavoring to find sources from which revenue could be obtained, I ventured to suggest that if a sales tax were imposed a large revenue could be obtained. I stated that the amount annually obtainable from that source would depend entirely upon the amount of the tax and upon the number of articles or commodities upon which it was imposed. I recall that in presenting the matter attention was directed to the fact that a sales tax which reached all turnovers would prove objectionable and would result in such pyramiding as to become oppressive to the ultimate consumer and particularly to the consumers of commodities entering into the daily needs and lives of the people. My opinion was that, as a war measure, a sales tax was warranted. However, I took the position that, justifiable as it was in time of war, it would not prove satisfactory in times of peace. I would have voted for a sales tax during the war. I do not believe there is any occasion for it at the present time. A general sales tax, which is an excise on consumable commodities and which is imposed upon all transfers of commodities in the course of production, fabrication, manufacture, and finishing in final form for the market of consumption will yield an enormous revenue, but it will bear heavily upon consumers, particularly those who belong to what are denominated the working classes.

There may be a modified sales tax—one which limits the excise to specific articles or one where the tax is imposed only upon the final transfer of the commodity. As stated, if the sales tax is imposed upon each successive sale or transfer of the commodity in the course of its mutation from the raw material to finished product for final sale and consumption, then its operations constitute a burden too great for the people to bear.

As suggested, the sales tax is not new. In various forms, and subject to various modifications, it has been applied in numerous countries at different periods, particularly since the time of Philip II in Spain.

During our Civil War a sales tax was imposed and covered substantially all sales transactions. Our present revenue law imposes a tax upon the sales of certain articles. In my opinion there never will come a time when the sales tax, in one form or another, will not be a part of our revenue system. I would be willing to support a proposition to levy an excise upon additional consumable commodities from which the Government undoubtedly would obtain a considerable revenue. I am inclined to think that the Government could obtain a very large sum from a tax upon gasoline. Other commodities will readily suggest themselves to Senators upon which a sales tax—that is, a tax upon the sale of the same—could without any great hardship to the people be levied and which would yield important revenues to the Government. It is quite likely that we will be compelled from time to time to enlarge the list of articles subject to an excise. However, we should scrutinize with the utmost caution any project which now seeks to increase the excises on commodities, particularly such as are vital to the welfare of the great masses of the people.

The faculty theory of taxation has commended itself to the American people. Taxes constitute a burden and always will. Rich and poor alike would, if they could, escape them. No one welcomes the heavy hand of the taxgatherer. We are compelled by reason of the necessities of the Government to continue heavy burdens upon the people. In framing a tax measure at the present time, I believe that we should keep constantly before us the thought that the taxes should be placed where they can be most easily borne. Of course, in levying taxes the question of benefits to be derived should be taken into account, but the ability to pay is, after all, a matter of prime importance. No tax measure should be framed with the idea of punishing or preferring; justice and equity should be the guide in formulating tax measures.

Of course, there will be sharp conflicts and irreconcilable differences in opinion whenever an attempt is made to prepare a revenue bill. The various schools of economic thought will sharply clash with respect to the subjects to be taxed and the policies to be pursued.

Unanimity is impossible. Radicals and those who seek to nationalize property will ask for confiscatory tax measures. Some who have enormous holdings and great wealth will contend for measures that will relieve them and their wealth from legitimate burdens and pass them on to those who are least able to bear them. Wealth must understand that the Government protects it—and it should—and that a considerable portion of the expenses incident to the maintenance of law and order and all forms of government—municipal, State, and National—result from its protection. Our civilization is founded upon the right of private ownership in property, and the Government has no more right to confiscate private property under the guise of taxation than have individuals that right.

But, as stated, the wealth of the country and the business of the country, now and hereafter, will be called upon to bear a very large part of the tax burdens imposed by the National Government. I am in favor of those who derive large incomes making important contributions toward the Government's expenditures, and corporations which play so important a part in the business life of the country and which draw to themselves so much of the wealth of the country must expect to pay heavy taxes. The net profits of the corporations of our country are stupendous, and it is only just that they should be regarded as important sources from which Federal revenue can be obtained.

The profits of many corporations are exceedingly great. Indeed, they are excessive, and can only result from the fixing of prices upon their products and commodities which almost amount to extortion. Competition in many fields of business activity has been practically destroyed, and as a result the net profits are beyond all reason. There are many reasons why corporations of this character should be subjected to an excess-profits tax, and I am inclined to believe that a modified form of excess-profits tax should be adopted and become a part of this bill.

When Woodrow Wilson addressed Congress in May, 1919, he recommended a rectification of the present system of internal taxation and submitted certain fundamental recommendations as a basis for a revenue system. He urged a simplification of the present law, and stated that the system of taxation should be simple and easy of administration and the taxes as little burdensome as possible, consistent with the imperative needs of the Government. He saw that production must not be arrested by reason of burdensome taxation, and at the same time recognized that there were certain main sources from which the revenue must be drawn. As I recall, he referred to the excess-profits tax as one of these sources.

However, he contended that the then existing rates should not be long maintained, but suggested that undue profits should be taxed and that this could be done without any discouragement of legitimate business activity. Of course, Senators will recall that President Wilson also recommended the continuance of the income tax and the estate tax as permanent sources for Federal revenue. As stated, Mr. President, I am inclined to think that we could with propriety adopt a modified form of excess-profits tax and write it into the present measure.

Mr. SMOOT rose.

Mr. KING. Does my colleague desire to interrupt me? If so, I yield.

Mr. SMOOT. My colleague says that in war times he would vote for taxes for which he would not vote now, because in war times billions of dollars of taxation were necessary. How are we going to materially lessen taxation when for many years we will be required to meet obligations of the Government that will run into the billions of dollars? If we take the items of interest on our obligations, the annual appropriations necessary to care for the disabled soldiers of the war and the sinking fund, as provided by law, of 2½ per cent of our obligations, there are required under those three items alone nearly $2,000,000,000, without including a cent to maintain the operations of the Government.

So that anybody who thinks that there is going to be light taxation in this Nation for the next quarter of a century must have his mind disabused of such an idea. It can not be realized, and we might just as well, Mr. President, prepare now a tax bill which will provide the billions which we will have to raise every year, rather than to have any mere temporary measure and let the industries of the country hang suspended in the air, not knowing where they stand or what changes will be made in the law or what they may be required to pay next year or the year after. We ought to get on a firm basis of taxation, a basis that all the people of the United States will understand and under which the business of this country will bear its full share of taxation and the wealth of the Nation will likewise bear its full share of taxation, for nobody, so far as I know, wants to relieve them of it.

I wish to say that I concur in the statement of my colleague that the present revenue law was passed as a war measure, and it was not criticized as it would have been criticized except for that reason. When the law of 1918 was about to be voted upon in this Chamber I stood where I am standing to-day and called attention to the fact then that at no time in the next quarter of a century would the expenses of the Government be less than $3,500,000,000, and it was then, Mr. President, that I first referred to a sales tax in order to meet the obligations under which our Government would rest for many years in the future.

Mr. McLEAN. Mr. President——

Mr. KING. Permit me to conclude, and then I shall yield to the Senator. I arose only for a few words and have been diverted and desire to quickly conclude.

Mr. President, I agree with what my distinguished colleague has said concerning the stupendous sums which will be required by the Federal Government for many years to come. I agree that the burdens resting upon it call for billions of dollars annually. My colleague is right in his view that a rational taxation system should be employed, one which will have some attributes of permanency. A transitory and constantly changing system of taxation is subject to objections, and I should welcome a plan that would be reasonably permanent. However, with the changing conditions an inflexible system of taxation is scarcely possible. Certain fundamentals, as President Wilson suggested, may be followed, but important and indeed certain fundamental changes will occur as the years come and go. There will, however, be variations and modifications because of the change in economic and industrial conditions. Indeed, political conditions result in radical departures in taxation, as well as in many other directions.

I concur in the views that my colleague has expressed concerning the large appropriations which the Federal Government will be called upon to meet in the future. We will never get down to prewar conditions in respect to Government expenditures. Thrift and economy seem to have been forgotten.

All efforts to adopt economy in Federal appropriations have proven futile. We are appropriating hundreds of millions annually more than the imperative needs of the country demand. We have gotten so in the habit of spending that it seems impossible to close the doors of the Treasury to the constant invasions from every quarter. And the spirit of spending has extended to the school districts, cities, counties, and States.

Some time ago I made inquiry to ascertain to what extent the general spirit of extravagance had invaded our State and municipal governments. I was not surprised to learn that they had joined in the mad march of extravagance, as a result of which the costs of municipal and State governments had within a very few years increased from 50 to 100 per cent. Practically all of the municipalities of our country are in debt. The States are likewise in debt and the outstanding obligations of municipalities, counties and States aggregate hundreds of millions of dollars. As we know, capital is being absorbed by the tax-exempt securities issued by the Nation and by the various States and the political subdivisions therein.

The people, I regret to say, do not manifest that concern and indeed that alarm, which one would expect, at the almost overwhelming burden of indebtedness which has been created and is in many States being constantly augmented.

Though we have in Europe an object lesson of national bankruptcy, we do not seem to be appalled or even concerned at the figures showing the enormous obligations of our Government and the American people. With the appetites which we have developed, it will require annually between four and five billions of dollars for years to come to meet the expenses of the National Government.

Demands will be made for Federal appropriations which will make impossible any material reduction from the figures stated of our annual national expenses. The demands for rivers and harbors, for highways and internal improvements, for the veterans of the World War, and many other subjects, will result in budget demands so great as to make our tax burdens oppressive indeed.

In my opinion appropriations will be made during the next quarter of a century to the veterans of the World War and to their dependents which will aggregate $20,000,000,000. I wish we could devise means to reduce expenses and provide a rational, scientific, and just system of taxation. My colleague's desires in this respect are most commendable. He has presented a proposition which has many advantages. As I have suggested, it has many disadvantages. Unquestionably, the plan contemplates, as all sales taxes contemplate, the transfer to the consumer of the tax. I shall not discuss the subject now. Several weeks ago I presented to the Senate my views upon the question of a sales tax. We are now considering a bill reported by the Finance Committee. It has some features which will command the support of substantially all Members of the Senate, but it contains provisions which I regard as unwise and wholly indefensible. It comes with a smell of war upon nearly every page of the bill. It is the war revenue bill modified in some respects, patched and pieced, but not improved. Indeed, in some particulars it is far more objectionable than the law which it seeks to amend.

I was reading what President Harding had said when interrupted. He promised a "simplified tax system." The Republicans promised it, but they are not giving us a simplified tax system. Indeed, in my opinion the present law will be more cumbersome, more complex, more difficult of interpretation and administration than the existing law.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President——

Mr. KING. I yield.

Mr. McCUMBER. The Senator from Utah, since he has been in Congress, has never been an extreme partisan. I think we will all have to give him that credit. The Senator has quoted the Republican platform for a reduction of taxes. There is not any question about the good intention of those connected with the Republican Party to lower taxes, but I think the Senator will agree with me that you must have a tax sufficient to take care of the expenses of the Government, and the expenses of the Government, whether extravagant or otherwise, are always governed by both sides of the Chamber. It takes both sides of the Chamber to reduce our expenditures, and if we are unable to reduce them to a less sum than four and a half billions of dollars for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1922, we must have a revenue sufficient to meet that $4,500,000,000, and we must have that no matter what the Republican platform or the Democratic platform or any other platform says.

If we do not reduce the tax more than 15 per cent it is because the expenditures which must be met are not more than 15 per cent less than they were before.

What we will have to do is to make the best kind of a tax bill we can out of the one that is before us. Let Senators offer amendments if they think it is wrong in any respect, but we can not reduce the taxes below what is necessary to run the Government; and upon the estimate that is made, whatever we may say in criticism to the effect that the tax ought to be more here or less there, we are not raising any more than is absolutely necessary to conduct the Government. I think we ought to give our attention to that, more than to what the Republican Party said or the Democratic Party said. Let us get together as patriotic citizens. I think the Senator and myself have voted rather uniformly against extravagances, but we are not the majority. We have to take Congress as it is; and when it passes bills that require large sums of money we have to raise the money to meet them. Let us get together and try to pass a tax bill that will raise it with the least amount of injury to the business of the country, and make the tax as light as we possibly can. We gain nothing by attempting to make a purely partisan question out of this.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I agree with what my friend has said; and when he appeals in his impressive and persuasive way no one can resist him. I would not have ventured to read the Republican platform in his presence—because it must be rather confusing to my Republican friends when attention is called to it and to the promises made and to the record of fulfillment, or rather, lack of fulfillment—had it not been for the observations made by my good friend, the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. MOSES]. I thought, and I say that with all kindness, that his criticism of the experts—many, if not all, of whom are Republicans, and all of whom are good men—was a little unjust; and as a Democrat I wished to defend them and testify to their ability and to their earnest and consistent labors.

If I understand the Senator from North Dakota, I agree with him that this is an imperfect bill.

And I feel that in no partisan spirit Democrats should give what aid they can to perfecting it, so that we may secure as good a measure as our Republican friends will permit us to have. They are in control, and they will frame the bill. Our criticisms may compel some changes—changes for the better—but it will still be a Republican bill. That has repeatedly been said by Republican leaders. The Senator speaks of extravagance. Doubtless I have offended some on this side of the aisle because of my criticism of the action of my party upon various bills carrying appropriations which I conceived to be unwise and improper. While I am a Democrat and believe in the fundamental principles of the Democratic Party, so long as I am here I shall act in accordance with my best judgment and vote as my conscience dictates; and if my views are not in accord with those of members of my party I shall nevertheless express them upon all appropriate occasions and cast my vote in accordance therewith.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the adoption of the amendment offered by the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. MCCUMBER] to the amendment of the committee.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President, I should like to know whether that amendment has gone over?

The VICE PRESIDENT. It has not gone over.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I should like to ask the Senator from North Dakota, then, whether it is the intention, in the case of the head of a family having an income of over $5,000, to give him an exemption of $2,000 only, and to tax him, as the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT] said, $20 for the first dollar over the $5,000?

Mr. MCCUMBER. The intention is to avoid that. We have passed it over now and discussed other features and politics for nearly an hour——

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I understood the Chair to say that it had not been passed over.

Mr. MCCUMBER. I say, we have passed it over for some time while we were discussing other matters, and I have not objected to the long time we have taken in discussing other matters, because I thought the Senator from Nebraska was getting up a simplified amendment. If the Senator can not draw it in three-quarters of an hour, does he want another day for it?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. No. I should like to ask the Senator whether he agrees with the meaning given by the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT]?

Mr. MCCUMBER. Yes; I do.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. The object of the committee in this amendment, then, is not to take from such a taxpayer in taxes more than the income that he derives over $5,000 and up to $5,500? Is that right?

Mr. MCCUMBER. No. He pays the same tax that he would pay if his income were $5,000, of course.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. And if his income is $5,500, what does he pay?

Mr. MCCUMBER. He pays on $5,500, of course.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. He gets an exemption of $2,000?

Mr. MCCUMBER. Of $2,000.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Whereas, if it were less than $5,000, he would get an exemption of $2,500. He loses that $500 exemption, does he?

Mr. MCCUMBER. He loses the $500 exemption if he goes above $5,000; that is clear.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Is it the intention of the committee by this amendment to levy the tax so that the tax will simply equal the excess between $5,000 and $5,500? Is that the intention of the committee?

Mr. MCCUMBER. Why, of course it would be plus his ordinary tax if his income were $5,000.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. The Senator ought to be able to answer my question. Suppose his income is $5,000?

Mr. MCCUMBER. The Senator is making his question a great deal more complex than this amendment.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Then let the Senator explain what the intention is.

Mr. MCCUMBER. I have explained it over and over again until it is getting ad nauseam.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I think not. Is it the intention of the committee to levy a tax upon this taxpayer on his income over $5,000 in such a way that the tax will not exceed the excess income?

Mr. MCCUMBER. Yes; and if he has an income of $5,010 he will pay a tax upon the $10.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. What tax will he pay—the whole $10?

Mr. MCCUMBER. I think the way it would read would be this: A tax on the $5,000, supposing he had just $5,000, plus the tax on the $10.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Then he would be taxed $10 on the excess of $10?

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. That is, the tax would equal the excess over the $5,000?

Mr. LENROOT. Exactly.

Mr. SMOOT. That is exactly what it is.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I am glad to know it, because I think I have an amendment that covers it, but I have had great difficulty in ascertaining what the committee was trying to get at, and I suggest this change:

If the head of a family living with husband or wife has an income exceeding $5,000 and not exceeding $5,500, the exemption shall be $2,000, and rate of tax on that part of the income over $5,000 shall in such case be 100 per cent.

Mr. SMOOT. No, Mr. President.

Mr. MCCUMBER. Will the Senator please explain what he means by that?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. You propose to take away from that man in taxes every dollar that he makes between $5,000 and $5,500.

Mr. SMOOT. No.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. That is what you said. His exemption is reduced from $2,500 to $2,000, so he loses $500.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Yes.

Mr. LENROOT. If I may give an illustration, I think the committee will agree with this construction: If a man has an income of $5,000, with an exemption of $2,500, he will pay a tax of $100.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Yes.

Mr. LENROOT. If his income were $5,001, he would have an exemption of $2,000 and he would be called upon to pay a tax of $120.40 under the bill as it stands; but under the committee amendment he would be called upon to pay $100 plus the tax on $1, and that is all.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. But he has lost his $500 exemption, has he not?

Mr. LENROOT. Oh, no; he is not called upon to pay any more than the excess over $5,000.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. This amendment provides no change, as far as the exemption is concerned?

Mr. LENROOT. No.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. He has lost his $500 exemption?

Mr. LENROOT. Yes.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I understood the Senator to say that if the taxpayer's income is a dollar over the $5,000 he loses that exemption?

Mr. LENROOT. Yes.

Mr. McCUMBER. He loses $500.

Mr. WADSWORTH. That is provided for in another part of the bill. That is not in this particular amendment.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. But he has lost his exemption?

Mr. WADSWORTH. Yes.

Mr. SMOOT. That is, he has lost $500 of his exemption.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. The amendment is so drawn that you will save to him that loss to the extent that his income covers that?

Mr. LENROOT. Exactly.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Then, if his income is $500 more, that is the extent to which you can tax him, and you take that whole $500.

Mr. LENROOT. No; the taxes would be figured on the $500 income.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. But I mean to say he has lost it because he has lost his exemption. His exemption has been cut down from $2,500 to $2,000.

Mr. LENROOT. That only means $20 of taxes.

Mr. SMOOT. That is the limit.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Why does it not apply to the others over that?

Mr. SMOOT. Because it is the tax on the exemption.

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, I move that the Senate adjourn. Let us not waste time.

The motion was rejected.

Mr. McCUMBER. I suggest that the Senator from Nebraska call in Dr. Adams as an expert to draft the proposed amendment.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I will say that I am not going to vote for this amendment until somebody tells me what it means. There are very few people I have talked to who can say definitely what it means; and when I put questions to the Senator, he himself is not able to explain what it means.

Mr. McCUMBER. I am able to tell what I understand it means, and if the Senator can not understand it in the same way, repeating again and again what I have said will not help him out.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. May I suggest to the Senator from North Dakota that in view of the fact that the Senator from Rhode Island is to offer an amendment to this section later, the matter be passed over for the present?

Mr. ASHURST. I object to its being passed over.

Mr. McCUMBER. I would suggest that we pass upon it. There was a unanimous-consent agreement that after we pass upon the amendment the Senator from Rhode Island should not be precluded from offering his amendment as a substitute.

Mr. HARRIS. Mr. President, I have an amendment similar to the one to be offered by the Senator from Rhode Island, which I would like to have included in the unanimous-consent agreement.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The question now is on agreeing to the amendment to the amendment offered by the Senator from North Dakota.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question now is on agreeing to the amendment as amended.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will state the next amendment passed over.

The ASSISTANT SECRETARY. The next amendment passed over is, on page 23, after line 2, to strike out:

SEC. 207. That section 211 of the revenue act of 1918 is amended by adding at the end thereof a new subdivision to read as follows:

"(c) For the calendar year 1922 and each calendar year thereafter the rate upon the amount by which the net income exceeds $66,000 shall be 32 per cent instead of the rates specified in subdivision (a) in respect thereto."

The amendment was agreed to.

The ASSISTANT SECRETARY. The next amendment passed over is, on page 23, after line 9, to insert:

SURTAX.

SEC. 211 (a). That, in lieu of the tax imposed by section 211 of the revenue act of 1918, but in addition to the normal tax imposed by section 210 of this act, there shall be levied, collected, and paid for each taxable year upon the net income of every individual—

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, what has been read up to 65 per cent is the law as it now stands, and is intended to apply for the year 1921. I suggest that we adopt that part of the amendment. Then I will offer another amendment for the succeeding year.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, I move to strike out beginning on line 8, page 28, down to and including line 20, page 30, and insert in lieu thereof amendment numbered 5 on the pamphlet.

Mr. KING. Let it be read, please.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will state the amendment.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, the amendment which I offered to this section of the bill, the surtax brackets, proposed to raise the surtax brackets to a maximum of 52 per cent. The amendment now offered by the committee raises the brackets to a maximum of 50 per cent, a difference of only 2 per cent. I am not disposed to make any issue with the committee because of that slight difference. The bill as originally proposed by the committee would have relieved incomes above $68,000 of $90,000,000 of taxes. The proposed change, raising the maximum to 50 per cent, will relieve taxpayers with incomes above $68,000 of only $16,000,000 as against $90,000,000 under the original bill. The changes made in the lower brackets—that is, the brackets upon incomes less than $68,000—will reduce the surtaxes of the taxpayers in that group about $42,000,000. Under those circumstances, Mr. President, I am not disposed to antagonize this particular amendment, and I do not know of anyone on this side of the Chamber who wishes to.

I recognize the fact that it is the purpose of the bill to relieve the taxpayers as far as possible of the high war-time taxes. When we adopted the surtax provision in the 1918 bill, carrying the rates up to a maximum of 65 per cent, we were required to raise by taxation about $8,000,000,000.

Since that time it has been necessary to raise lesser sums as the years have passed by, and we have now got down to the point where the Secretary of the Treasury estimates that we will need only about $4,000,000,000 to defray the expenses of the Government. I think the Secretary has made an underestimate. I think it will require something over $4,500,000,000. But taking his estimates, and the bill is based upon his estimates, there is a margin for reduction; and yet from the time we first levied our surtaxes up to the maximum of 65 per cent there has not been a single solitary reduction made in the surtaxes.

We are now making some reductions, and it is not the first time we have made reductions. We are for the second time making reductions. We reduced the miscellaneous taxes this year something over $300,000,000, including transportation, which is classed as a miscellaneous tax. If the bill becomes a law we will reduce the taxes upon corporate incomes several hundred million dollars.

I can see no reason why under these circumstances the taxes of individual taxpayers, whether they be large taxpayers or small taxpayers, should not be allowed to participate to some extent in the reduction. I do not think $16,000,000 reduction in incomes over $66,000, as compared with $42,000,000 reduction in incomes under $66,000, is an undue share in the general scheme of reduction. I do not know whether all my colleagues on this side of the Chamber agree with me about it, but so far as I am concerned I desire to be fair toward every kind and class of taxpayer in the country. I myself do not desire, when reducing taxes upon one class of our fellow citizens from the high level of 1918, to make no reduction upon the other class.

Mr. President, I think I do not desire at this time to make any further comments upon this amendment.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, I am presenting this amendment on behalf of the chairman who is at present absent. There has been much criticism of the committee in the Senate because of its cutting down the higher surtaxes, and inasmuch as this is a compromise between the higher brackets in the present law and the committee amendments, I think I shall not seriously object to the change.

But, Mr. President, I wish to say something in behalf of the committee which formulated and reported the committee amendment cutting the higher surtaxes down to 32 per cent. If there has been any one complaint throughout the country about the tax bill, it has been that the higher surtaxes and the excess-profits taxes were preventing people from using their capital in any line of new business and diverting it from well-established lines of business into the purchase of tax-free securities. I recall that the Republican platform, the Republicans believing that there was a real danger in continuing the excess-profits tax, specifically declared against it and by innuendo at least declared against the higher surtaxes.

Mr. President, there are three important elements that never should be lost sight of in constructing a revenue bill.

The first, and absolutely indispensable one, is that the measure must bring in a revenue sufficient to meet every expense of the Government. No matter how heavy the load or galling the burden the tax in its entirety must measure up to that requirement.

The individual in times of stress may ask and receive an extension of time to meet his obligations. A great government can not continue to function at all unless it meets in cash its daily obligations.

The second requirement in a just tax measure is that the heavier burden, so far as is possible, shall be borne by those best able to bear it. That is the very basis of an income tax, and, from the standpoint of equity, it is undoubtedly the fairest and most acceptable tax measure that could be passed.

The third element is that the tax shall be so apportioned and so enforced as to least interfere with the normal course of business. And this latter carries with it the principle that it shall not be laid with such a heavy hand upon any business of the country as to paralyze the very industry upon whose success we must always rely for every dollar of revenue received.

While I have placed this element third in the order of arrangement, it is really first in the order of importance to the Nation itself.

I fear the general public fail to give just weight and importance to this feature of a tax measure. Each individual views the tax as it affects him individually and loses sight of the fact that all taxes of every nature, character, or description—income, real estate and personal property taxes, excise taxes of every nature—must all come from those earnings in production, trades and professions, over and above the necessary cost of living.

The individual and corporation must make money before he or it can pay a dollar to the Government. Sound, profitable business is the very foundation upon which we must rest every levy of tax. The business of the country is as a tree with its thousands of branches, each bearing the golden fruit from which alone the Government can gather for its needs. You can by an overstrain destroy the productivity of any branch and render it unproductive for the next and succeeding years. You can blight the entire tree and destroy its fruitage.

Keeping in mind the eternal truth that all taxes must be paid out of earnings—earnings above the necessary living expenses of 110,000,000 people—unless there is a profit in the general business of the country over and above these living expenses there can be secured no revenue for governmental purposes.

Keeping in mind the fact that every tax should be considered with reference to its effect upon the business prosperity of the country, we are brought face to face with the proposition that is presented in connection with a reduction of the higher brackets of the surtax from 65 per cent to 32 per cent.

The House made 32 per cent the highest surtax bracket, which, added to the 8 per cent normal tax, would make the limit of taxation 40 per cent upon any income. This 32 per cent is reached when the income amounts to $66,000. Under the House bill, and under the bill as reported to the Senate, a man who has a net income of $66,000 would pay to the Government of the United States $26,400. If he were living in Wisconsin, he would pay an additional 12 per cent, or $7,920, making a total of $34,320.

As this higher tax of 65 per cent did not apply until after an income had reached above $100,000, the individual with such a large income could not very bitterly complain that the necessities of Government required that he turn over 65 per cent of all his earnings to the Federal Government. There would still be left sufficient for him to live very comfortably. And if this were all there was to the question we need not spend much time on it. But is it all?

When the House and the Senate reduced these surtaxes it was not through any consideration of or sympathy for those who were fortunate enough to have such large incomes. They were considering only the business interests of the country. They sought and received the advice of the Secretary of the Treasury and of all Treasury experts on the question of whether these higher surtaxes affected the business interests of the country and thereby made it more difficult for all taxpayers to meet the Government levy. It was claimed by the Secretary of the Treasury, supported by these experts, that, while these heavy brackets answered every purpose during war extravagances and immense profits, their effect at the present time was working disastrously to the interest of the Government.

First, because they were driving the capital of the country, which ought to go into business—the expansion of old and the institution of new lines of industrial activity—into nontaxable securities at an enormous rate.

Second, because stocks and interests in the several businesses of the country were being divided and distributed for the very purpose of avoiding the higher brackets.

Third, because it was estimated that a flat tax of 15 per cent on the profits of all corporations would, after the expiration of one year, bring in a greater revenue than would be obtained from these higher brackets of surtaxes. This matter was set out quite clearly by Secretary Mellon in his testimony before the Committee on Finance on this subject, pages 157 to 160, inclusive. I desire to read into the RECORD a portion of his testimony. He says:

And what supports that position—

is the record of the department as to the higher brackets of surtax, how they have dropped down; and it is rapidly coming to a place where they are unproductive. The reason is not only the fact that transactions are prevented, but with the high brackets of surtax there are so many ways of avoiding the tax to a man who has an income. Generally, what is referred to as the chief factor is the investment in tax-free securities. That is not so. The investment in tax-free securities is a large factor, but it is not the leading factor. There are many other methods.

For instance, from my knowledge of the incomes in business, etc., of individuals, I do not know among them any who to any large extent invest in tax-free securities, for the reason that they have not the free cash with which to do it. They are generally people who are in industrial lines of business, and they have to carry on their business and they need their capital. They can not get it out to invest it in tax-free securities. I do not think that is the largest item.

But if you take a man who may have an income of three or four hundred thousand dollars a year, or a larger amount, he can do so many things. He can divide up his property with his wife and his children, and that cuts his brackets down because his income is less, and he does not pay the high surtax. Or he can make trusts for his children and those to come after him and part with his property, with a trust that accumulates for them, and therefore he is relieved; he immediately drops from the higher surtax down to the lower tax.

There are dozens of plans. It is shown and proved in the result in the department where you see that the number of higher surtax people are dropping down and the revenue is going down.

There are so many of these different ways that I know of that have not been actually availed of. For instance, I know of a man who has a large income, a very high income. He invested in a piece of real estate. It was coal property. It cost about $4,000,000. The reason he invested in that was that he considered that at some time in the future it would have greater value, and that perhaps at that time in the future there would not be the same surtax or high tax rate, and in the meantime it would be increasing in value. He was using his money in other directions, but he bought that property on a payment of a comparatively small amount down. He made a payment of $200,000 down and then a payment of $200,000 a year running each year for 10 years, and at the end of the 10 years he would pay the balance or the bulk of the purchase money. He paid 6 per cent interest on the money.

That was the effect of his large surtax. In that instance he paid somewhere about 65 per cent. The interest at 6 per cent was deductible from his income and therefore the Government paid 60 per cent of his 6 per cent interest. In other words, the Government carries the payment of that interest for the time, and he goes free to the end of the time and pays off his property, and he can sell it then and make his profit; and if there is not a large tax at that time, he is that much ahead.

But the point is that in the meantime the Government has relieved him. Instead of paying 6 per cent he is paying 2½ per cent to carry that property, because the interest he pays is deductible from income and he gets that deduction which relieves him to that extent.

* * * * * * *

Then, there is another still greater injury to the country from that sort of tax. I can remember, in the community where I live, the favorite investment by men who had a large income, or by executors of an estate, was in real estate mortgages—

And I should like to have some of my western friends listen to this—mortgages upon real estate, and the money would be used for building, etc. It used to be a 5 per cent mortgage. A 6 per cent mortgage was a good security. To-day there is no such thing in our district, scarcely, as a 6 per cent real estate mortgage. They can not get the money. They can not get the money to invest in real estate on that sort of a basis, because the people who always did invest their money in that direction were people of ample or large incomes who have these big surtaxes, and therefore if they only get 6 per cent on their investments their net is perhaps only 3 per cent, and they do not make the investment. What is the result? Capital does not flow into investments in real estate, into buildings and construction of that kind. It is diverted and obstructed from going there.

Mr. President, on yesterday I received a letter from a gentleman of my State who has been handling, as is the expression, eastern money for loans upon farm mortgages. He sends me an excerpt from a letter of an eastern investor who declines to invest any further. We did not have a very good crop for the last two years there and our interest is a little behind, but that is not the reason why he does not continue investing in real estate mortgages. This is what he says—I now quote from the excerpt:

The farmers in North Dakota certainly are in a bad position. I do not want to crowd any of those where I hold their loans; but, on the other hand, my position is this: At the present time a 5 per cent New York State municipal bond is better for me than a 7½ or 8 per cent farm mortgage, on account of the Federal and State income taxes; and in addition to this I can now buy municipal bonds extending over a period of from 20 to 30 years, and I figure that in the meantime interest rates will have gone down so much that the rate which I can obtain now will seem high, and I feel that the money will be safely invested if anything happens to me, so that the family would not have these matters to look after.

But the particular thing that I wish to call attention to is the declaration that—

At the present time a 5 per cent New York State municipal bond—

Which, of course, is free from taxation—

is better for me than a 7½ or 8 per cent farm mortgage, on account of Federal and State income taxes.

Senators must remember that the total taxes paid by the individual are not embraced alone in the Federal taxes which we are levying, for to the 8 per cent normal tax and the 42 per cent surtax, making 50 per cent, there has to be added from 12 to 20 per cent imposed by way of taxation in Wisconsin, New York, Pennsylvania, Oregon, California, Oklahoma, and other States, so that, including the State taxation, the total approximates 62 per cent.

The Secretary of the Treasury says, and he is supported by every expert in the department, that we shall get more money out of the tax if it is levied at a less rate, because with a less rate those receiving large incomes will invest them in tax-paying property rather than in tax-exempt property; so that incomes all along the line will yield a greater return to the Government.

The purpose of a tax is not to punish or to try to get even with anybody, but to secure the greatest amount of revenue consistent with the prosperity of the country evenly distributed; and any method of levying the surtax that will tend to drive income back into tax-paying securities rather than into tax-exempt securities or that will tend to drive income into investment in mortgages upon real estate rather than into the bonds of cities will help the country.

I confess I have not changed my mind. I voted for 32 per cent as the highest bracket of the surtax. I voted for it upon the testimony of Mr. Mellon, upon the testimony of thousands of people who have given me the same evidence directly or indirectly as that contained in the excerpt from the letter written by a gentleman in New York, I think, to a citizen of North Dakota and by him sent to me.

Mr. KENYON. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator a question?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. EDGE in the chair). Does the Senator from North Dakota yield to the Senator from Iowa?

Mr. McCUMBER. Certainly.

Mr. KENYON. Was there any evidence before the committee as to the extent to which nontaxable securities have been issued in this country?

Mr. McCUMBER. Yes.

Mr. KENYON. May I ask the Senator what it was?

Mr. McCUMBER. According to the evidence the amount can not be stated with exactness, but it is estimated by the experts as being all the way from twelve billion to fifteen billion dollars. Many others put the figures as high as $16,000,000,000; in fact, I have seen some statements to the effect that it is as high as $20,000,000,000. Such securities can always be sold now if they are good and if the property behind them is adequate; in fact, there is great demand at all times for tax-exempt securities.

Mr. OVERMAN. May I ask the Senator whether the estimate he has given includes municipal and county bonds?

Mr. McCUMBER. Certainly; it includes all tax-free bonds such as State and municipal bonds, Government bonds, and so forth.

Mr. WATSON of Indiana. Mr. President, my recollection is that Prof. Seligman, of Columbia University, advised us that, taking into consideration all of the State, county, and township bonds, including school bonds, gravel-road bonds, and so forth, together with Federal bonds, the amount of tax-exempt securities now outstanding aggregated $30,000,000,000.

Mr. KENYON. The Senator from Utah told me the other day they were being issued at the rate of $800,000,000 a month, as I understood him.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, some days ago the question came up as to whether such bonds were being issued to-day and sold in large quantity. So I had an investigation made of the sales of tax-exempt bonds beginning on January 1, 1921, up to and including September 30, 1921, or a period of nine months, and during that time there were $880,000,000 of tax-exempt bonds sold in the United States.

Mr. KENYON. In what period of time was that?

Mr. SMOOT. Nine months.

Mr. KENYON. Then I misunderstood the Senator.

Mr. CALDER. How much?

Mr. SMOOT. $880,000,000; or, in other words, they are being sold at the rate of nearly $100,000,000 every month right now. Not a day passes but that we have coming to our desks advertisements of tax-exempt bonds, bearing the heading "These bonds are exempt from all Federal income taxes," or at least that is always understood. I have one here offering tax-exempt bonds from cities in Connecticut, in Missouri, in New York, in Rhode Island, in Massachusetts, in Vermont, and in Tennessee, amounting to hundreds of millions of dollars.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President, will the Senator tell us whether that includes Federal securities as well?

Mr. SMOOT. There is not one in this list; no. The $880,000,000 is made up of tax-exempt securities outside of the Federal securities.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Can the Senator tell us the amount of transactions in Federal securities?

Mr. SMOOT. There has been no increase in those.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Also, let me inquire of the Senator whether there are any duplications in that list?

Mr. SMOOT. Not at all.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. How can evidence be gathered as to that?

Mr. SMOOT. They get the figures from all the exchanges that sell tax-exempt bonds.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Exactly. An exchange reports to-day that there has been a sale of $100,000 of tax-exempt securities, and those same tax-exempt securities are put upon the market to-morrow, and they report $100,000 more.

Mr. SMOOT. No; that is not the case, Mr. President.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Are these the original issues?

Mr. SMOOT. These are the original issues of bonds; and not only that, but the names are given, and the date of issue, and the rate of interest.

Mr. KENYON. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from North Dakota yield to the Senator from Iowa?

Mr. McCUMBER. I yield.

Mr. KENYON. In this connection, since this matter is becoming a national menace, I should like to ask the Senator from Utah what has become of his constitutional amendment on the subject?

Mr. SMOOT. The amendment was referred to the Judiciary Committee, and I have not as yet appeared before the committee. I knew there was no use whatever in trying to crowd it in the present congested condition in the Senate of legislation that must be passed immediately; but I will say to the Senator that just as soon as this legislative situation breaks so that committees can consider other matters I am going to ask the Judiciary Committee to consider that bill.

Mr. KENYON. I am glad to know it.

Mr. PENROSE. Mr. President, will the Senator from North Dakota yield to me?

Mr. McCUMBER. I yield to the Senator from Pennsylvania.

Mr. PENROSE. The Senator from Iowa [Mr. KENYON] has used the term "national menace." It does not seem to me it is well taken. We might as well abandon the doctrine of State sovereignty if the National Government can tax State indebtedness. Every State could be put out of commission to-morrow by a hostile majority in control of the Federal Government if that were the case. In my opinion, it is preposterous to suppose that any State in the Union would deliberately sacrifice its prerogative of sovereignty by entertaining favorably such a constitutional amendment as has been suggested. The sole reason why these local securities are exempt is because the municipalities and the States would be absolutely out of commission as sovereign, independent entities if their indebtedness were taxable by the Federal Government. If we are to abandon the fundamentals of our institutions, well and good; but I hesitate to let the term "national menace" pass unchallenged.

Mr. CALDER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. McCUMBER. I yield to the Senator from New York.

Mr. CALDER. I desire to call the attention of the Senator from North Dakota to the fact that since it became apparent that we were about to continue these high rates of surtaxes the value of these tax-exempt securities has increased on the market of late. This is particularly true of certain Liberty bonds and other Government issues, which have gone up 10 or 15 points. The public knew that they would be the really valuable investments for years to come.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President——

Mr. McCUMBER. I yield to the Senator from North Carolina.

Mr. SIMMONS. The Senator has stated that there is something like $30,000,000,000 of tax-free securities in this country. My information is that there is not much over $10,000,000,000 of tax-exempt securities. The Senator must remember that our Liberty bonds are not exempt from surtaxes, except the 3½ per cent bonds. There are enormous quantities of Government bonds in the country, but the great bulk of the Government's indebtedness at this time consists in the bonds floated for the purpose of winning the war. All of that mass of bonds except the 3½ per cent bonds is subject to the surtax, and it can not be escaped.

Mr. CALDER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me further?

Mr. McCUMBER. I yield.

Mr. CALDER. I rise to suggest to the Senator from North Carolina that the bonds to which he refers, these Federal bonds that are taxable, are held to-day in the main by our savings institutions in the various States, in whose hands they are tax exempt, and by our life insurance companies. When these so-called Federal bonds that are said to pay taxes are held by savings banks or life insurance companies the income is not subject to taxation, and I think, if the Senator will inquire, he will find that many of them are held in that way. I know that in my own State over $2,000,000,000 worth are held by the savings banks alone and are tax exempt.

Mr. SIMMONS. If the Senator will pardon me further, I think there are two classes of people who bought our war bonds. One of them were the men of relatively small incomes and the other were the insurance companies and the trust companies and the savings banks of the country. The people of whom the Senator from North Dakota is now speaking, these individuals of vast incomes and great fortunes, were not great buyers of Government bonds during the war, and they have not been great buyers of Government bonds since the war. My information is that more than one-half of the bonds that were issued to win the war were bought and are held to-day by men whose incomes are less than $66,000 a year.

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. McCUMBER. In just a moment.

Mr. President, I do not know exactly the amount of the tax-free securities in the United States. It has been given to us as between twelve and fifteen billions of dollars. I think Otto Kahn a short time ago wrote an article which appeared in one of the magazines, in which he stated that he had personally traced and counted up more than $15,000,000,000 of tax-free securities which were still extant. Whatever the sum may be, however, I think there are enough of them, so that with all of these municipal bonds they can absorb these large incomes which otherwise would go into lines of business which might pay a little better.

I now yield to the Senator from Georgia.

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. Mr. President, there is one thought that has been in my mind during this long debate, in which there has been frequent reference to the tax-exempt securities issued by States, counties, towns, and cities. It is this: By the law of our State, at least, all those securities go directly to the people and a majority vote has to be given in favor of their issuance. They have to be validated by a court. The money for which they are sold is invested, as a rule, in bringing the town up to date, in lighting plants, waterworks, modern conveniences of life, academy building, good roads, good bridges, good streets, and so on. It occurs to me that if the money is wisely spent the expenditure is a permanent benefit of which all the people, without respect to their wealth or standing in society, get the benefit, and they get it for an indefinite term of years; and that benefit is perhaps quite equal to what the tax would be; and, of course, the tax-exempt feature enables the town or the city to get more money for the bonds, and therefore to make larger improvements.

Mr. McCUMBER. I agree entirely with the Senator from Georgia; and if we will stop a moment to consider the matter we will see that any amendment of the Constitution for the purpose of taxing these tax-free securities must be prospective only. It will not affect the fifteen billions that are out now, and if the Government can tax a State security issued for the development of the State in any sum that it sees fit, the purchaser of that bond will take it with the prospective tax in view, and he will bid for it only a sufficient amount to allow for the tax; so I do not think any amendment will be of any benefit whatever. The best way to benefit the matter, in my opinion, is to levy our taxes if we possibly can so as to encourage the investment of money in business and in the taxable securities rather than in the tax-free securities.

Mr. President, I voted for this 32 per cent tax. I do not wish to be considered as one who is looking out for the interests of the individual who receives an income of $500,000 a year. Heaven knows no one needs to worry much about him. He will take care of himself. With my little income, certainly I would not naturally be prejudiced in favor of the fellow with a million dollars of income; but I am looking to the interests of the country. I am looking forward to such legislation as will put the business of the country on its feet, so that the people engaged in business can pay their taxes. I agreed with Secretary McAdoo when he advised the repeal of the excess-profits tax upon the ground that it was interfering with business and was an obstacle to any new line of business in which there must be risk.

I agreed with Secretary Glass when he recommended the decrease in surtaxes, and with Secretary Houston when he recommended the same thing, and I agree with Secretary Mellon when he voices the same sentiment. I am convinced by the arguments of those Secretaries and by the experts—condemn them as much as you please—that their philosophy is the better philosophy. Perhaps, of course, we will lose a few hundred million dollars this year, but in a year or two the Government will be receiving large returns on account of the revival of the business of the country and the diverting of funds which go not only into tax-free securities, because Mr. Mellon does not make that the principal objection, but are held in the purchase of property and the property held, as in the case of the purchase of vast tracts of coal land by men who are refusing to sell, because if they sell and make a profit they have to pay a tax, and it is better to let the investment stand, and those people can afford to let it stand. I agree with them, and, agreeing with them, I can not convince myself that it is for the best interest of the country that we have a surtax amounting to 50 per cent, and on top of that surtax a State tax and surtax which will be from 12 to 15 per cent more, bringing the tax up to 65 per cent.

I may be mistaken. Those Secretaries may be mistaken. The experts may be mistaken; but the gentleman in New York who wrote that letter to the man in North Dakota was not mistaken, because he gave the reasons why he could better afford to buy New York bonds at 5 per cent than to buy North Dakota mortgages, even though the interest would be paid promptly, at 7½ and 8 per cent.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Mr. President, I do not want to get into any controversy with the Senator, because I am quite in accord with what he has stated, but I have been a little confused when the argument has been brought up that men with large incomes would expend their surplus in purchasing tax-exempt securities. Except in cases where there are new issues of a hundred million dollars a year, if that is true, I am wondering where they would go to obtain those tax-exempt securities. Would not the people who hold them wish to hold them still? Where would they get the amount of tax-exempt securities, except from new issues, which would be required for their investment?

Mr. McCUMBER. If there are new issues amounting to about a billion dollars a year, that will answer, and far more than answer, their demands.

Mr. TOWNSEND. The only testimony or statement made on that subject was that it was $880,000,000 in nine months.

Mr. McCUMBER. That would be very close to a billion a year.

Mr. SIMMONS and Mr. McKELLAR rose.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from North Dakota yield; and if so, to whom?

Mr. McCUMBER. I yield to the Senator from North Carolina. I think he rose first.

Mr. SIMMONS. I would like to ask the Senator from North Dakota if these subsequent issues of tax-free bonds, in which he says the incomes of these wealthy people will be invested, are not almost entirely issued by the States and by the subdivisions of the States, the counties, the cities, and the towns, and if the purpose of their issue is not in the main to build roads, to pave streets, to build schools, and to finance like public improvements and public works?

Mr. McCUMBER. I am assuming, of course, that each one of the States gets value received for the issue of its bonds.

Mr. SIMMONS. Exactly; and I would like to ask the Senator if the business of building public roads is not as much a part of the business of the country and as important a part of the business of the country as any business that is being carried on?

Mr. McCUMBER. Not necessarily.

Mr. SIMMONS. And are not the other purposes for which these municipalities are issuing these bonds a part of the business of the country at this time? If, therefore, a man of large wealth takes his income and invests it in those securities, he does not tie his money up, he does not hide his money, he does not put his income in a vault; he puts his income in the hands of a State or a county or a municipality that is going to use it in prosecuting as important a part of the business of the country as anything else is. If he wants to put his money in tax-free securities, let him do it. He simply is helping in this way to carry on business, and it is just as well for him to invest his money in that kind of business as to invest it in oil fields, factories, or other industries of the country.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, I am not going into the argument either for or against the proposition of the Government or the States going into the building of roads. I am assuming that they get a good return upon their money, and that in the end it will pay. We are in a position now where we need money invested in those lines of business which will produce taxes, not investments which will take taxes out of the Treasury. What we are looking forward to to-day is to get money into the Treasury, not to take money out of it. Merely taking money out of it to build a road is not putting anything into it. We have to make our profit. We have to make our profit in business before we can pay taxes even to purchase bonds, or anything else. I think that some municipalities and States have been extravagant, and I think the Government has been extravagant, and I think there are a great many matters which will be beneficial to the Government and to the States which well might be put off until we reach a more normal condition of business, when we can earn more and afford to expend more. But I am not going to argue the question of the propriety of building roads. They are mighty good things. I drive over them, and I appreciate good roads.

Mr. SIMMONS. If the Senator will pardon me, if these men of great wealth do not buy these tax-free bonds, then men of moderate means will buy them; men with incomes of a hundred thousand dollars or fifty thousand dollars will buy them. They will be taking money and investing it in tax-free securities; but their money will go into the channels of business, just as the money of the rich man would go into the channels of business if he invested it in tax-free securities issued by the States.

Mr. McCUMBER. I do not agree with the Senator that the ordinary business man is getting very much money to put into tax-free bonds or anything else at the present time. Most of them are struggling to make the two ends meet, and to cover the expenses of their business, with mighty little profit at the present time, and if there is any money going into the purchase of those bonds, it is from the money of men of large incomes, who find that they can better invest their money in those tax-free securities, or invest it in some other way by which they will not have to pay taxes upon the investment.

Mr. SIMMONS. The point I am making, Mr. President——

Mr. McCUMBER. I understand the Senator's point.

Mr. SIMMONS. My point is that under the law and under the Constitution these States and these counties and cities are permitted to issue the tax-free securities, and we can not prevent them from doing it unless we amend our Constitution. If they do issue them, they are sufficiently attractive to sell, and either the man of wealth or the man of moderate means, or somebody else who has the money to invest, will buy them, and to that extent he will escape taxation. We can not help that.

But the point I make is that the money which is invested, whether it be the money of a millionaire or the money of a man who has a moderate income of only thirty or fifty thousand dollars a year, will not be tied up, will not be locked up, will not be lost; it will go, in the regular course of business, into the channels of trade, and be as valuable an asset and as valuable a factor in the channels of trade, that part of the business of the country that is carried on by the municipalities and the States, as if it were invested in any industry.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, I will just make a passing reply to that. What the people are struggling for now is something to tax, and to develop business that gives them clothing, and a place to sleep in, and something to eat. That is what we are interested in more now than we are in having a smooth, slick pavement to walk on. We had better attend to the first necessities of life. When we are struggling for a means of raising money to pay debts, I would say, let us do away with a few of the luxuries, like the very nice sidewalks, the bright lights, and every other improvement in the city, that we may first pay our debts and get enough to live on and a place to sleep and something to wear.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President——

Mr. McCUMBER. I think I have yielded to the Senator long enough to make his point clear.

Mr. SIMMONS. Just one word more, and I shall not interrupt the Senator any more.

The Senator knows these securities are going to be bought by taxpayers; they are not going to be bought by nontaxpayers, but by taxpayers, and whatever money is invested in them will be free from taxes. It does not make any difference whose money it is, it is taxpayers' money.

Mr. McCUMBER. I can not see the applicability of the argument of the Senator, I confess.

I wish now to read a trifle more from the testimony of Mr. Mellon.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me a moment?

Mr. McCUMBER. Certainly.

Mr. NELSON. I have listened to the argument of the Senator from North Dakota, as well as to the argument of other Senators near me. It is very plausible on its face. It is based upon the theory that more funds are now needed to encourage industrial enterprises, that that is what the country needs at this time.

My idea is that there is an abundance of capital to engage in all the industrial enterprises that can be operated to advantage. The great trouble now is the lack of consumers, of people to buy the goods. The trouble now is not that there is not enough industrial enterprise or manufacturing carried on; the trouble is the stagnation which arises from the fact that they can not find markets for the goods they are able to make. A good many industrial enterprises have shut down, and others are running on short time, because they can not find a market.

The great market is our home market, among the people of this country, the men who have no income taxes of any account to pay. They are the great consumers, and we want to aid them and relieve them as much as we can. The plea to reduce this schedule of high income taxes on the theory that that is necessary to keep people from putting their money into nontaxable bonds and to have it invested in industrial enterprises is all out of place at this juncture and under the condition in which the country now is.

As I said a moment ago, there is plenty of money to run all the industrial enterprises of this country. The great need to-day is an increase in the army of consumers, both here and abroad, and securing better markets for our products. In order to enable the whole people to buy the goods manufactured here, we want to relieve them of taxes as much as possible.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, the Senator made substantially the same argument yesterday, or the day before, and I agree with his argument that there is capital enough in the country. I agree with the other part of the argument which he made the other day, and which he does not include to-day, that one of the troubles to-day is the question of the cost of production. He said, and it is true, that the common people can not afford to pay the cost of an article, because the labor and the material in it have gone so high that it costs so much that they can not afford to buy it. That is the reason why we can not find consumers. I agree with the Senator's statement to that effect, which he made the other day.

Mr. NELSON. We shall have to find a remedy for that condition.

Mr. McCUMBER. We can not remedy it all at once. As has been proposed in the matter of railway labor and railway rates, they will both have to come down, at the same time, probably, to get the desired result.

Mr. President, I think the reasons given by Secretary Mellon are cogent reasons, and he is supported by three of the preceding Secretaries of the Treasury. I think they are right. I may be in error. It may be that we know more about it than they do, and that their evidence is all wrong, but the committee was impressed with the views taken by these Secretaries and the testimony which was given, and the House was influenced in the same way. I think they were honest in their convictions, and I know the testimony supports them.

Mr. NELSON. Does not the Senator think the committee ought to be impressed by the wishes and views of the rank and file of the American people, in addition to the officials?

Mr. McCUMBER. Certainly; but the rank and file of the American people first want business. They want to make a living. They can not make a living unless we have business, and have successful business. We can not have successful business if we cripple it by any kind of legislation. That is all the claim is. We are listening to their desires when we are asking for this legislation, believing that it will help the situation.

Mr. EDGE. Mr. President——

Mr. McCUMBER. I would like if Senators would allow me just to finish reading Secretary Mellon's statement, and then I will yield the floor. Secretary Mellon further said:

> The chief result of that has been the high cost of rents. There has been scarcely any building in the last few years, or even now. To some extent that is on account of the high cost of materials, etc., but the great factor in the stoppage of building and in making this housing situation acute has been this law that prevented capital from flowing into investments that were always desirable and solid, the real estate investments of the people.
> Senator REED. Where does that capital find a place for investment?

That answers one of the questions here.

> Secretary MELLON. In all sorts of ways. Of course, they invest in tax-free securities, or they can get all kinds of investments at 7 and 8 per cent. Then there are these other methods of avoiding the tax. One way and another the capital does not go there. The result of that is that these laws that are wrong in principle, that are extreme in the way I speak of, have been the chief cause of the cessation of building houses. The result of that is that the rents of the people have been raised, and the consequence is that the wage earner, or the man of small income who has to rent his house, instead of paying perhaps $30 a month for a house, is paying $60 a month. He is paying $60 a month because capital is not placed in the direction to keep building up.

If you take the amount that is short in the housing in the country—this country is short of houses of the moderate class—if you take the statistics, it runs into an enormous amount. Suppose the Government should go into the building of houses. In order to supply that demand, it would take more than our whole war debt to do it; and the only way that it is ever going to be done will be through the natural flow of capital in that direction, the investment of surplus and savings in that direction, in the regular way. But as long as you put an embargo on it by these high surtaxes you are going to prevent that, and you are going to raise the rents on the men of moderate means. I am convinced of that position.

Of course, there is a great deal more on this subject, but that is enough, in my opinion, to justify the report of the committee. As a compromise I am willing that it should go through as it is presented, but I say candidly that I think it would be better for the country if it were left at 32 per cent rather than at 50 per cent, with its added State surtaxes, which often bring it up to 62 per cent.

Mr. President, I yield the floor.

Mr. EDGE obtained the floor.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President, will the Senator permit me to make a parliamentary inquiry?

Mr. EDGE. Certainly.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I would like to know whether the pending amendment is itself subject to amendment?

The VICE PRESIDENT. It is.

Mr. EDGE. Mr. President, my object in taking the floor was simply to ask the Senator from North Dakota a question following his reading of the testimony of the Secretary of the Treasury in connection with the shortage of housing conditions. Is it not perfectly obvious to everyone, leaving aside all prejudice or viewpoint as to what might be the most equable system of taxation, that with the existing condition of rents, everyone realizing that rents are as high to-day, if not higher, than they were during the war, recognizing the shortage of housing accommodations, appreciated by builders and contractors all over the country, men who in prewar days were engaged in the industry of building apartment houses and small houses—does it not illustrate that these same men would build houses, would build apartment houses, would build houses to meet every demand for every type of tenant, if, with a full realization that they could receive those high rents, they were not deterred because of what they consider the large toll necessary to be paid the Government under the existing taxation?

That must be the reason. What other reason can exist? Certainly a contractor in the city of Philadelphia, the city of Pittsburgh, the city of Boston, or in any small city would immediately erect houses, knowing tenants were waiting to rent those houses, ready to pay rents to-day far in excess of the rents a few years ago, if there was not some reason to deter him from making the investment.

It appeals to me that the main reason certainly must be a full realization of the fact that if he makes a success of the enterprise, as there is every indication that he would, he is compelled to pay the Government these very high surtaxes as the result of the risk he runs.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Mr. President——

Mr. EDGE. I yield to the Senator from New Mexico.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I would like to inquire of the Senator from New Jersey if he does not believe that there is another reason, very much more powerful, preventing the construction of homes at this time than the one to which the Senator now refers?

Mr. EDGE. Oh, yes; there are two other reasons. One is the cost of material and the other is the range of salaries or wages. I attempted to discuss those other reasons in some observations I made on the floor of the Senate yesterday. The cost of material is gradually coming down. I can not say so much as to the reduction of wages. I consider that a very grave error on the part of those men who otherwise would be employed.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Whether it is a proper sentiment throughout the country or not it is needless to discuss, but it is evident to all that the reason why there is not more building going on now is because the people feel that after the building is constructed, within a year or two it will be worth a good deal less than it is now. The cost of construction now, whatever the cost may be, is upon such a high plane that the people do not feel it is a safe and permanent investment. I do not believe that there is such a scarcity of money in the country now. If prices were right it would enable us to get the money to construct the needed buildings.

Mr. EDGE. I fully agree that it all contributes to the present stagnation in the business world. I contend, however, the real fundamental difficulty is taxes. You can mention various reasons, and I do not question that they all contribute somewhat to present stagnation, but the final difficulty to-day, in my judgment, is the present high range of surtaxes. We can not pass legislation which will compel a man to use his capital unless he believes he sees a reasonable profit in its use. In my judgment that one fundamental difficulty is back of the fact that we are only working to about 30 per cent degree of productivity. The fact which the Senator from Minnesota discusses that there are hundreds of thousands of men out of work and we want to relieve them of taxes is all right, and I agree with that, but it will benefit them but little if we relieve them of taxation and they are still unemployed. And they will be unemployed, in my judgment, until the men of this country whom we must depend on, whether we want to admit it or not, are prepared to start again the wheels of industry in every direction and thus make a market by so doing. That is one way we can make a market. I agree with the Senator from Minnesota there is a lack of markets. There is no market simply because consumers are not making the market, and we can only make a market side by side, the man who employs labor and the man who is employed, by regaining confidence. As confidence is instilled, demands increase, and the market increases. Never will we solve the problem unless we encourage the man on whom we depend to rejuvenate industry. The buying power has not greatly changed, but enterprise and confidence has.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Mr. President, I listened yesterday to the address of the Senator from New Jersey, and he made then very strong statements along the line which he has just been making. But I should like to inquire of the Senator if he believes that the bill as proposed by the committee will remedy the situation to which he refers. I think if the Senator presented any point yesterday it was that we would have to reduce taxes very much lower than the taxes proposed in the pending bill in order to accomplish the result which the Senator from New Jersey believes should be accomplished.

Mr. EDGE. Of course, it is all a matter of relativity. If we can finally agree to adopt a bill with a 32 per cent maximum, it, of course, is that much better than a 50 per cent maximum. I am inclined to think a 32 per cent maximum would to a great extent solve the problem. I think that is evidenced very well by the clipping to which I referred yesterday, referring to the sale of the bonds for the purpose of financing the railroads.

When the public felt that the maximum surtax would be 32 per cent, those tax-bearing bonds were being sold. When through various things that have happened in the Senate or in compromise or suggested compromise it appears that the surtaxes would be considerably higher, immediately the sale of those tax-bearing bonds ceased. No man can tell exactly where the actual point exists when a man will not buy tax-exempt bonds, but will be satisfied to run the risk of buying industrial bonds. It is a matter of computation. If a tax-exempt bond will yield 5 per cent, and it will—some of them will yield more than that to-day—and on a tax-bearing bond it is necessary to have a yield of 8 or 9 or 10 per cent in order to meet the toll of the Government and have a net 5 per cent to retain themselves, it is simply a matter of a pencil and a pad of paper to ascertain which type of investment the man will consider.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President, will the Senator from New Mexico permit me to offer the following amendment and have it printed? I would like to have it read at the desk.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I yield for that purpose.

The ASSISTANT SECRETARY. The amendment proposed by the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. HITCHCOCK] is to amend the amendment proposed by the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. MCCUMBER] to the surtax provisions of the bill on page 28 by striking out all after the bracket reading "47 per cent of the amount by which the net income exceeds $98,000 and does not exceed $100,000," and to insert in lieu the following:

The rate of surtax for the calendar year 1922 on net incomes exceeding $100,000 shall be the same as for the calendar year 1921.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment will be printed.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Mr. President, it seems to me that there has not yet been presented in direct form the principle which should govern the surtax; it at least has not been emphasized. The Senator from North Dakota [Mr. MCCUMBER] states the principle correctly, and that is that the tax should be graduated according to the ability to pay. Unless there is some very strong reason why that principle should be departed from it should be adhered to and adhered to strictly.

If we take the present law we begin the levy of surtaxes upon the theory that if a man has an income of $10,000 a year he ought not to pay as high a rate as the man who has an income of $50,000 a year. Everyone, if he is logical in his reasoning, must admit that the person who has an income of $1,000,000 a year ought to pay a higher rate of tax than the man who has an income of only $100,000 a year. The amendment now proposed by the committee, however, undertakes to provide that when an income reaches the amount of $100,000 a year that is the maximum for the graduation of the surtax. That means that whenever a man has an income of $100,000 a year he will pay as high a rate as the man having an income of $1,000,000 a year. If it is proposed to impose a graduated tax on incomes ranging from $6,000 up to $100,000, I submit that there can be no excuse for not going beyond that. That is the present law.

Then the committee in the last few of the brackets in its proposed amendment makes the tax on incomes from $100,000 to $150,000 48 per cent, and on incomes from $150,000 to $200,000 49 per cent. Then on incomes in excess of $200,000 it makes the rate 50 per cent. The real basis of the amendment, however, is the graduated tax on incomes up to $100,000. To say that the man who has an income of only $100,000 a year should pay practically as high a rate as the man who has an income of a million dollars a year is violating the very fundamental principles upon which taxation should be based, but that is what this proposition amounts to.

What are the reasons why it is desired to reduce the surtax rates? No one yet has said that the rates should not be graduated on incomes above $100,000 even up into the millions of dollars. Then, what reasons are given for cutting off these high surtaxes? Some suggestions have been made here which it is said offer a sufficient excuse for lopping off the high surtaxes. Senators do not argue against them; they do not say that they are not right; they do not say that the higher incomes ought not to pay a higher rate of taxation; but what do they say? A number of reasons have been given, and I wish to refer to a few of them to-night.

The reason which is most dwelt on is the danger of investors buying tax-exempt securities. Mr. President, I wish to say that by this proposed reduction we shall not prevent any money being invested in tax-exempt securities. I wish Senators to let that idea soak in. The reduction in the rates of the surtax is not sufficient, as a mere matter of dollars and cents and interest, to prevent incomes from being invested in tax-exempt securities. So nothing is accomplished by that. But even if that object were accomplished, I wish to say that the tax-exempt securities now outstanding are owned by somebody, and if any of them are purchased by others than the present holders, the ownership will merely be transferred from one taxpayer to another.

However, Senators talk about the issuance of $800,000,000 a year of municipal and State securities. They say that such securities are calling for the money of investors. So, they are calling for it; but if we reduce these taxes, they will still be calling for it. We shall not thereby help the situation any. Somebody is going to buy those securities, and the only thing which will result if we retain these taxes at the present rate is that we shall make a greater number of bidders for those bonds. By the action now proposed we shall have reduced the rate of interest on such securities, and that is all. By the passage of this legislation, however, we shall not be reducing the rate of interest sufficiently to justify a man in keeping his money out of such investments if he wishes to put it into them.

Furthermore, Mr. President, I do not believe at this time we ought to discourage the putting of money into such securities. The net income of this country to-day is around fifteen or sixteen billion dollars a year. The experts have estimated that the income of individual taxpayers, of those having sufficient income for taxable purposes, amounts to about $11,000,000,000, and the net income of corporations amounts to about $5,000,000,000 more. It is only about one-half what it was before the World War; but the net income of individuals and corporations, which are owned by individuals who pay the taxes, is around $15,000,000,000. At this time when we are a great creditor Nation, when we have a surplus of activity, a surplus of human energy, when our factories in nine months can produce all of the commodities which this country can consume in a year, and when we have four or five million men out of employment, do Senators not think it is advisable that we appropriate one-fifteenth of the net income of the country for the building of roads, schoolhouses, charitable institutions, and the making of life brighter for the people of the United States? Can we not do it, or shall we still talk about reviving industry for the purpose of exporting steel products or copper products or some other manufactured products, such as textiles? Shall we expend our efforts on them alone? Shall we exempt incomes from just taxation when we can use at home the revenue derived in making our country better in which to live?

So I say that the plan which is now proposed by the committee does not reduce the rate of surtax sufficiently to keep any money from being invested in tax-exempt securities which would go there under the higher rate, and, in the next place, no good purpose is accomplished by trying to raise the rates of interest on State and municipal securities.

Reference has also been made to the report of Secretary Mellon, who cites the fact that men of large income are making gifts to their children, and thus avoiding the high surtaxes. If that is a bad practice, why not stop it, instead of reducing the surtaxes? If we do not think it is right that men of large income should give a portion of their property to their children, why not stop that practice by imposing a tax on that kind of a transaction? That can be done, and the practice can be stopped in that way.

The Secretary of the Treasury referred also to a man who had invested his money in coal lands. I inquire, Did not some one own the coal land before he put his money in it, and has not that money so invested gone into the general channels of trade? The Secretary says, however, that he had to borrow the money with which to make the purchase, and that the interest on the borrowed money is deductible from his net income. If that is wrong, then the law can be changed so as to provide that where a man borrows money to be put into unproductive properties the interest upon that borrowed money shall not be deducted in making his income-tax return. We can change that in the law.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. President, will the Senator yield there?

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Does the Senator think that if such a provision were put in the law there would ever be opened up any undeveloped sections of the country?

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I am merely referring to the objections which have been presented by the Secretary of the Treasury.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I thought the Senator was answering them and suggesting corrections.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I am saying how the situation pointed out by him can be corrected.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Does the Senator believe that his last suggestion should be carried out?

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Mr. President, I think it is well worthy of consideration whether if a man borrows money with which to buy unproductive property, which brings in no income, he shall be permited to deduct the interest paid on such borrowed money from his net income for the purpose of taxation.

Mr. WADSWORTH. That would be very interesting if applied to the State of New Mexico.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Indeed, it would; and let me say further that if such were the law there would not be the large holdings of coal land in New Mexico that there are to-day, thus preventing the production of coal because of one concern owning a half million acres of coal and only working two or three coal mines on it.

The Secretary of the Treasury refers also to the question of mortgages on farms and real estate. It is not proposed to reduce the surtaxes sufficient to affect that situation at all. Nothing is accomplished in that direction by the action proposed.

So it is with every other objection which has been made here. If practices which are complained of are wrong, let them be stopped, but I want to say that those who are responsible for this measure should not undertake to undermine the fundamental principle upon which legislation of this character should be founded, and that is that those who receive the largest incomes ought to pay at a higher rate; in other words, the tax should be imposed upon those who are best able to pay it. Then if it is desired to reduce taxation, what is the thing to do? Any reduction which should be made upon the individual income tax should be made upon the flat tax.

Except for the necessities of our country, we would not have been justified in levying a flat tax at all. Why? Because it violates the very principle, which every one of us recognizes, that he who is best able to pay should pay more. Any flat tax, any so-called normal tax, is a tax equally upon the income of every individual in the country, regardless of the amount of his income. Your normal tax, your flat tax, has thrust itself in the very teeth of the fundamental principle which should govern such legislation as this; and I want to say to you that if you strike off these high surtaxes and leave this flat normal tax where it is, the people will soon learn that you are not trying to frame a bill upon a scientific basis, but you are trying to favor a few individuals with the most enormous incomes in this country, and for the sole and only purpose of relieving them of a burden.

I ask you to mark what I say. By doing this you are destroying the very principle upon which this legislation should be founded. If you want to relieve rich and poor alike, then the thing for you to do is to consider the amendment which has been offered by the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. GERRY] and lop off some of this flat tax, relieve the rich and the poor alike, the men of large means and small means alike, and do not begin to reduce your surtaxes until you have absolutely eliminated your flat tax, because your flat tax bears unequally. It is not founded upon the proper principle. I ask you to direct your attention to that; and instead of lopping off here at the top, where you are relieving only a few, can you not give a little relief to those of smaller incomes who are struggling for the necessaries of life?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President, I should like to know whether the amendment presented by me is now pending?

The VICE PRESIDENT. It is pending and in order.

Mr. PENROSE. Mr. President, I move that the Senate take a recess until 11 o'clock to-morrow.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to permit me to put in two or three tables with regard to the income tax?

Mr. PENROSE. Yes.

Mr. LENROOT. I ask unanimous consent to insert in the RECORD a table giving the tax under the different brackets of the present law, the House bill, the original committee report, and the pending amendment; also, a table prepared by the actuary of the Treasury Department—and the first table is prepared by the same actuary—giving the rates under the income tax laws of the United States, Great Britain, Canada, and France; also, a table giving the total amount of taxes imposed under the British law on given incomes.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. President, if the Senator will yield just there, does the table showing the British taxes differentiate between the earned and the unearned incomes?

Mr. LENROOT. No; it does not.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Which is it based on?

Mr. LENROOT. It is based on the total amount under the British law.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I thought the Senator was going to put in a table showing the rates of taxation on incomes.

Mr. LENROOT. I am; on incomes.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Is it on earned or unearned incomes?

Mr. LENROOT. I do not know. It is given to me as the British law upon incomes.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I have understood that there was a distinction in the law.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the tables will be printed in the RECORD.

The tables are as follows:

Income tax upon certain incomes under existing law and under H. R. 8245 as passed by the House, as reported to the Senate, and as tentatively amended, based on the net income of a married person without dependents.

FUNERAL OF THE LATE SENATOR KNOX.

Mr. CALDER. I ask unanimous consent to report from the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate a resolution authorizing the payment of the funeral expenses of the late Senator KNOX.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the report will be received.

Mr. CALDER. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the resolution.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the immediate consideration of the resolution?

There being no objection, the resolution (S. Res. 154) was considered by the Senate and agreed to, as follows:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Senate be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay, from the miscellaneous items of the contingent fund of the Senate, the actual and necessary expenses incurred by the committee appointed by the President of the Senate in arranging for and attending the funeral of the Hon. PHILANDER CHASE KNOX, late a Senator from the State of Pennsylvania, upon vouchers to be approved by the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate.

BURIAL OF UNKNOWN AMERICAN SOLDIER AT ARLINGTON.

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of War, which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

WAR DEPARTMENT,
Washington, October 15, 1921.

The PRESIDENT OF THE SENATE,
Washington, D. C.

SIR: In regard to the ceremonies in honor of the unknown dead to be held in this city on November 11, 1921, you are advised that two tickets for seats in the Amphitheater of the National Cemetery at Arlington have been reserved for the ceremonies there for each member of the Supreme Court, the Senate, and the House of Representatives. These tickets will be forwarded at an early date.

In further connection with this same matter, you are advised that it is the intention of the President to march (on foot), accompanied by members of his Cabinet, from the Capitol to the northwest corner of the White House Grounds, following the caisson bearing the remains. It has occurred to the War Department that a suitable delegation from the Senate may wish to accompany the President and the Cabinet on this occasion. If such is the case, due arrangements will be made by the War Department on notification from you.

It is proposed that the President and the Cabinet will leave the procession at Executive Avenue, and that later on they will proceed by automobile to Arlington Cemetery. The War Department regrets that its resources in the way of motor transportation do not permit it to provide suitable transportation from the White House to Arlington for such delegation as may desire to attend from the Senate.

Respectfully,

JOHN W. WEEKS,
Secretary of War.

RECESS.

Mr. PENROSE. Mr. President, is my motion before the Senate?

The VICE PRESIDENT. It is.

Mr. PENROSE. I desire to state in this connection that I had intended asking unanimous consent, before consenting to make this motion, that the Senate would vote on these rates on to-morrow. I find, however, such a general sentiment in favor of disposing of the question now before the Senate not later than to-morrow that I will not bring up the question at this time.

I ask that my motion be put.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Pennsylvania that the Senate take a recess until 11 o'clock to-morrow.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 5 o'clock and 35 minutes p. m.) the Senate took a recess until to-morrow, Saturday, October 22, 1921, at 11 o'clock a. m.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

FRIDAY, October 21, 1921.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. James Shera Montgomery, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Our Father in Heaven, accept our tribute of praise and thanksgiving for the bounties of this day as we say: Holy, holy, holy, Lord God Almighty! O let us strive to be worthy of all, and may evil lose its power over us. Imbue us thoroughly with a spirit of love for our country and devotion to its lasting welfare. When the way is steep and straight, long and lonely, O come from behind the clouds and be the beacon light on the upward journey. Through stress and strain and storm may we know that God is God and blessed forever more. At last bestow that blessing of eternal rest that shall make us forget our weariness forever. In the name of Jesus our Saviour. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

ELECTION TO A COMMITTEE.

Mr. COLLIER. Mr. Speaker, by direction of the minority members of the Committee on Ways and Means, I offer the following resolution and move its adoption.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the resolution.

The question was taken and the motion was agreed to.

S. 2508. An act granting the consent of Congress to the counties of Cass, N. Dak., and Clay, Minn., and their successors and assigns, to construct, maintain, and operate a bridge and approaches thereto across the Red River of the North at a point suitable to the interests of navigation between the cities of Fargo, N. S. 777. An act for the relief of John M. Green.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed with amendment bills of the following titles, in which the concurrence of the House of Representatives was requested:

H. R. 7848. An act authorizing appropriations and expenditures for the administration of Indian affairs, and for other purposes; and

S. 2474. An act to appropriate money for the payment of Swan Johnson and Agnes and Paul Antoine in connection with logging operations on the Flathead Indian Reservation in Montana.

SENATE BILLS REFERRED.

Under clause 2, Rule XXIV, Senate bills of the following titles were taken from the Speaker's table and referred to their appropriate committees, as indicated below:

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, yesterday I announced that this morning I would ask unanimous consent that House joint resolution No. 200, accepting an invitation of the Republic of Brazil to take part in an international exposition, to be held in Rio de Janeiro in 1922, be made in order Tuesday next. I now make that request.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Wyoming that House joint resolution No. 200 be made in order for Tuesday next?

Mr. MONDELL. Following the reading of the Journal and the disposition of matters on the Speaker's table?

The SPEAKER. The Chair is informed that the Senate passed the resolution yesterday, and the Senate resolution will probably be messaged over.

Mr. MONDELL. Well, when we take up the resolution we will probably ask unanimous consent to substitute the Senate resolution, if in the meantime the committee has not reported the Senate resolution.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request?

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Is the Senate resolution identical with the House resolution?

Mr. MONDELL. No; but that is a matter we can handle when the matter comes up.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request?

Mr. WALSH. What is the request?

The SPEAKER. That House resolution No. 200 be made in order on Tuesday next after the reading of the Journal and disposition of matters on the Speaker's table.

Mr. MONDELL. Or the Senate resolution if it shall be in the meantime reported.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, that is the resolution appropriating $1,000,000 for the participation in this exposition?

Mr. MONDELL. It is a resolution authorizing an appropriation for participation in an exposition to be held at Rio de Janeiro.

Mr. WALSH. Well, I object.

The SPEAKER. Objection is made.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, for the information of the House, I will say that in all probability this measure will be taken up for consideration on Tuesday. I announced yesterday that I would ask unanimous consent for the consideration of the bill H. R. 7077, a bill to increase the force and salaries of the Patent Office, on Tuesday next, but I have since learned that a number of gentlemen are disposed to object to the request, so I shall not submit it at this time. Mr. Speaker, it is the purpose of the Committee on Ways and Means to dispose of the bill which is the order for to-day before we adjourn, and if that bill shall be disposed of to-day I shall ask unanimous consent that when we adjourn we adjourn to meet on Monday.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Mr. Speaker, in view of the importance of the bill which is about to be presented, I make the point of order there is no quorum present.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Let us vote on the motion to go into the Committee of the Whole.

REFUNDING FOREIGN OBLIGATIONS.

Mr. FORDNEY. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill H. R. 8762, and, pending the motion, I ask if we can agree upon time for general debate. I think it was understood yesterday to be agreeable to that side of the House to have five hours of general debate and that that time be divided equally between both sides. Is that agreeable?

Mr. COLLIER. That is agreeable to the minority.

Mr. FORDNEY. I ask unanimous consent that the time be controlled, one half by myself and the other half by the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. COLLIER].

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Michigan asks unanimous consent that the general debate be limited to five hours, one half to be controlled by himself and one half by the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. COLLIER]. Is there objection?

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, is it the intention that debate shall be confined to the subject matter of the bill?

Mr. FORDNEY. I would rather not say that. Debate will be, with one or two exceptions, of 5 or 10 minutes. Some gentlemen want to speak on another matter, and ask unanimous consent to extend their remarks in the RECORD on some matters not political at all.

Mr. COLLIER. I will say to the gentleman that on this side of the House I think debate will be confined to the bill.

Mr. FORDNEY. I think it will on this side, with the exception I mentioned.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. Reserving the right to object, does the gentleman expect to make every effort to conclude the bill to-day and put it upon its passage?

Mr. FORDNEY. Yes, sir.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection as to the disposition of time? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Michigan that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the purpose of considering this bill.

The question was taken, and the Speaker announced the ayes seemed to have it.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that there is no quorum present.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. WALSH. What will Members answer upon the call of the roll now?

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks that they will answer "yes" or "no." There was a division, and the Chair thinks there is no quorum either on the division or in the House. The Doorkeeper will close the doors, the Sergeant at Arms will notify absentees, and the Clerk will call the roll.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 272, nays 1, answered "present" 1, not voting 157, as follows:

The SPEAKER. A quorum is present, the Doorkeeper will open the doors.

Mr. FORDNEY. Mr. Speaker, before we go into Committee of the Whole, the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. PORTER] wants to address the House for one minute.

The SPEAKER. That can be done in committee.

Thereupon the House resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill (H. R. 8762) to create a commission authorized under certain conditions to refund or convert obligations of foreign Governments owing to the United States of America, and for other purposes, with Mr. TOWNER in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill (H. R. 8762) to create a commission authorized under certain conditions to refund or convert obligations of foreign Governments owing to the United States of America, and for other purposes. The Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That a World War Foreign Debt Commission is hereby created consisting of five members, one of whom shall be the Secretary of the Treasury, who shall serve as chairman, and four of whom shall be appointed by the President, which appointments when other than Cabinet officers shall be made with the advice and consent of the Senate.

SEC. 2. That the commission created by section 1, with the approval of the President, is hereby authorized, from time to time, to refund or convert, and to extend the time of payment of the principal or the interest, or both, or any obligation of any foreign Government now owing to the United States of America, or any obligation of any foreign Government hereafter received by the United States of America (including obligations held by the United States Grain Corporation, the War Department, the Navy Department, or the American Relief Administration), arising out of the World War, into bonds or other obligations of such foreign Government, and from time to time to receive bonds and obligations of any foreign Government in substitution for the bonds or obligations of such Government now or hereafter held by the United States of America, in such form and of such terms, conditions, date or dates of maturity, and rate or rates of interest, and with such security, if any, as shall be deemed for the best interests of the United States of America, and to adjust and settle any and all claims, not now represented by bonds or obligations, which the United States of America now has or hereafter may have against any foreign Government and to accept securities therefor.

SEC. 3. That this act shall not be construed to authorize the exchange of bonds or other obligations of any foreign Government for those of any other foreign Government, or cancellation of any part of such indebtedness except through payment thereof.

SEC. 4. That the authority granted by this act shall cease and determine at the end of three years from the date of the passage of this act.

SEC. 5. That the annual report of this commission shall be included in the annual report of the Secretary of the Treasury on the state of the finances.

Mr. FORDNEY. Mr. Chairman, I yield one minute to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. PORTER].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania is recognized.

Mr. PORTER. Mr. Chairman, the Committee on Foreign Affairs this morning passed the following resolution:

That the chairman make a statement to the House that the Committee on Foreign Affairs does not regard the reference of H. R. 8762 to the Ways and Means Committee as a binding precedent, but in view of the fact that another committee has taken up the consideration of the bill and has reported it, we do not desire to raise a point of reference at this time.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Michigan [Mr. FORDNEY] is recognized.

Mr. FORDNEY. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, the Committee on Ways and Means have reported to the House a bill authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury, as one of the committee provided for by the bill, with the approval of the President, to settle the matter of foreign loans between this Government and foreign Governments.

I wish to say that if the administration at the time the loans were made had complied with the law that authorized those loans, we would not now be in the condition that we are in touching the settlement of these claims. They were not made strictly in accordance with the act which provided that the loans could be made. I will not quote the law; another gentleman will discuss this point quite fully. That law provided that our Government should purchase the obligations of foreign Governments, and so forth. But demand obligations have been taken for the entire amount of those loans.

I am not criticizing the former administration for not strictly complying with the law, because there may have been some obstacles in the way of compliance with the act. But, whether right or wrong, we are now confronted with a peculiar condition in reference to those loans. The Secretary of the Treasury takes the position that this Government is not clothed with authority to settle those loans further than to demand payment of all the Governments to which we have made loans. No other authority exists. These obligations are very great. Forty per cent of the entire outstanding obligations of this Government are covered by these loans.

Briefly, I want to call your attention to the principal due and the interest in detail. As stated by the Secretary of the Treasury in the hearings on the 21st of June last, before the Finance Committee of the Senate, Mr. Wadsworth, an Assistant Secretary of the Treasury, made the statement that up to the last interest-due date interest had been figured; but no fixed date was given, for the reason that there are so many of those loans that there are a great number of due dates for the interest upon them to be paid. But having figured up the last due date, there was owing to this Government at that time $943,534,755.99 past-due interest.

Now, taking it for granted that the due dates that interest was figured to were sometimes perhaps one or two or three months prior to June 21, I am going to give you the estimated amount of those obligations down to date, as stated in the Secretary's statement of that date, June 21. There was $9,435,225,329.24 of direct loans to those various foreign Governments; obligations received from the American relief administration, $84,093,963.55; obligations received from the Secretary of War and from the Secretary of the Navy on account of the sale of surplus war materials, $565,048,413.80; and obligations held by the United States Grain Corporation, $56,899,879.09; or a total outstanding on that date—and to the due date there is an additional obligation of interest due—making $10,141,267,585.68. The accrued interest due at that date, as figured by the Treasury Department, was $943,534,755.99. The interest on the total sum on that date, at 5 per cent per annum, is, in round numbers, $1,532,000 per day, and, in round numbers, for 100 days to be added—there are $300,000,000 to be added to that sum—making a total of $11,085,000 or thereabouts due to-day. It will vary a little above or below that sum. It will very likely be $10,000,000 or $15,000,000 more, because several of these obligations to this Government draw 6 per cent interest, while I have figured the whole outstanding obligation at 5 per cent.

Now, the Treasury Department finds itself absolutely unauthorized by law to negotiate a settlement of those loans. Some of those Governments, perhaps, will be unable to pay for some time. There is a gentleman in the room, I believe, a Member of this House, Mr. ACKERMAN, who showed me yesterday a piece of paper money issued by the Austrian Government; and, by the way, the Austrian Government is included in the number of those Governments owing us $24,055,708.92 of principal. That money issued by the Austrian Government which before the war, as I remember he told me, was worth $2,000 of any kind of American money—in other words, gold—he purchased in Austria a few weeks ago for $6; and it is now worth but $3. That is an illustration of the depreciation of the Austrian paper money.

There is included in those items owing to our Government $187,500,000, in round numbers, by the Russian Government. They have no stable government at the present time. I do not know what position they are in to settle those claims, but I know this, that the Russian Government to-day has more than $80,000,000,000 of paper money in existence, an amount of paper money twice as much as has been issued by all the rest of the Governments of the world. It is rather an unstable Government.

Mr. FESS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield to a question?

Mr. FORDNEY. I yield to the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. FESS. I notice Mr. Wadsworth states that $452,000,000, or near that, has been paid in interest.

Mr. FORDNEY. I was going to state that.

Mr. FESS. Where did the Government get that?

Mr. FORDNEY. I will say, from Mr. Wadsworth's statement, that there has been paid to our Government interest on those foreign loans a total sum of $465,271,288.92. But it is my understanding that those were the items paid while we were loaning the money to pay them with.

Mr. FESS. That is what I wanted to understand.

Mr. FORDNEY. And since we have discontinued the loans the payments of interest have been neglected by those foreign Governments.

Mr. FESS. In other words, all of the interest paid—unless it may be a very small amount—has been paid by them with money which we loaned them with which to make the payment.

Mr. FORDNEY. Not all, but the major portion. Some Governments have paid interest on the obligations that we hold for the sale to them of war supplies and food supplies and one thing and another.

Now, gentlemen, we have provided in the bill for a commission of five men to settle those claims, one of whom shall be the Secretary of the Treasury, who shall be the chairman of that board, to be appointed by the President of the United States, and when other than Cabinet officers such appointments shall be confirmed by the Senate. We felt that it was not at all necessary to have the Senate again confirm Cabinet officers who might be appointed. It is barely possible that the Secretary of the Treasury will call in the Secretary of State or some other member, or more than one member perhaps, of the Cabinet in the settlement of these claims.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FORDNEY. I yield to the gentleman from Wisconsin.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. The gentleman, I think, inadvertently said that we were to appoint a commission to settle these claims.

Mr. FORDNEY. I said the bill provides for the appointment of a commission.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Is it to settle these claims?

Mr. FORDNEY. To settle these claims; yes.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. I thought it was for the purpose of refunding bonded obligations.

Mr. FORDNEY. It provides for both. The Secretary stated that in making these loans to the Austrian Government we, together with other Governments—Great Britain and France, I believe, and perhaps Belgium—hold a mortgage, as it were, upon the government property in Austria, their forests and other government property, and in the settlement of our claims against the Austrian Government we are to settle them together with these other foreign Governments which have like claims and have an interest in those securities which we hold, because the loans were made by our Government and by Great Britain and France also at the same time to the Austrian Government and some other central European nations.

Mr. TREADWAY. Will the gentleman from Michigan yield?

Mr. FORDNEY. I yield to the gentleman from Massachusetts.

Mr. TREADWAY. Possibly the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. COOPER] may have in mind the ordinary definition of a claim. Of course, the chairman will state that the greater part of this entire settlement is for cash loans, not for anything in the way of what it ordinarily regarded as a claim.

Mr. FORDNEY. I stated to the House before that of this total of $10,141,000,000 of principal, $9,435,000,000 were direct loans of money made during the war, and for those loans we hold the demand obligations in the form of notes of these foreign Governments issued to our Government.

Mr. DENISON. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. FORDNEY. I yield to the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. DENISON. Will the gentleman from Michigan state when our Government loaned any money to Austria, and in what amount?

Mr. FORDNEY. It is in the report. I do not know that I have time to explain it all.

Mr. DAVIS of Tennessee. It is for flour furnished them through the United States Grain Corporation.

Mr. FORDNEY. The date was October, 1920.

Mr. DENISON. That was long after the war.

Mr. FORDNEY. The date of maturity is January 1, 1925.

Mr. DENISON. Was there any law passed by Congress authorizing our Government to make any loan to Austria?

Mr. FORDNEY. We sold them provisions. It was for the sale of provisions.

Mr. DENISON. It was not a war debt, then.

Mr. FORDNEY. No; the gentleman will remember that the House voted a loan of 5,000,000 barrels of flour to the starving people over there. France and Great Britain gave them other supplies, and those combined claims are owing to the three Governments.

Mr. DENISON. Then the money that Austria owes us is for claims we have against her for supplies?

Mr. FORDNEY. Yes.

Mr. KEARNS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FORDNEY. I yield to the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. KEARNS. This bill does not provide for the cancellation of any debt, does it?

Mr. FORDNEY. No; except by payment. It is not intended that we shall cancel any of these claims until they are paid.

Mr. FESS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FORDNEY. I yield to the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. FESS. What proportion of the $9,435,000,000 was loaned before the armistice?

Mr. FORDNEY. The amounts are all in the report, but I could not give them to the gentleman offhand.

Mr. FESS. Are there any commitments under which we are obligated to let them have further money?

Mr. FORDNEY. The greater portion of these loans were made before the armistice, but some after the armistice.

Mr. FESS. But under agreements that had been made before?

Mr. FORDNEY. Oh, yes; under commitments made before. And there are some loans that were authorized that have not yet been made.

Mr. FESS. That is what I wanted to know.

Mr. FORDNEY. But they are actual commitments.

Mr. FESS. That is what I want to know. Are we under any obligation to make further loans?

Mr. FORDNEY. To Armenia and Greece, I believe, but on certain conditions.

Mr. LONGWORTH. If the gentleman will pardon me, what he has been speaking of relative to claims will apply to only a very small proportion of the total.

Mr. FORDNEY. Oh, yes.

Mr. LONGWORTH. They were those that were included in the Liberty loan act.

Mr. FORDNEY. They are a very small proportion of the total. Now, I do not know what in the world ever induced them to loan $2,000,000 to Cuba, but the loan was made.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FORDNEY. I yield to the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. The original act under which these loans were authorized, as I remember, seemed to indicate that the interest that was to be paid by the foreign governments should be the same as we were paying our people.

Mr. FORDNEY. Not less than that.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. I see that the minority of the committee in their views make the criticism that they say this refunding might be at a less rate than we are paying on our Liberty bonds.

Mr. FORDNEY. Oh, no.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. I should like to hear the gentleman discuss that.

Mr. FORDNEY. There is no danger of that whatever, because the original act provided that the loans should be made at a rate of interest not less than we pay ourselves. That rate of interest has already been settled and is in the obligations our Government holds, and it is not less than 5 per cent in any obligation held by this Government. Those rates have been agreed upon at the time the loans were made and the foreign Governments are willing to pay that rate of interest.

Mr. STEVENSON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FORDNEY. Yes.

Mr. STEVENSON. The provision is made in the original act that it must not be less than the rate the United States bonds bear. But do you not sweep away all that precaution in these words—lines 13, 14, and 15, page 2:

in such form and of such terms, conditions, date or dates of maturity, and rate or rates of interest, and with such security, if any, as shall be deemed for the best interests of the United States of America.

Does not that authorize the commission to accept a less rate or any rate or none at all?

Mr. FORDNEY. Does the gentleman think that anybody who is sensible would do anything of that kind?

Mr. STEVENSON. I am not asking whether anybody sensible would do it or not.

Mr. FORDNEY. We can not control the rate of interest as a condition by which the commission shall be bound with the settlement of these claims. Much of the money owing our Government were direct loans authorized by the original act and goods sold to these people. They are willing to pay 5 and 6 per cent interest, and these rates were agreed upon, and it is perfectly agreeable to the foreign Governments to pay the 5 per cent. One reason why the rates were fixed at 5 per cent, although we borrowed money for less than 5 per cent, was that we were making loans and nobody knew how long the war would last or what rate of interest we would be obliged to pay in order to get money if the war ran for three or four years, and therefore a lump sum of interest at 5 per cent was agreed upon between the representatives of this Government and foreign Governments with whom we made the loan. These obligations we hold to-day carry this rate of interest.

Mr. TREADWAY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FORDNEY. Yes.

Mr. TREADWAY. In reference to the matter of interest rate is not it the idea in these loans to permit the acceptance of a partial payment of interest? For instance, if we can not get the whole amount, would not we be lucky to get a partial payment, and that is the explanation of that phrase?

Mr. FORDNEY. Yes; just as a bankrupt might settle with an individual whose notes he held—in dealing with a bankrupt get what you can. Make the best settlement possible for Uncle Sam. [Applause.]

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FORDNEY. Yes.

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. I want to ask the gentleman whether there would be any objection to putting in the bill the rate of interest not to be less than 5 per cent?

Mr. FORDNEY. There would be an objection to binding the hands of the commission to a certain rate of interest when we know that we can get 5 per cent and that they are willing to pay it.

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. Can we not say in the bill "not less than 5 per cent"?

Mr. FORDNEY. I have stated that we hold obligations of these Governments for all except a few open accounts, and all the obligations bear a rate of interest not less than 5 per cent.

Mr. KEARNS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FORDNEY. Certainly.

Mr. KEARNS. Your bill says they can settle or rewrite such rates of interest and such security as shall be deemed for the best interests of the United States.

Mr. FORDNEY. Let me say that when the loans were made the House did not bind the Secretary of the Treasury in any way, shape, or manner, and these loans were made right and left to any nation on the face of the earth. They went outside of the nations engaged in the war and loaned to Cuba $2,000,000. Now, do you want to say to the Secretary of the Treasury we are going to bind your hands in making settlements?

Mr. KEARNS. The reason I suggested it is because the gentleman said that these loans would be rewritten at a rate of 5 per cent, and the bill does not provide for it.

Mr. FORDNEY. I said that these obligations bear a rate of interest not less than 5 per cent for the demand obligations, and all that it is necessary for the commission to do is to extend the demand obligations into long-time obligations at a rate of interest which these demand obligations bear, which rates of interest has been agreed to.

Mr. KEARNS. The bill does not say so.

Mr. FORDNEY. I say to the gentlemen of the House that the minority of this House have filed minority views. The reason why the minority members could not agree with the majority members of the Ways and Means Committee in a unanimous report in reporting this bill is that they say they want the Congress of the United States to approve each and every one of these claims settled by this commission. Why, they have that authority now. The Secretary can go out and settle these claims, or arrange to settle them, and come to Congress and say, "Here is the best settlement we could make and I want your approval or disapproval."

The suggestion has been informally made that the Secretary of the Treasury should be required to report the result of his findings to Congress for approval. A suggestion of that kind is equivalent to opposition to any legislation granting the Secretary additional authority. There is nothing in existing law to prevent the Secretary from negotiating with foreign countries and reporting back to Congress for acceptance, but such a procedure would be indeterminable. To protect the best interests of the country a means for expeditious and businesslike action is requisite. It may sound well back home to contend that you are defending the country's foreign obligations, but the real result would be long and costly delays. It may be good politics to obstruct at this time, but it is mighty poor business.

Mr. LAYTON. Then what is the use of this bill?

Mr. FORDNEY. Because our Government has no power to do anything except to demand payment. That is all the existing law authorizes it to do. That is the only authority our Government has given.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FORDNEY. Not just yet. The outgoing administration claimed it had authority to settle these claims and came before the Ways and Means Committee and wanted the approval from our committee. No committee of this House can give authority to the Treasury Department of the Government; authority must come from Congress. We replied, "We can not give you any authority whatever or approval."

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FORDNEY. Yes.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. I want to ask the gentleman if he is stating quite accurately just what the Committee on Ways and Means did say to the Secretary of the Treasury in regard to that transaction? Did not the gentleman's committee, the gentleman himself writing in behalf of the committee, say:

I am instructed by the committee to state that upon further investigation a majority of the committee are of the opinion that there is no legislative bar to your proceeding with the extension plan last submitted by you to the committee.

Mr FORDNEY. Yes; we did at that time. The administration at the present time finds that the committee was in error in their opinion, and at the present time the administration takes the position that they do not have the authority and will not act without authority.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield further?

Mr. FORDNEY. Yes.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Will the gentleman state what legal authority of the Government has expressed the opinion that the Secretary of the Treasury had not the authority to proceed?

Mr. FORDNEY. Yes. That is the President of the United States, who is a pretty good authority. He stated so to me personally.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Will the gentleman point out in these hearings——

Mr. FORDNEY. Oh, I am not pointing out the law; I am taking his word for it, that he knew what he was talking about.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a suggestion?

Mr. FORDNEY. Yes.

Mr. LONGWORTH. The point involved in the letter written by the chairman to the Secretary of the Treasury related only to the question of whether they had authority to extend the payment or nonpayment of interest. It did not relate generally to the question of refunding.

Mr. FORDNEY. Mr. Davis, then Assistant Secretary of the Treasury, wanted to do this, and said that this was their plan, and they felt they had authority to do it. We did not agree to that opinion, but we did not dispute his authority, because we did not look the matter up, as it was not our duty to do so. They were deferring the payment of interest for three years on the $9,535,000,000, and then at the end of three years it was agreed by the foreign Governments with representatives of our Government that instead of giving additional obligations of the foreign Governments for the payment of that deferred interest and interest upon those sums the foreign Governments were willing then, after the expiration of three years, for the next two years to pay 5½ per cent interest instead of 5 on the total obligation, for the succeeding two years 6 per cent, and then for the succeeding eight years thereafter 6½ per cent. That additional interest of one-half of 1 per cent for two years, of 1 per cent for two years more, and 1½ per cent for eight years more would reimburse this Government to the amount of $1,425,000,000, which would be equivalent to the interest upon the interest for those 12 years, and instead of giving a direct interest-bearing obligation and going back to their Government for authority to issue more bonds, they would rather pay in that way. I approved of that plan personally, but our Government did not make that arrangement, and no such arrangement has been made. The interest will be due at the end of three years, agreed upon between the foreign Governments and the representatives of our Government, which would be May, 1922. At that time the interest payments are due.

Mr. McFADDEN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FORDNEY. Yes.

Mr. McFADDEN. Is it not a fact that the suggestion came from our Treasury Department to these foreign Governments that the extension would be granted on the unpaid interest?

Mr. FORDNEY. Yes.

Mr. McFADDEN. What authority had the Treasury Department, in the gentleman's judgment, to make that suggestion?

Mr. FORDNEY. I do not know. They claimed to have authority.

Mr. McFADDEN. It was made without authority?

Mr. FORDNEY. They said they had authority. We questioned it at one time, but we did not look up the law.

Mr. WINGO. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FORDNEY. Yes.

Mr. WINGO. Is it not a fact that at least one of those Governments sent a gentleman to Washington, ostensibly in an unofficial capacity, to advise us that they were not able to pay interest and we were advised unofficially that they could not pay interest, so that the statement that we suggested to them that we would extend the interest is very erroneous?

Mr. FORDNEY. I do not know from which side the suggestion came, but that was the argument presented to us.

The whole upshot of the proposition is that the present administration say that they have no authority to do anything except to demand payment right now, and we know that would be suicidal. We know that those Governments can not pay, not only the principal but the interest as well. Some people think that we should demand payment from Great Britain right now of every dollar, both principal and interest, that she owes us. Is there a man here who believes that Great Britain could pay? No. Is there a man here who believes that one of those Governments to whom we have made loans could pay now? No; not a man.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FORDNEY. Yes.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. Is it not true, as a broader economic proposition, that these foreign obligations due us are more of a liability than an asset, so far as the world's trade or our participation in it is concerned?

Mr. FORDNEY. When we made the direct loans to those foreign Governments to aid them in maintaining their armies on the battle fields, we felt at the time that the more money we would loan to them to support their armies the less human blood would be spilled by our boys, and we most lavishly turned that money over to them. After the war we sold them war supplies at a very low price. To illustrate, we sold something like $1,700,000,000 worth of war supplies to France upon the assumption and the understanding that she would distribute those goods to her war-stricken people.

We sold them for $400,000,000, or about 25 cents on the dollar of their value. What happened? France turned right around and sold back to speculators in this country a major portion of those supplies at a profit. We took her obligations running for 10 years at 5 per cent interest in payment for those war supplies. To-day those war supplies are coming back to this country and are being sold on our markets at a reduced price, below the average price prevailing on the market for such goods.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. What I had in mind to suggest to the gentleman is this, and I think he will agree with me, that it is a practical proposition among nations, as it is among private individuals, where the balance is entirely on one side of the ledger and where the other fellow has our money, that it is a hindrance to trade.

Mr. FORDNEY. We are taking trade right now from those foreign Governments, more than I want to do.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. What have they got to pay with?

Mr. FORDNEY. Oh, they are not paying their debts with it; they are selling goods over here, goods that we can make in this country, and they are selling them in large quantities, an average for the first eight months of this year of $300,000,000 per month, and American labor is on the streets in idleness. If we are to take from those foreign Governments the product of their labor, articles that we can produce here at home, and let our people rest in idleness, then I would say cancel the debt and furnish employment to our own people.

The poorest asset in the Nation is the man out of work.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Dakota. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry. I want to submit a parliamentary inquiry to the chairman—whether his eyesight was poor and he could not see a gentleman——

Mr. FORDNEY. Oh, I can see the gentleman. What does the gentleman wish?

Mr. JOHNSON of South Dakota. I am asking the gentleman that. The gentleman said there was an agreement made with the Government of France that they should not ship any of those goods to the United States.

Mr. FORDNEY. It is my understanding that was a verbal agreement, and the goods were sold at 25 cents on the dollar of their cost.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Dakota. The gentleman knows there is no record of any such agreement, does he not?

Mr. FORDNEY. I do not know, but that is my information.

Mr. FISH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FORDNEY. I will.

Mr. FISH. I understood the gentleman from Michigan to say that none of the allied countries could pay the interest on the bonds at this time.

Mr. FORDNEY. By verbal agreement those interest payments have been deferred until the 1st of next May; the three years will expire the 1st of May, 1922, if I am correct.

Mr. FISH. I understood the gentleman to say none of those countries were in a position financially to pay the interest on their loans?

Mr. FORDNEY. That is my information; I do not know positively.

Mr. FISH. Does not the gentleman know that Great Britain has loaned $50,000,000 to Argentina to foster their trade there?

Mr. FORDNEY. And I know they have not paid the interest on their loans. I do not know the financial condition of all those countries, but my information is they are in bad shape financially. I know one thing, I know we won the war. They stood the brunt of the fighting there and we came in when Germany was staggering and we struck the deadly blow just at the opportune time and helped win the war. We ought to pay for it and we will pay for it, and we want to make it possible for them to pay back the money that we loaned when they are in a financial condition to do it.

Mr. FESS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FORDNEY. I have occupied more time than I intended, but I will yield to the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. FESS. The Secretary of the Treasury was asked by a Senator whether Great Britain had loaned to the Argentine Republic and I have not found where that question was answered. The same Senator asked whether Great Britain was spending $70,000,000 on their navy. Is there anything in that or is it hot air?

Mr. FORDNEY. There was no such information came to me. Mr. Chairman, I yield the floor.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Mississippi is recognized for two and a half hours. [Applause.]

Mr. COLLIER. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, we regret that in a matter of such importance as the refunding of $11,000,000,000 of obligations owed by foreign Governments to the Government of the United States we should not have a unanimous report. We recall that when this money was loaned it was done at a time of our country's greatest need. It was loaned at a time when we felt that every dollar we sent across the water might be the means of preserving the lifeblood of some American boy, and that this money was loaned cheerfully by a united Congress. As a member of the minority, it is, I repeat, with regret that when it comes to refunding these obligations we can not present a united front. This bill seeks to create a commission of five, of whom the Secretary of the Treasury will be chairman, with powers more vast than have ever before been granted by any legislative body in the world to any commission. These commissioners are vested with powers of administration and of legislation. They have the power to fix interest on these bonds and to take such security as they may deem wise and to make final settlement without making a report to Congress. Now, gentlemen of the committee, there is no need for this bill. There is no need for the Congress at this time to come in and change the law placed upon the statute books by this Congress safeguarding these loans, and it is not right for the Congress to pass a bill which will cast aside all of the limitations and the safeguards which a former Congress threw around the refunding of those loans. The Liberty loan acts of September 24, 1917, and of October 24, 1917, are plain and explicit. They do not give the Secretary of the Treasury or any commission great powers of discretion as this bill does; they do not give the Secretary of the Treasury or a commission authority to change the bonds of one Government to those of another Government; they do not give the Secretary of the Treasury or any commission authority to adjust and settle all claims now existing or which may hereafter arise between the Government of the United States and foreign Governments. They do not give the Secretary of the Treasury or any commission or any other body authority to fix the rates of interest on these obligations.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COLLIER. In a moment. The provisions of these Liberty loan acts are plain, simple, and explicit. They are set out in the minority reports, but in brief they simply provide that it shall be the duty of the Secretary of the Treasury that when we loan money to the representatives of foreign Governments he shall with the money purchase at par from those foreign Governments their obligations at a rate of interest fixed—not like this bill, left to the discretion of a commission—but at a rate of interest fixed by law and not less than the highest rate of interest in any Liberty loan act bond that may be issued here in the United States. They further provide that these bonds so purchased at par by the Secretary of the Treasury shall bear in all their essentials resemblance to the bonds that have been issued here in the United States and which were purchased by the American people. I now yield to the gentleman.

Mr. LONGWORTH. The gentleman has been describing the act he referred to. Did Secretary McAdoo make those transactions under the provisions of those acts?

Mr. COLLIER. Do I understand by that, did he buy those obligations at par? Did he take those bonds? Did he refund them?

Mr. LONGWORTH. Yes.

Mr. COLLIER. No; he did not, and the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. FORDNEY] said a few moments ago that if the Secretary of the Treasury had taken those obligations as the act authorized him to do, we would not be having the trouble that we are having to-day. The chairman of the Ways and Means Committee and the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. LONGWORTH] ought to know that when those loans were made they were not made in one lump, at any one time, to the representatives of the foreign Governments.

When England came to the Treasury officials and stated that in 6 or 9 or 10 months they would need a billion or a billion and a quarter of dollars, and when the French representatives came to our Treasury Department and stated that in a certain period of time they would need half a billion or so of dollars, there was made, as the gentleman from Ohio ought to know and as the chairman of the committee ought to know, what were called commitments; that a provision was made for the loaning of these billions of dollars, but the actual money was not loaned at that time. The money was placed to the credit of these foreign Governments. One week a certain amount would be drawn and several weeks afterwards another amount, and how could the Secretary of the Treasury know what the rate of interest would be on bonds issued three or four months in advance? Experience proved that subsequent bond issues would have to authorize a higher rate of interest than the first issue. How could the Secretary refund those obligations and fix the interest when he himself did not know when the money would be raised by the Liberty bond act nor what the interest would be?

Mr. McFADDEN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COLLIER. I will.

Mr. McFADDEN. The gentleman is speaking of the authority conferred on the Secretary of the Treasury. It has been stated here that the Secretary of the Treasury agreed to an extension of the interest, the unpaid interest, for three years. Was such authority granted under the law?

Mr. COLLIER. I doubt whether there was any such authority. The question was simply this, that when a man has not the interest you can not get interest, and when they did not have the interest and we knew they could not get the interest, that was all the Secretary could do, of course.

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. It is a fact, is it not, that Secretary Glass and Secretary Houston in their annual reports advised Congress that the collection of interest was impossible and submitted the matter to Congress? If Congress had been of a different opinion, it could have taken action.

Mr. COLLIER. Congress was fully advised. I would like to say to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. McFADDEN] that the Secretary was a triweekly visitor to the Committee on Ways and Means, and, if my recollection is not at fault, I think on several occasions we had the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. McFADDEN] with us there. Congress was thoroughly advised before the extension of interest was granted to the foreign Governments.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Would my friend at the time the Liberty loan act was before the Ways and Means Committee have voted to permit the Secretary of the Treasury to loan $3,000,000,000 without any security of any sort?

Mr. COLLIER. Without any security?

Mr. LONGWORTH. Yes; except a note of hand—an I O U.

Mr. COLLIER. I will say to the gentleman from Ohio that when I voted for the Liberty loan act I voted for an act which placed every limitation and safeguard possible around the refunding of our loans, which the bill you have brought in to-day does not do. I remember distinctly that on several occasions the Secretary of the Treasury reported to the Ways and Means Committee that the due bills or promises to pay by these representatives of the foreign nations was the best security that could be taken at that time. And I want the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. LONGWORTH] to bear this in mind, that when we were in the midst of the greatest war of all the ages, when the institutions of our own liberty and the liberty of the world were threatened, there was not then, my friends, the same time for coolness and deliberation as there is now, years after the war, when you come in and by a bill seek to destroy, throw away, and cast aside all the limitations and safeguards which Congress in a time of great stress saw fit to throw around the refunding of these obligations.

Mr. McFADDEN. Notwithstanding the statement the gentleman has made in regard to Congress being fully informed in regard to the extension of this interest by the Secretary of the Treasury without authority, as the gentleman from Ohio states, I must differ with him, because Congress was not informed on the subject. I do not think the gentleman can point to any public report or records showing that Congress was informed. My understanding is, from the record which I have read in the hearings, the Secretary of the Treasury was seeking from the Ways and Means Committee the authority to do this thing, and the Ways and Means Committee did not give him authority, but in spite of that this three-year extension of this interest was made.

Mr. ARENTZ. If you look on page 192 of the hearings on S. 1235 you will see the following.

Mr. COLLIER. The hearings in the House?

Mr. ARENTZ. No; in the Senate. This is what was addressed by the Secretary of the Treasury, Mr. Mellon, to the chancellor of the exchequer. He says:

The Treasury is prepared, at the convenience of the Governments of the Allies, to take up with their representatives the funding of the demand obligations which the United States holds into long-time obligations, and at the same time refunding during the reconstruction period—say for a period of two or three years—of the interest on the obligations of foreign Governments acquired by the United States under the Liberty loan acts.

And then the chancellor of the exchequer replies to this as follows:

You are already aware that the British Government accepts, as far as they are concerned, the suggestions of the United States that the demand obligations of the Allies should be funded into long-time obligations and that for a period of two or three years—preferably three—the interest on the obligations of foreign Governments acquired by the United States should also be funded, and that we are ready to extend similar treatment to our allies in respect of their obligations to us.

Mr. COLLIER. Now, what is the question?

Mr. ARENTZ. That is the answer to the question put to you by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MCFADDEN] as to whether or not there has been anything——

Mr. COLLIER. I am much obliged to the gentleman for saving me the trouble of answering the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MCFADDEN].

Mr. DENISON. Will the gentleman state whether or not under any of the bills passed by Congress authorizing the loans the Secretary of the Treasury was required to take anyone else into consultation with him in making the loans?

Mr. COLLIER. With the approval of the President.

Mr. DENISON. Were they not required to have the approval of the President?

Mr. COLLIER. Of course.

Mr. DENISON. But no one else?

Mr. COLLIER. That is the way the act reads.

Mr. DENISON. In any of these bills would the Secretary of the Treasury be required to report back to Congress or get the approval of Congress of any loan?

Mr. COLLIER. He was not; and the distinction between that bill and this bill is this, because the powers of the Secretary of the Treasury under the Liberty loan act were fixed and determined by law, and the powers of this commission are greater than have ever been given by any legislative body to any other commission in the legislative history of the world. Their powers are not fixed, they are not determined, and they are not limited. This bill changes the law and sets aside the limitation which Congress fixed in the Liberty loan act.

Now, there are a great many Members on the minority side who want to speak, and I want to get on with my remarks, and I will ask that I be not further interrupted.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COLLIER. I will yield to the gentleman from Tennessee.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. I want to submit a statement in correction of the statement of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MCFADDEN]. On September 26, 1919, Mr. Secretary Glass issued a public statement, giving the policy that it was proposed to follow in the refunding of this indebtedness, including interest. At the same time he wrote a letter to the chairman of the Committee on Finance of the Senate, giving the plan that was to be followed. That letter was made public, and it was in response, I may say, to an inquiry made by the chairman of the Committee on Finance as to what policy was to be pursued. No action was taken upon it, but on December 18, 1919, Mr. Secretary Glass, having seen observations that were made on the floor of the House of Representatives and probably in the Senate and statements in the press of the country, realized from them that there was misapprehension, and he addressed a letter to Mr. FORDNEY, chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means, the concluding paragraph of which is quoted in the minority report, stating that his advisers were firmly of the opinion that he had full authority. Mr. FORDNEY thereupon replied, suggesting some doubts, so far as the Ways and Means Committee was concerned, under date of January 19, 1920. On April 2, 1920, Mr. FORDNEY wrote a letter to Mr. Glass's successor withdrawing that former letter.

These facts ought to be stated, and all the facts fairly stated, and no such impression should be created as that which has been given out.

Mr. LONDON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COLLIER. Yes.

Mr. LONDON. Under this bill the President can appoint five members of the Cabinet as the commission—that is the way the bill reads—without the advice and consent of the Senate. It is really conferring upon the President and his Cabinet the power to cancel all of these debts by indefinitely postponing their payment, or postponing them for a very long term. Is not that what it means?

Mr. COLLIER. I would not go so far as to say it confers on the President the power to cancel these debts. But it confers an immense power on him to fix the interest and the date and time of payment for them, whereas under existing law the time of payment of these debts and the rate of interest are both fixed.

Now, the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. FORDNEY] stated, in reply to a question on this side, that you could not fix the rate of interest by law. He must have meant you could not fix the rate of interest by a new law. This House could not do it by a new law, but existing law already fixes both the rate of interest and the duration of time for which the loans must be made.

Mr. MCFADDEN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COLLIER. Yes.

Mr. MCFADDEN. In view of what the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. GARRETT] has just stated in regard to these negotiations, I think it is only fair to say, in connection with that, that the negotiations for the extension of this debt were initiated long before that by an Assistant Secretary of the Treasury. An emissary had been over to Great Britain. There had been negotiations here, as the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. OLDFIELD] recited, that were not made public. There was some initiative back of all this. There was some reason why these officers of the Treasury Department were insisting on getting authority to extend this interest. There must have been some understanding somewhere by somebody that was not made known to Congress.

Mr. COLLIER. I can not yield further to the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Now, we know that we can not get interest when the foreign Government has not the interest to pay. We can not get interest when an individual has not the interest to pay. A government and an individual can not get interest when there is not the money to pay it with, and that is the reason, or one of the reasons, why we did not get interest.

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COLLIER. Yes.

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. I read from the report of the Secretary of the Treasury, Mr. Glass, in which he says:

In view of the present arrangement of the foreign exchanges, it would add to the difficulty of the situation, and would not be to the advantage of the United States to require cash payment.

That is from his report in which he discusses foreign credits.

Mr. COLLIER. I thank the gentleman. I will ask now not to be interrupted for a few minutes.

Whether the Liberty loan act gave authority to the Secretary of the Treasury or not, I have been a Member of this House long enough to know that when the steam roller starts to rolling over there this bill now before the House is the one that is going to pass, and therefore if this bill does become a law, that if the majority have determined that the law now existing be changed and the safeguards and limitations which the Congress of the United States were careful to put into that law be cast aside, then we contend that if this vast power be placed in the hands of a commission without the limitations and safeguards which are found in the Liberty loan acts, then the Congress of the United States should at least have an opportunity to review the acts of this commission before final settlement is made.

We believe, if the existing law is to be changed, that then the Congress should only grant authority to the representatives of the United States to enter into negotiations with the representatives of the foreign Governments, so that these obligations may be refunded or converted into bonds or other obligations of such foreign Governments as in the judgment of Congress will fully protect the United States in all legal rights and interests which might arise in any one or in all of these transactions.

If the Liberty loan acts of 1917 are to be changed and set aside and authority to refund these obligations of the foreign Governments be vested in the hands of a commission, then this commission, the representatives of the United States, should be authorized only to make tentative agreements with the representatives of the foreign Governments as to the kind of bond which may be required, the time when final payments is to be made, provide for the payment of any part of the debt by installments or on the amortization plan, definitely fix the rate of interest, and then report these tentative agreements to the Congress of the United States for approval or disapproval by the representatives of the American people.

The Secretary of the Treasury first asked that he be given full authority to enter into negotiations with the representatives of the foreign Governments and refund or convert and extend the time of payment of both principal and interest of any obligations of any foreign Government now owing to the United States into bonds or other obligations and to exchange the bonds of one Government for those of another Government, fix the rate of interest on these bonds, take such security as should be deemed best, and to adjust and settle all claims the United States now has or may hereafter have against any foreign Government.

H. R. 7359 was introduced by the chairman of the Ways and Means Committee giving this authority to the Secretary of the Treasury, and Senator PENROSE, chairman of the Finance Committee of the Senate, introduced the same bill, which was reported by the Finance Committee with an amendment which limited the time to five years. And on the 22d day of June, 1921, the President of the United States wrote a letter to Mr. FORDNEY, the chairman of the Ways and Means Committee, expressing the hope that the Congress would promptly sanction an act giving this authority to the Secretary of the Treasury.

Without at this time going into the merits of the proposal to exchange the bonds of one country for those of another country, yet I think the record ought to be clear.

The majority report recites on page 1—

> The popular belief seems to be that authority is sought by the Secretary either to exchange the obligations of one country for the obligations of some other country or to cancel a portion or all of the principal and interest due.
> Such authority—

Recites the report—

> was not sought by the Secretary of the Treasury.

Why, my friends, we ought to keep the record clear. Such authority was sought by the Secretary of the Treasury. Such authority was given in a bill introduced by the chairman of the Ways and Means Committee. Such authority was given in a bill introduced by Senator PENROSE and reported by the Finance Committee of the Senate. Such authority was asked by the President of the United States in a letter which is printed in the hearings.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COLLIER. I yield to the gentleman from Wisconsin.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Does not section 3 expressly prohibit the exchange of such bonds?

Mr. COLLIER. It does; and I just stated, a few moments before, that I am glad, in the event that this authority is to be vested in a commission, that this section has been put in the bill; but I am not so sure that if this bill should be amended so that the Congress should pass finally upon these matters, that would be a wise provision.

I will say to the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. COOPER] that I simply want to keep the record straight. The report stated that the Secretary of the Treasury did not ask permission to exchange the bonds of one country for those of another. On page 9 of the hearings Mr. OLDFIELD asked the Secretary of the Treasury the following question:

> Mr. OLDFIELD (interposing). This bill also provides for the trading or exchanging of the bonds of one country for the bonds of another country; for instance, the British for the French or the French for the Austrian.
> Secretary MELLON. In regard to that, there is not any particular place where we expect that to apply. It was simply thought desirable to have broad authority so that if some contingency arose that would require an exchange of that kind, we would be in position to act on it. For instance, say, in Austria, there may be, in joining with these other nations, some other security we could take in exchange that might be better than the position we are in now. We have not anything in contemplation and there is not any contingency of that kind that we anticipate at all, but here are complicated negotiations with a variety of Governments, and almost any contingency is liable to arise, and therefore it is desirable and likely essential to have that authority.

While no one doubts the honesty and ability of the Secretary of the Treasury, nor doubts that in dealing with these debtor countries he would be as jealous of American rights and American interests as he would be of his own, yet such an authority should never be given to the Secretary of the Treasury or to a commission, no matter who insists that it should be done. This is a matter involving eleven thousand million dollars, and there are many viewpoints by which this matter may be surveyed. These eleven thousand million dollars belong to the American people, and in order to lend this money to our allies in the hour of their direst need, at a time when never before in the history of the Republic were the necessaries of life so high or the cost of living so dear, the American people made great sacrifices.

I believe that nearly 95 per cent of the money due the United States from foreign Governments is due from solvent countries, and this money can be and it should be paid. It is the duty of Congress to guard against the mistaken zeal of those who might believe that a transfer of some of the obligations of our solvent debtors to those less solvent, and take in exchange the obligations or bonds of those countries less solvent, might create what certain financiers are pleased to call "a financial equilibrium," which in their judgment may be necessary in order to restore commercial conditions throughout the world.

These $11,000,000,000 belong to the American people, and if conditions should so arise that it might appear that the best way to safeguard American interests in the broadest, fullest sense would be, in view of a world-wide financial situation and the distressing conditions in continental Europe; in view of the depreciated currency of nearly every country save our own and the pressing need of stimulating international trade relations so that our debtor countries may have their credit improved and their purchasing power strengthened; if it should appear that in view of all this the best way to safeguard American interests would be to relieve some of our largest debtor countries by taking in exchange for the bonds they should give to us the bonds they have taken and hold against less solvent countries; if this should appear to be best, let the American people who own these $11,000,000,000 instead of a few financiers decide through their accredited representatives, the Congress of the United States, whether or not such a sacrifice of the people's money would be for the best interests of the American Republic.

In the refunding of these $11,000,000,000 of obligations owing to the United States by the various foreign Governments, the amount involved and the number of nations interested may cause many complicated situations to arise, and in these complications of international settlements between the Government of the United States and the Governments of a number of foreign nations many different angles may be presented and many different viewpoints both at home and abroad may be found. All of these various viewpoints may be honest, yet few of them may be wise.

When asked why it was that when Great Britain owed the United States over $4,000,000,000, the Government of the United States less than six months ago, in settlement of certain claims paid to the Government of Great Britain $32,000,000 in actual cash instead of crediting this amount upon the indebtedness of Great Britain to the United States, the Secretary of the Treasury stated, among other reasons, that it was "such a small item." There is his viewpoint. We all remember that some time ago there was an honest sentiment expressed by many that a grateful recognition of the services of the illustrious Lafayette to the Colonial forces in their struggle for American independence could well be made and gracefully acknowledged by foregoing the $3,000,000,000 debt owed us by France. No one questions the honesty of that sentiment, however we may doubt its wisdom. The paying of $32,000,000 in actual cash to a country which owes us over ten times that amount in interest alone is an action the honesty of which no one can question, however much we may doubt and deplore the wisdom of it.

It has been repeatedly intimated here in this Chamber by some of the leading statesmen in this body that if the collection of this $11,000,000,000 should interfere with the prohibitive tariff rates which they hope to fasten on the American people they would rather relinquish the obligations owing to the Government of the United States by the foreign nations. This is another viewpoint, and yet no one questions the honesty of these protection-mad statesmen, who, in order to increase tariff rates so high that all legitimate competition will be stifled and strangled, would be willing, in addition to the destruction of our foreign markets, to sacrifice $11,000,000,000 belonging to the American people.

Therefore, my friends, it is the different angles and viewpoints, all of which may be honest but few of which may be wise, that make me want either to keep the law we have, which adequately safeguards the refunding of these loans by express limitations, or to amend the present bill and let Congress in its judgment and wisdom decide whether or not these obligations as refunded by the commission shall be ratified.

Now, my friends, in a few minutes I want to tell you why I said I believed nearly 95 per cent of these loans should be collected.

It seems that the total amount of obligations of the foreign Governments due the United States, without including interest, is $10,141,267,585.63, as evidenced by money received by them from the United States for advances made under various Liberty bond acts, obligations incurred by foreign Governments in the purchase of surplus war materials, obligations held by the United States Grain Corporation, and obligations received by the Treasury Department from the American Relief Administration.

Nine billion four hundred and thirty-five million two hundred and twenty-five thousand three hundred and twenty-nine dollars and twenty-nine cents of these obligations were derived from the sale of Liberty bonds. Eighty-four million ninety-three thousand nine hundred and sixty-three dollars and fifty-five cents were given Russia, Poland, Armenia, Czechoslovakia, Esthonia, Latvia, and Finland by the American Relief Administration. Obligations in the amount of $56,899,878.09 are held by the United States Grain Corporation and are owed by Armenia, Austria, Czechoslovakia, Hungary, and Poland. Of this amount Austria alone received $24,055,708.92 and Poland received $24,353,390.97. Obligations to the amount of $565,048,413.90 were incurred by the purchase of surplus war materials, of which amount France is indebted to the United States in the sum of $400,000,000, Belgium in the sum of $27,588,581.14, Czechoslovakia $20,621,999.54, and the other countries of Russia, Poland, and southern Europe in the sum of $116,867,833.12. All of these obligations bear interest at the rate of 5 per cent.

Of the total indebtedness of $10,141,267,585.63 due, Great Britain is our largest debtor country, owing the United States the sum of $4,166,318,358.44. France owes the United States $3,350,762,938.19, Italy $1,648,034,050.90, Belgium $375,280,147.37, and Czechoslovakia owes $91,179,528.72, making a total of $9,631,575,023.62, together with all accrued interest. This amount of $9,631,575,023.62 is nearly 95 per cent of the entire indebtedness due the United States from the foreign Governments.

These five countries are recovering rapidly from the effects of the war, and there is no reason why in time they should not pay every dollar they owe the United States.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COLLIER. I will.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. I notice that the gentleman made no mention of the $80,000,000 or the $100,000,000 that we loaned to Mr. Bakhmeteff for the Kerenski government on his own signature.

Mr. COLLIER. I do not know anything about those millions; I am talking about the five debtor countries which I believe are solvent, and I include Czechoslovakia because that country owns the great grain belt in the Austrian Empire, and my information is that it is fast being rehabilitated and recovering from the ravages of war.

In conclusion, Mr. Chairman, I would be willing for the Secretary of the Treasury, with the approval of the President, to have the same powers given that commission, provided he reports to Congress. In objecting to this bill I do not do so because I may have any lack of confidence in either the Secretary of the Treasury or the commission which this bill seeks to create. It has been intimated, or was a while ago, that this commission will consist entirely of Cabinet members. If the commission is to be created and the powers as outlined in the bill given to the commission and the President is going into his Cabinet to appoint that commission, I have no criticism to make of a commission composed of such a personnel. I object to this bill not because I am not satisfied with the commission the President may appoint but because the bill destroys the limitations and safeguards existing law throws around the refunding of these obligations of the foreign Governments. I am opposed to that law being changed by the creation of any commission, no matter what the personnel of that commission may be. I am opposed to the creation of a commission to refund these foreign obligations which has more power and authority than has ever before been granted to any commission by any legislative body in the world.

I am opposed to all this power and all this authority being vested in one man or in five men, no matter how high their character may be, no matter how great their ability may be, and no matter how strict their integrity may be. The refunding of these foreign obligations is a matter in which the final settlement should be left to the American Congress, and I shall vote against the bill. [Applause.] Mr. Chairman, I reserve the balance of my time.

Mr. FORDNEY. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. LONGWORTH].

Mr. LONGWORTH. Mr. Chairman, nearly four years and a half ago our first advances of credit were made to the nations engaged with us in prosecuting the war with Germany. From that time until the close of the war, under the authority of various acts of Congress, the amount of our foreign loan has risen until it reached the sum of something more than $10,100,000,000. In addition to this, there is to-day due us in interest from debtor nations very nearly $1,000,000,000.

For this vast sum we possess no formal security of any sort or kind, and it is the purpose of this legislation to bring something like order out of absolute chaos and to place our affairs with our debtors upon something like a fair business basis.

Of the $10,100,000,000 representing the face value of the indebtedness of the various foreign Governments, exclusive of interest, about $9,500,000,000 represents advances made under the various Liberty loan acts, and it is my contention that had the plain spirit if not the letter of the law been followed by the then responsible officials of the last administration this entire indebtedness would now be represented by formal and good security instead of merely by notes of hand, or, as the present Secretary of the Treasury defined them to the Finance Committee of the Senate, merely I O U's.

I desire in the first place to read to the House the provisions of the first Liberty loan act under which the first advances of credit to our allies were made, and to ask your calm judgment as to whether any reasonable construction of this provision would justify the transactions negotiated and accomplished by the then Secretary of the Treasury. Section 2 of the first Liberty loan act, approved April 24, 1917, authorizing the extension of credits to foreign Governments, is as follows:

SEC. 2. That for the purpose of more effectually providing for the national security and defense and prosecuting the war by establishing credits in the United States for foreign Governments, the Secretary of the Treasury, with the approval of the President, is hereby authorized, on behalf of the United States, to purchase at par, from such foreign Governments then engaged in war with the enemies of the United States their obligations hereafter issued, bearing the same rate of interest and containing in their essentials the same terms and conditions as those of the United States issued under authority of this act.

Is there anything, so far, in this section which would justify the advance of any money to a foreign Government except by purchasing from them at par their formal obligations of the same tenor and conditions as those issued by the United States for procuring the funds for loaning purposes?

The rest of the section goes on—to enter into such arrangements as may be necessary or desirable for establishing such credits and for purchasing such obligations of foreign Governments and for the subsequent payment thereof before maturity, but such arrangements shall provide that if any of the bonds of the United States bearing a higher rate of interest than 3½ per cent, then and in that event the obligations of such foreign Governments held by the United States shall be by such foreign Governments converted in a like manner and exchanged into obligations bearing the same rate of interest as the bonds of the United States issued under the provisions of section 5 of this act.

And then the section goes on to appropriate $3,000,000,000 to carry out the purpose of the act.

Do you see one line or word in this section that authorizes the loaning of money except by the purchase of foreign securities? I asked a question of the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. COLLIER] on this subject, but he did not answer me directly. I am confident that neither he nor any member of the Ways and Means Committee would have voted for that act as it stood if he had had any idea that it was going to be violated as it was. Nor would any one of us have voted to give the Secretary of the Treasury the authority he actually exercised to sell our bonds and give the cash to foreign Governments simply taking in return the I O U of that Government. There is not a man on that side of the House who would have voted for that proposition, and certainly no one on this side. And yet that is the exact form of the transaction that was carried out in arranging the loan of $9,500,000,000. To-day all we have as security are scraps of paper bearing the signature of whatever representative of that country who happened to be here when they received the money.

It is our purpose to get rid of this anomalous state of affairs and restore a businesslike condition.

Mr. FAIRCHILD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LONGWORTH. Yes.

Mr. FAIRCHILD. If the Secretary of the Treasury under this act had been given as broad powers as are given by this bill to this commission, then what he did would be fully legalized by that legislation.

Mr. LONGWORTH. I do not quite understand the gentleman.

Mr. FAIRCHILD. If the power had been as broad as the power in this bill, what he did would be fully legalized?

Mr. LONGWORTH. Oh, no; I do not think so. I think this bill is an entirely different proposition. This bill would not authorize the making of any further loans on I O U's, not by any means. It is an extension of the power of the Liberty loan act to fund these obligations in the way they should have been funded originally. No valid excuse was ever offered, so far as I ever heard, for this departure from the plain intent of Congress with regard to substantial security for foreign loans. Several times Secretary McAdoo was before the Committee on Ways and Means and was questioned about the matter. The statements were never published in any printed hearing; they were never made to the House of Representatives. The gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. COLLIER] said that we all knew that these transactions were going on. They were absolutely secret in so far as any public statement issuing from the Treasury Department is concerned. Secretary McAdoo excused this sort of transaction by saying that it was more convenient and expeditious, and, furthermore, that we were receiving a higher rate of interest, to wit, 5 per cent, than we would have received if he had proceeded under the law—whatever law happened to be in force at the time, whether the first, the second, or the third, or fourth Liberty loan act, providing different rates of interest; and he said that the income of the Government would be $500,000,000 a year instead of being only about $400,000,000 a year, when as a matter of fact we have never received one cent, practically, of actual interest. It is true that we have received, as was brought out by the chairman of the committee, in round numbers about $430,000,000 of what was called interest, but it was paid out of the money that we were advancing at the time, and was not properly any interest on the debt in any sense.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LONGWORTH. Yes.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. I want to see if I understand clearly the contention of the gentleman as to the Secretary of the Treasury in not following the law. Do I understand it is on account of the form of the obligations which he took? Is it because of the fact that he took a note of hand, rather than an engraved bond?

Mr. LONGWORTH. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Tennessee is a good lawyer. Can he himself read into section 2 of either the first or second Liberty loan act any authority to loan cash and accept only a note of hand for it?

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Does the gentleman desire an answer at this time?

Mr. LONGWORTH. Yes.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. I do.

Mr. LONGWORTH. I would like to have the gentleman point out the authority.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Because the act reads—to purchase, at par, from such foreign Governments then engaged in war with the enemies of the United States their obligations hereafter issued.

That does not say "bond." A note of hand is an obligation.

Mr. LONGWORTH. But what is the further provision? It is that the security shall be in the same form, bearing the same rate of interest, and having the same maturity as the bond issue from which the amount loaned was derived.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Precisely, and I say to the gentleman, according to the report of the Secretary of the Treasury in 1920, which includes a skeleton copy of the obligations that were taken, that the law is complied with in every particular.

Mr. LONGWORTH. If the gentleman can read that into the law, then he is a more resourceful lawyer than I thought he was.

Mr. SABATH. But the gentleman said that he is a great lawyer.

Mr. LONGWORTH. He is even greater than I thought.

Mr. HUSTED. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LONGWORTH. Yes.

Mr. HUSTED. Does the gentleman think that a note of hand signed by an ambassador is a legal obligation of a foreign Government?

Mr. LONGWORTH. Of course it is not, and we could not possibly collect upon it in any legal procedure whatever. It is merely an I O U. And I claim that if not the plain letter, at least the intent and spirit of the law was violated by Secretary McAdoo in every transaction that took place in connection with the Liberty loans.

Mr. McFADDEN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LONGWORTH. Yes.

Mr. McFADDEN. Has there been any acknowledgment by any of these countries to whom we loaned money of the validity of these obligations?

Mr. LONGWORTH. The gentleman will see that in the report of the Treasury Department these obligations are all put down as past due—$9,500,000,000 of them—no security whatever for them. We propose to get some security under this bill.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Is the gentleman able to state whether there is any single instance of any Government at any time anywhere ever questioning a single one of these obligations?

Mr. LONGWORTH. Whether they have ever been questioned or not, whether the policy pursued was justifiable or not under the circumstances, the fact remains that the plain intent of the law was not complied with in making these loans. The situation is that to-day the interest due upon any of our foreign loans is not an income to the United States and probably will not be for at least some years to come.

I do not mean by this statement to make any criticism of our allies for the nonpayment of interest upon these loans. Under present conditions the depletion of their gold reserve, which such payments would involve, would probably be disastrous to them, and a bad thing for the world at large until normal conditions are somewhat restored. I am only commenting upon the arguments used in defense of the system pursued by the last administration of neglecting to take any formal security, that thereby the income of the Government would be enhanced, whereas there has never been and probably will not be for some time to come any income whatever from this source.

This anomalous state of affairs has continued until to-day. It is true that in the latter part of the year 1919 some effort was made by the last administration to procure a refunding of part of the loan. For that purpose a Mr. Rathbone, one of the assistant secretaries of the Treasury, was sent abroad, and he conducted some negotiations with Great Britain and possibly some other countries in connection with the refunding of their loans, but nothing ever got further than a merely tentative state, and he returned home some months later without anything having been accomplished. It was during his absence that Congress for the first time was approached by the last administration to give some sort of legislative sanction to this procedure. It was claimed by the Treasury Department that under section 3 of the first and second Liberty loan acts, in arranging for refunding of the foreign war debt, the Secretary had authority to defer the payment of interest, and that was the main feature of the negotiations that Mr. Rathbone was conducting.

Attention was called by some gentleman on the other side this morning to a letter written by the chairman of the committee to the Treasury Department, saying that in the opinion of the committee there was legal authority to do what it was proposed to do. Now, that related only to the question of deferred interest, and that was the subject of the chairman's letter. I shall read, and I ask the attention of gentlemen on the other side of the House to the position taken at the time by the Treasury Department in asking the Committee on Ways and Means to O. K. their proposed transactions. What I shall quote is contained in hearings which were not printed, but I feel it proper to read Secretary Glass's opinion at that time. The question was whether the committee believed that the Secretary had the authority to proceed upon the program suggested. He said:

I may say that the Treasury has no desire and no purpose to exercise the authority if this committee raised an objection to it. I have not, of course, examined the matter myself. I do not know that I would be any better off if I were to, because I am not a lawyer. I know that Mr. Leffingwell, who is a lawyer, and Mr. Rathbone also, have assumed that the Treasury Department has authority under the statutes to refund the interest, but I can readily see that that procedure was not in contemplation of the law, even though it technically gives authority, and therefore I would say that the Treasury would be unwilling to exercise a technical power that this committee and Congress might think was not intended to be conveyed.

Mr. HAWLEY. Will the gentleman yield? Will the gentleman identify for the RECORD the hearing to which he refers?

Mr. LONGWORTH. The hearing I have referred to was before the Committee on Ways and Means on January 28, 1920. What I have quoted shows that in the opinion of the Treasury Department it was extremely doubtful whether they had any authority whatever to postpone the interest or to refund the foreign loan at various rates of interest, and it was admitted all along by both sides that it was never in contemplation of the Congress that the authority had been given.

Now, the Democratic Party here say they have ample authority and that there is no need for this bill, and that in face of the announced opinion of the Treasury Department when they were asking us to give that authority. What the committee did was, and that without partisanship, I am glad to say, was that in its opinion the Treasury Department at the time had the right technically to defer the interest, but it declined to express any opinion as to the wisdom of the policy.

Mr. McFADDEN. If the gentleman will yield, I understood the gentleman to say, in regard to the hearings from which he quoted, that they were not printed and were confidential?

Mr. LONGWORTH. They were not confidential, but they were not printed. As a matter of fact, some agreements were made by Mr. Rathbone, but the whole thing came to nothing, and for four and a half years the situation is that we have this enormous debt without any security whatever, and we propose by this bill to make an arrangement——

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LONGWORTH. I will.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Can the gentleman state to the committee at whose instance these negotiations of Mr. Rathbone were broken off?

Mr. LONGWORTH. I think it was admitted he could not accomplish anything, and he was called home. I think it is stated in the hearing before the Senate committee by Assistant Secretary Wadsworth that he remained abroad from November until May and having failed to accomplish anything, and Congress having taken no action, and the department being in grave doubt apparently whether they had any legal authority to act, nothing was done.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. I can state to the gentleman upon authority of the former Secretary of the Treasury, Mr. Glass, that those negotiations were broken off at the instance of the British Government.

Mr. LONGWORTH. That may be possible, but at any rate nothing was ever done by the department in any way looking to a refunding of these loans; nothing was ever accomplished.

Mr. MONDELL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LONGWORTH. I will.

Mr. MONDELL. The gentleman made a rather broad statement relative to the negotiations to the effect that nothing came of it. There was a postponement of the interest for a period of years as an outcome of those negotiations.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Not an actual postponement, because the agreement was never ratified. The agreement was for a postponement of the interest for three years.

Mr. MONDELL. The Treasury Department did agree that there would be no demand made——

Mr. LONGWORTH. They made an agreement that they would not demand the interest, but they received no security from Great Britain, no consideration, at least no long-time security.

Mr. MONDELL. So far as the negotiations went it was simply a remission of the payment or a postponement of the demand for the payment of interest?

Mr. LONGWORTH. That is absolutely all that was accomplished.

Mr. MONDELL. That relieved our foreign creditors of the payment of approximately half a billion dollars.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Yes; we lost approximately the income of a quarter of a billion for three years. That was the sum and substance of it, but there was no further security obtained on the part of the United States.

Mr. MONDELL. But there was very important action on the part of our Treasury officials in agreeing not to demand or require or call for the payment of interest?

Mr. LONGWORTH. Exactly so.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LONGWORTH. I yield.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. In order that we may understand clearly, is the wisdom of that action in question?

Mr. LONGWORTH. Of what action?

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. The so-called deferring of interest payment?

Mr. LONGWORTH. I am expressing no opinion whatever. I asserted awhile ago that I would express no opinion as to the advisability of postponing interest. It may have been a wise thing to do. The fact I am stating is that without the exaction of any further security we have postponed the interest.

Mr. MONDELL. Along the line of the inquiry of the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. GARRETT], while I think the present Secretary of the Treasury has expressed no opinion as to the wisdom of the agreement entered into or the action taken by our Treasury officials, he has announced that the action was bound by that understanding.

Mr. LONGWORTH. I believe he did.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. I so understand it. Will the gentleman permit me to ask the gentleman from Wyoming if he questions the wisdom of the action that was taken?

Mr. MONDELL. I do not know that I am called upon to express an opinion on that subject. I have refrained from criticism of that act as I have tried to refrain from criticism of a good many acts which if it had not been for war conditions under which those acts were performed I might be disposed to criticize.

Mr. LONGWORTH. I think the gentleman will also say, and I shall agree with him whether that was a wise act or not, it is time that we received long-time obligations and securities.

Mr. MONDELL. I think it is very clear that in agreeing to an arrangement which was so extraordinarily favorable to our creditors it would have been well, wise, and entirely proper to have required some consideration in return.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Now, the situation simply is that four and a half years have elapsed and nothing has been done.

Mr. FESS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LONGWORTH. I yield for a question.

Mr. FESS. Whether it was wise or not wise, it would not be wise now, would it, for us to keep ourselves in the same condition where we could not do more than violate the law than as before? We better cure it by this legislation.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Of course, and get it on something like a business basis.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Will the gentleman point out in this bill where there is any prevention against the Secretary of the Treasury deferring interest in the future?

Mr. LONGWORTH. It may be wise in the future to agree with other nations if we shall agree to the acceptance of long-time securities to postpone the rate of interest. The fact is, that so far nothing has been done. Four and a half years of experience has shown that without the legislation proposed in this bill it would be impossible to expect the necessary and highly desirable transactions looking to the refunding of our tremendous foreign war debt. Individually, I have grave doubts whether section 3, either of the first or second Liberty loan acts, would authorize any of the refunding of the foreign war debt not already secured with bonds of the same character and terms as bonds issued by this Government under the terms of this act. I have not time to go into the discussion of what those two sections mean, but they are printed here in the minority report, and I do not think any lawyer in this House can read either of those sections and find any authority there for either the postponement of interest or for the refunding at rates of interest to be determined hereafter. But even if, as claimed by the minority, those two sections give full authority to proceed to the refunding under the provisions of section 2 of each of those acts, what would be the result so far as these transactions would be concerned? Secretary Mellon answered that proposition in a sentence. He was asked by Senator REED during the hearings before the Senate Finance Committee:

> Why is it that you can not make those settlements in strict accordance with the terms of the acts of Congress authorizing these loans and specifying the conditions or obligations?

Secretary Mellon said:

> The reason is this: That the securities taken would not be in as good form for the purposes of our Government, because the authority is so restricted that it makes it very difficult. Our securities taken from England, for instance, would be split up, and some of them bear one rate of interest and others another rate of interest, because the rates of interest were different under the different Liberty loan acts, and we would have to follow each particular act as to that part of the claim.

Is not that very plain and simple? You would have to find the date of each particular loan to every foreign Government and see whether it came under the first, second, third, or fourth Liberty bond act before you could determine the rate of interest to be paid. It would be a perfectly senseless transaction to undertake to do it. And that shows the necessity for some such legislation as this.

Mr. WILLIAMSON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LONGWORTH. I will.

Mr. WILLIAMSON. Under section 2 here, would this commission be authorized to take any other security except Government bonds of foreign countries? Could they take municipal or State bonds or other securities of that character, or would they be confined to Government bonds?

Mr. LONGWORTH. Under section 2 of the bill?

Mr. WILLIAMSON. Yes.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Section 3 forbids taking any other bonds than those of the particular nation involved in the transaction.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield right there?

Mr. LONGWORTH. Yes.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Is not the answer to the question of the gentleman from South Dakota found in lines 9 and 10 of page 2?

Mr. LONGWORTH. I have not the bill before me.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. They are authorized to convert them into bonds or other obligations of such foreign Governments. You would then have a Government obligation.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Yes. It will be a Government obligation.

This brings me to the consideration of some particular features of the pending bill. The bill as originally introduced was open, in my judgment, to certain very grave objections. It conferred upon one man authority and power practically without limit as to time and discretion to make any arrangements he might see fit in regard to the funding of a debt of more than $11,000,000,000. I think I would hesitate less to give such power and authority to the present Secretary of the Treasury than to any other living man, but who can tell whether there may not be another Secretary of the Treasury to-morrow who will not have the business sagacity and eminent skill in handling financial problems that Secretary Mellon possesses?

This bill, therefore, contains several restrictions which I believe are eminently proper, and which will not interfere in the least with the business transactions to be made under the powers authorized. In the first place, it provides that the powers granted by the act shall cease and determine at the end of three years; that the transactions accomplished under it shall be made public; and that the authority granted by the act shall be administered by a commission of five, to be appointed by the President, and of which the Secretary of the Treasury shall be chairman, and no doubt the moving spirit.

If it is proper for me to say so, this provision as to the commission was adopted by the committee at my suggestion. It seemed to be almost the unanimous thought of the committee, and I believe it was practically the very general opinion at least of a majority of Congress, that all these powers should not be granted to one man, and various suggestions were made in the committee to add other men to the Secretary as his associates to conduct these negotiations. It was suggested by some members of the committee that there should be two Members of Congress associated with them, and by others that there should be four, and by others that the head of the Budget and the Comptroller of the Treasury and others should be added. But it became plain that such a proposition would be almost impossible to work out.

For instance, when Congress was not in session, how could these transactions be made if Members of Congress were to be on the commission and associated with the Secretary? It seemed that the creation of a commission to be appointed by the President and confirmed by the Senate would solve most of the difficulties, and it was adopted as a part of the bill.

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LONGWORTH. Yes.

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. In this first section is it contemplated that other than public officials shall be appointed? How does the gentleman propose to provide for their compensation?

Mr. LONGWORTH. No compensation is authorized.

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. It was intended that there should be no compensation authorized?

Mr. LONGWORTH. Yes.

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. And no authorization of any expense?

Mr. LONGWORTH. No authorization of any expense of any kind.

Another provision is included in section 3—that the bonds or obligations of one foreign country shall not be exchanged for the bonds or obligations of another foreign country, and that no part of their indebtedness shall be canceled except through payment thereof. Much time was occupied during the consideration of the bill by the Finance Committee of the Senate——

Mr. FESS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LONGWORTH. Certainly.

Mr. FESS. No part of the debt can be canceled. It is contemplated that the unpaid interest, as I understand it, of over a billion dollars was also to be included in the funding?

Mr. LONGWORTH. Unquestionably. That was the suggestion of Secretary Glass at one time. It was that where the interest was postponed there should be added to the fixed rate of interest enough to pay for the entire term the full rate of interest.

Mr. FESS. At a higher rate?

Mr. LONGWORTH. At a higher rate.

Mr. FESS. Suppose that they would at once pay it. Then we would not get the advantage of the higher rate, because there would be no interest at all?

Mr. LONGWORTH. Of course, in such an event——

Mr. FESS. That is not in?

Mr. LONGWORTH. Oh, no. The interest is a part of the debt.

Mr. FESS. There has been a good deal of contention on this ground, that inasmuch as we have not had it funded, interest is not running.

Mr. LONGWORTH. I understand the gentleman means it shall be funded as a part of the obligation?

Mr. FESS. Yes.

Mr. LONGWORTH. That is not contemplated. The deferred interest will have to be paid as interest, and not included in the total capital.

Mr. TEMPLE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LONGWORTH. Yes.

Mr. TEMPLE. It is not intended to charge any interest on the deferred interest? There is no element of compound interest?

Mr. LONGWORTH. No. No element of compound interest has been suggested.

A great deal of time was occupied in the Finance Committee of the Senate in the discussion of the question whether some of this debt could be repaid by foreign nations in German bonds, and possibly the reason for this discussion came from the fact that President Wilson, in a message to Congress in February, 1921, referred to the indorsement of this proposition by himself, Clemenceau, and Lloyd-George, that the Belgian debt to the various countries might be settled in German reparation bonds. At any rate the committee was of the opinion that it would not be wise to permit other nations to settle their indebtedness to us in the form of German reparation bonds, and therefore that is specifically prohibited by this bill.

Section 3 also provides that the foreign debt may not be canceled except by payment. With this proposition I am in hearty accord, and I think it a very appropriate time to set at rest rumors which have been more or less current, that it is in the mind of Congress to forgive the foreign war debt. Allusion was made this morning—it has been made once or twice in the last few days in debate—to the fact that I myself said on an occasion some time ago that I was willing to forgive the foreign war debt under certain conditions. Now, what I did say was this, and it is to be found on page 599 of the RECORD of December, 1920. These remarks, I may say, were made in connection with the proposal of President Wilson to further lower the tariff bars even below those provided under the Underwood law, against the markets of this country, to enable the foreign debt to be paid through the medium of actual importations, and it was in discussing that proposition that I said this:

> I hope that Europe's tremendous debt to us will prove to be collectible. I am not one of those who believe that any part of the debt ought to be forgiven. I do not think it quite respectful to the debtor countries to assume that their debts, properly and honorably contracted, are not eventually to be paid in full. But if it came to the last ditch, if it should eventuate that the only possible way to collect these debts would be to surrender to the nations of the world the home market of America, I would say, "Let us sacrifice every cent of the money owed us rather than sacrifice our industrial independence."

[Applause.]

That was my position then and it is my position now. But the possibility of contemplating any such contingency is removed by the election of a Republican Congress and a Republican President, because under such conditions the passage of a protective tariff bill is inevitable. [Applause.] There is no question of forgiving war debts any more.

It is a matter of very sincere regret to me that now for the first time since the first Liberty loan act was passed partisanship has been injected into the question of funding our foreign war debts. During the four and a half years that have elapsed since then no member of my party, whether we were in the minority or the majority, has ever hinted at politics in connection with this vitally important matter; but now, when the first concrete and workable proposition to provide for the funding of the war debt on terms satisfactory to all concerned is brought into the House the minority party opposes it. And what is it they propose? Either to have no legislation whatever or to provide that none of the transactions involving the refunding of our foreign indebtedness shall be legal until they have been passed upon favorably by the Congress. Is there a man here who can not see upon reflection that such a proposition would utterly hamstring the commission? It would be an insurmountable obstruction to negotiations and would tie the hands of the commission entirely and make it practically impotent. Then, too, it would prevent the conclusion of any negotiations within anything like a reasonable time unless the Congress were in session; and I am one of those who hope that the sessions of Congress from now on are not going to be so extensive as they have been in the past.

There is nothing constructive about the proposal of the minority. It is simply an effort to obstruct a measure vital to the business life of this country and to solve which during their time in power they made no serious or effective effort.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Will the gentleman permit a question right there?

Mr. LONGWORTH. I yield to the gentleman from Wisconsin.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. I made a suggestion of reply to the question asked by the gentleman from South Dakota, which question I think is very important; but my suggestion was not well founded, and I think the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. LONGWORTH] ought to interpret the language in the bill on page 2, line 16. The question of the gentleman from South Dakota is, I think, a very important one. The bill says the commission is authorized—> to adjust and settle any and all claims not now represented by bonds or obligations.

Mr. LONGWORTH. There are no claims under the Liberty loan act that are not represented by bonds or obligations.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. That is not what I had in mind, but the following words—which the United States of America now has or hereafter may have against any foreign Government and to accept securities therefor.

What kind of securities? The gentleman from South Dakota asked if municipal bonds or local bonds of any kind could be accepted in the discretion of the commission, or whether by interpretation they were to be only Government securities.

Mr. LONGWORTH. In my judgment that does not apply to any of the loans made under the authority of the Liberty loan acts. It might possibly apply to some of the arrangements made after the war with regard to the purchase of supplies or something of that sort.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. What sort of securities could they accept?

Mr. LONGWORTH. I can not answer the gentleman. I do not know. The bill gives the commission pretty broad authority.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. The Committee on Ways and Means reports the bill, and this is one of the provisions of the bill, and the House is going to vote upon it. We would like to know just what that means.

Mr. LONGWORTH. I can not tell the gentleman what securities may be in contemplation by the Secretary of the Treasury.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. No; but what class of securities is it possible for the commission to accept under that language?

Mr. LONGWORTH. Such securities as this commission should decide were in satisfaction of the claim; but I repeat that it does not apply to any of the $9,500,000,000 now out under the authority of the Liberty loan act.

Mr. LONDON. Will the gentleman yield for a brief question?

Mr. LONGWORTH. A short question. I think my time is about out.

Mr. LONDON. In dealing with nations, is is not true that the only form of security possible is the good faith of the nation? That is the only form of security you can have when you deal with a sovereign Government?

Mr. LONGWORTH. Of course, that is the only legal form. Any other would have to be collected by force of arms.

Mr. LONDON. Exactly.

Mr. DENISON. Not necessarily in this connection, because you might take additional securities——

Mr. LONGWORTH. That condition is where we have no bonds or obligations. It does not apply to the issues under the Liberty loan acts.

Mr. DENISON. You would have at all events the obligation of the Nation, and these others would be more security for that obligation. I do not care what form it was in. If it was merely in the form of an account, under the terms of this provision you might have municipal securities as additional to the original obligations.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Additional securities underlying the governmental obligations.

Mr. LONDON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LONGWORTH. Yes.

Mr. LONDON. Is it not true that in dealing with nations the only form of security is the good faith of the Government with which you deal and no other security is possible.

Mr. LONGWORTH. The suggestion of the gentleman from New York is basically sound, but if this provision to which the gentleman from Wisconsin refers applies at all it is only to an insignificant amount. Now, gentlemen, I repeat that I regret that politics should be injected into this debate. During this great reconstruction period we have not received in any case the active assistance of our Democratic friends. They complain daily that Congress is doing nothing, but whenever we try to do something instead of helping us they obstruct us. But with it all I venture this prediction, that before this Congress shall have adjourned a program of constructive legislation unexampled in the history of the Republic will have been placed on the statute books, and this particular bill will be no insignificant feature of it. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. COLLIER. Mr. Chairman, before I yield further time I ask permission to extend and revise my remarks in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Mississippi asks unanimous consent to extend and revise his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Mr. Chairman, I ask the same privilege.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. COLLIER. Mr. Chairman, I yield 30 minutes to the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. OLDFIELD].

Mr. OLDFIELD. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, I want to congratulate my good friend the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. LONGWORTH] on his optimism about this wonderful program of legislation that this Congress is going to place on the statute books before Congress adjourns. I trust that he will not be disappointed, but I very much fear that the country is going to be disappointed in the program you place on the statute books.

The gentlemen from Ohio also said in connection with this cancellation of the foreign debts—and I am mighty glad to see the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. FORDNEY] and the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. LONGWORTH] "back up" on the question of cancellation of the foreign debts—although I wish they would not speak about it at all because the propaganda is going to strike here soon calling upon Congress to try to elect Congressmen who are favorable to the cancellation of the foreign debts. I trust it will not be done. I very much fear, however, that some of the Republicans may be convinced in the future that it is necessary in order to keep out imports to cancel these debts. However, I shall hope for the best.

Now, gentlemen, this is a very simple proposition, and in answer to my friend the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MCFADDEN] I want to say this. The gentleman from Pennsylvania at some interruption a moment ago intimated that there was some doubt whether the obligations of these foreign Governments were properly authorized and properly signed. Gentlemen, there is no doubt about that. Secretary Mellon testified that these obligations were in such shape, authorized by representatives of the foreign Governments who had complete authority to bind their Governments so far as these loans were concerned. Therefore there is no doubt about that.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. OLDFIELD. Certainly.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Has the gentleman got the testimony that substantiates that?

Mr. OLDFIELD. Absolutely. This is in the hearings of Thursday, October 6, 1921, page 19. I so construe it and I believe the gentleman from Iowa will.

Mr. GREEN. I understand that you speak of what you now hold from the foreign Governments as evidence of the loans made under the various Liberty bond acts as obligations. Does the Government hold anything more than a mere receipt?

Secretary MELLON. Well, it is pretty nearly that. It is a duebill or note.

Mr. WADSWORTH. It is a definite form of note, and it is recited in the Secretary's report.

Mr. HAWLEY. It was signed in this country by the diplomatic representative and not by the fiscal agent of the country getting the loan.

Mr. WADSWORTH. It was signed by a representative of the Government, and that representative was duly authorized to sign.

Mr. GREEN. How do you mean duly authorized? No parliamentary or legislative action was taken.

Mr. WADSWORTH. In each case the State Department was asked to find out whether the individuals signing these obligations had authority from their Governments, and in each case the State Department inquired and found out they had. That is all on file.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. That is what Mr. Wadsworth stated. I think I made a statement a little after that in the hearings that none of the foreign Governments had ever passed any legislation to authorize that procedure.

Mr. OLDFIELD. I will read it.

Mr. GREEN. If they had made a little further inquiry they would have found that they did not have very satisfactory authority, because they ought to have known that there was no legislative act passed authorizing anything of the kind, either in Great Britain, France, or Italy.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I do not understand that any of these countries question in any way the validity of these obligations; I have never heard a word about that.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa, Mr. Wadsworth made the assertion and I made the assertion and nobody can contradict it, that there was no legislation authorizing any of these so-called loans.

Mr. CRISP. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. OLDFIELD. Certainly.

Mr. CRISP. Will the gentleman state, so that it may go into the RECORD, that Mr. Wadsworth was Assistant Secretary of the Treasury?

Mr. OLDFIELD. Yes; he was Assistant Secretary of the Treasury, and he did more talking before the committee than did the Secretary, Mr. Mellon. Therefore I assume that he is more familiar with the subject than the Secretary, and naturally so, if the Secretary designated him to look into these matters.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Was the Secretary of the Treasury present when these statements were made?

Mr. OLDFIELD. Yes; there is no doubt about the facts, I think. I make the statement; and if anybody doubts it, you can call up the Treasury of the United States on the telephone, and I believe the Treasury Department will say right now that there is no doubt about the validity of the authorization of these foreign Governments. There is no doubt about these facts as far as the original loans are concerned. Mr. FORDNEY opened the debate on this bill. Mr. COLLIER followed him, and did not say one word about politics. Mr. LONGWORTH followed Mr. COLLIER, and Mr. LONGWORTH says that we have made this proposition a partisan matter.

Ah, gentlemen, is it partisanship for us to demand that this commission shall report to the Congress? Of course, Secretary Mellon will no doubt be the whole commission, and I have no objection to that. Especially is that true if they make other members of it Cabinet officers; but has the time come when we are to be accused of partisanship when we want a Republican commission to report to a Republican Congress what they have done about this great matter, the handling of $11,000,000,000—ten times as much as this Government owed when the war began, and almost one-half as much as our entire indebtedness to-day? And why not? They can refund these obligations. Do gentlemen know that the chancellor of the exchequer in England to-day has in the budget in Parliament a provision taking care of the interest that Great Britain owes us?

There is no doubt that this commission could refund these obligations within six or eight months and bring the matter back to a Republican Congress which has more than two to one in the House and two to one in the Senate, so that we may find out something about the details and the facts. I was interested in the question the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. COOPER] asked of either the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. FORDNEY] or the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. LONGWORTH]. He asked about the $84,000,000 that Ambassador Bakhmeteff had gotten. Not a Member of this House knows, not a Member of the Senate knows, and we will never know anything about it unless we compel this commission to submit this whole business in detail to the Congress of the United States to be ratified by the Congress.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas and Mr. TREADWAY rose.

The CHAIRMAN. To whom does the gentleman yield?

Mr. OLDFIELD. I yield to the gentleman from Kansas.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Mr. Chairman, were any detailed reports made to Congress at the time these loans were made to the several Governments, including the loan made to the Russian Government, through its agent Bakhmeteff?

Mr. OLDFIELD. I do not recall.

Mr. TREADWAY. That is the question that I want to ask.

Mr. OLDFIELD. I do not recall whether the Secretary did or not, but I will vote for a resolution now asking that we have that information.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. But it is rather late in the day, is it not, to ask for that?

Mr. OLDFIELD. Also, so far as that is concerned, I shall charge up the fault, if fault be found, to our Secretary and not to yours, because it was done under a Democratic Secretary of the Treasury. They can refund these foreign loans under the present law.

The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. LONGWORTH] has placed in the RECORD the two Liberty loan acts, one of April 24, 1917, and the other September 24, 1917, and the difference between this bill and the law is that we placed more restrictions around the law in time of war, when the world was on fire, when the greatest war in history was in progress, than you do in this bill, and I do not think that is fair to the American people and I do not think the American people will approve of it.

Mr. TREADWAY. Were those restrictions lived up to by the Secretary of the Treasury when he loaned the money?

Mr. OLDFIELD. Surely; and I am very glad that the gentleman has asked me that question. They were lived up to, and I want to correct a misapprehension right here. When Secretary Glass came before the Ways and Means Committee there was no question about the principal of these loans. Nobody questions that. The foreign Governments did not question that, but here was the trouble. The representatives of the foreign Governments with Mr. Rathbone in London and in Paris got it into their heads that the American Government wanted to charge those foreign Governments compound interest, and they did not want to pay compound interest; they said that they could not get their parliaments to agree to pay compound interest, and that is the way it looks to us, so that Secretary Glass said that they had authority so far as the principal of these obligations were concerned, but had not so far as the interest was concerned, to fix it and collect it in the way that the foreign Governments wanted to pay the interest.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Is not the interest rate stated in the certificates or in the memoranda made at the time of making the obligations?

Mr. OLDFIELD. Yes; the interest rates heretofore agreed upon.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. And as was stated in such obligations as we hold?

Mr. OLDFIELD. I think that is true.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. What is the rate of interest?

Mr. OLDFIELD. It runs all the way from 5 to 6 per cent.

Mr. FORDNEY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. OLDFIELD. Yes.

Mr. FORDNEY. I think the gentleman will find that this information is correct, that those loans were made to Russia after the armistice was signed, and that that came about in this way: A commitment was made to the old Russian Government. That money was to be spent in this country for the purchase of supplies, and contracts by the Russian Government were placed in this country for railway supplies largely, but the people taking the contract refused to go on with it until the Russian Government would agree that when the goods were delivered the money committed to the Russian Government should be turned over to the contractor here. Those payments were made after the armistice. That is why the loans show to be after the armistice.

Mr. OLDFIELD. I do not dispute the statement of the gentleman. He knows more about that proposition than I. We see in both Liberty loan acts of April 24, 1917, and September 24, 1917, a certain fixed rate of interest. In this bill nothing of the kind is done. The bill provides:

> In such form and of such terms, conditions, date or dates of maturity and rate or rates of interest, and with such security, if any, as shall be deemed for the best interests of the United States of America, and to adjust and settle any and all claims, not now represented by bonds or obligations, which the United States of America now has or hereafter may have against any foreign Government and to accept securities therefor.

You can not easily make it broader than that. The only limitation that we put in this bill is the one prohibiting the commission from exchanging the bonds of one foreign Government for the bonds of another foreign Government. I think that is wise, and I urged that that be placed in the bill. I also urged that we should fix a rate or rates of interest. In the public press yesterday there was a dispatch from Italy complaining because the United States was not going to forgive the debts of Italy. I do not know whether it was authentic or not, but I do know that these men who get around the table will use every sort of cajolery, every sort of intrigue to try to get the rate of this interest reduced, and the commission has the authority here to reduce the rate of interest if they want to do that.

The Secretary of the Treasury and also Mr. Wadsworth testified that rates of interest had been agreed on in the memoranda, but there is no reason on earth why those gentlemen can not change their minds if they want to, and they will change their minds if they think they can get away with it, and we ought to have them come back to this Republican Congress and let the Congress of the United States take the responsibility.

Ah, gentlemen, we can not shift this responsibility. If we pass this bill as it is written and a scandal grows out of it, the Congress will be blamed by the American people for not placing proper safeguards around this legislation. This commission is not responsible to the people and does not have to be elected by the people. If anything goes wrong on account of the acts of the commission, the Congress will suffer and not the commission. Hence, why not have the commission report to Congress and let Congress assume its proper responsibility.

We ought not to abrogate our constitutional functions, gentlemen, and put all this power in the hands of a commission appointed by President Harding or by anybody else, if you please.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. OLDFIELD. I will.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. I asked that same question a while ago whether this commission could reduce the rates of interest. In inquiry about that privately of a member of the committee my attention was called to the last two lines in section 3 prohibiting the cancellation of any part of such indebtedness except through payment, and it was stated to me then with some force, and I would like to have the gentleman's view about it, that the prohibition of the cancellation of any part of the indebtedness must necessarily mean that all, both principal and interest, must be paid. Now, what does the gentleman think about that?

Mr. OLDFIELD. I think this about it: I think it is subject to two constructions, and I think the gentleman will agree with me, but it ought to be plain and it ought to be definite.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. It ought to be without ambiguity.

Mr. OLDFIELD. It ought to be clear and definite, gentlemen. There ought not to be any doubt about these things.

Mr. FORDNEY. My dear friend, when the interest becomes due upon the principal they are both principal.

Mr. OLDFIELD. Of course.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. But the subject of cancellation, however, certainly could not apply to future interest upon the obligation——

Mr. OLDFIELD. It would be very easy to place in this bill a limitation, and there would be no doubt. There is doubt here in the mind of the gentleman from Illinois, there is doubt in the mind of the gentleman from Tennessee, and I think while we are at these things it ought to be written right so that there can not be any doubt about it. If you do not, gentlemen, you are liable to have the greatest scandal known to the history of this Republic; you are liable, and you know it, to have——

Mr. ROACH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. OLDFIELD. I will.

Mr. ROACH. In reference to the interest due from foreign countries, I will ask the gentleman what is understood by lines 16 and 17, page 2, "and to adjust and settle any and all claims, not now represented by bonds or obligations, which the United States of America now has or may hereafter have against any foreign Government and to accept securities therefor." This accumulated interest is not represented by bonds or obligations, either one. Would it not be possible for the commission under that broad and sweeping authority entirely to cancel the accumulated interest amounting to over $900,000,000?

Mr. OLDFIELD. I think there is room for that contention, and there ought not to be room for any such construction.

Mr. TREADWAY. There can be no question that the accumulated interest is an obligation. I think the gentleman is entirely in error.

Mr. ROACH. Represented by bonds.

Mr. OLDFIELD. I can not yield further at this time. Now, let me say to the gentleman who just interrupted me that I do not know what that means and he does not know, and there is not a man on the floor of this House who does know. Now it says, "Shall be deemed for the best interest of the United States of America, and to adjust and settle any and all obligations." What kind of obligations? "Not now represented by bonds or obligations." That is pretty broad power. "Which the United States of America now has or hereafter may have"—not even growing out of the war—"against any foreign Government and to accept securities therefor." What kind of securities? Gentlemen, I say to you now you are liable to do a very dangerous thing here to-day if you pass this legislation in this form. Do you know what might happen? The great international bankers of America have been buying up reconstruction bonds since the day after the armistice. They have been buying all sorts and character of industrial bonds, railroad bonds, and municipal bonds in France, in England, and elsewhere; railroad stocks and railroad securities of various kinds throughout Europe have been bought up. Now, gentlemen, under this provision there will be no trouble in the world, and the international bankers have a great deal of influence in America. The international bankers of America have also branch banks in every country of Europe. The time may come under that provision—and if it does come you will be sorry, everybody will be sorry—the time may come that the international bankers will be getting good bonds, British bonds, in the place of municipal bonds, by arrangement of this commission, and the United States Government get the industrial bonds—and if you pass this bill we will be helpless in the future to remedy the matter. And I take it to-day that there is no industrial bond in Great Britain as good as the British Government bond, because I think they are as good as gold, the same as this country. But the railroad bonds, municipal bonds, and various industrial bonds are not as good security as United States bonds. We all prefer United States bonds to these industrial bonds in this country at this time.

If I had money to invest, I would certainly invest it in United States Government bonds rather than in industrial bonds, even in our own country, and yet, gentlemen, under that provision it is possible for this commission to permit the international bankers who have bought all of these bonds for a song to trade these bonds and get the bonds of Great Britain, of Italy, and of France, and all those bonds are good, and the United States get the industrial bonds. Those are the three Governments who owe us between seven and eight billion dollars of the debt.

Mr. McFADDEN. Is the gentleman fearful this commission will take the German reparation bonds?

Mr. OLDFIELD. I do not know whether they will or not; but I will say the German reparation bonds in my opinion would be much better than a great many of the industrial bonds of Europe, if you please, now owned by the international bankers.

Mr. McFADDEN. Has the gentleman seen the letter——

Mr. OLDFIELD. I do not care anything about any letter now.

Mr. McFADDEN. This is pertinent to the subject. I wish to call the gentleman's attention to the agreement signed by the late President Wilson with Clemenceau and Lloyd-George.

Mr. OLDFIELD. I was going to keep this thing out of politics if I could, but when you gentlemen speak of Woodrow Wilson half of you go crazy. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. McFADDEN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. OLDFIELD. If the gentleman will hurry up.

Mr. McFADDEN. I will hurry. On June 16, 1919, this document was signed and reported from the Senate February 22, 1921, showing an agreement between the President of the United States and Lloyd-George and Clemenceau, to reimburse Belgium and take German reparation bonds. Does the gentleman think this commission will have to deal with that?

Mr. OLDFIELD. I do not know whether they will or not. What happened to that? That proposition of President Wilson to Clemenceau and Lloyd-George came to the Congress of the United States, and that is what I want done in this matter. I want it to come back to the Congress of the United States and let the Congress know all the facts about these settlements and adjustments, and permit the Congress, the direct representatives of the people of America, to say whether they acted squarely with the people. And I think the gentleman will agree with me on that proposition. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. McFADDEN. Is the gentleman in favor of accepting those German reparation bonds to reimburse ourselves?

Mr. OLDFIELD. Of course I am not going to be on the commission, but I would look into the matter very carefully before I would accept those bonds. But I would say that unless publicity is turned upon them by the House and the Senate, the commission may take much of worthless bonds.

Mr. TREADWAY. Is there any time when a resolution of inquiry can not be introduced if there is any trouble about securing information?

Mr. OLDFIELD. If you can pass it; yes. How can a hundred Members over there force 300 Members over here to pass a resolution to investigate your Secretary of the Treasury.

Mr. TREADWAY. It is not a resolution to investigate the Secretary of the Treasury, but it is a resolution of information.

Mr. OLDFIELD. If not incompatible with the public interest. And seeing these gentlemen come before our committee and making the statements they do, I am very much afraid it will be incompatible with the public interest to give the information. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

If you pass this piece of legislation you are going to open up an avenue here for a commission to do just as it pleases with about $11,000,000,000 of the people's money, hard-earned tax money, if you please, money of the people of this country, collected in time of war and in stress of the greatest war in the world's history. And now in times of peace you want to give a commission appointed by the President authority to settle and adjust and remove all the limitations of the Liberty loan acts. I say, gentlemen, when we do it we are going to abdicate our functions as direct representatives of the people of America, and we ought not to do it. And I trust, gentlemen, that you will not do it.

I thank the committee. [Applause.]

Mr. FESS. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. OLDFIELD. Yes; I yield.

Mr. FESS. The gentleman has fear that unless a set rate is fixed there might be taken an advantage?

Mr. OLDFIELD. They might do it. Does not the gentleman think so?

Mr. FESS. In the Liberty loans we only made a maximum rate, not to exceed a certain rate. Was your suggestion that there should be a minimum rate below which the bonds could not go?

Mr. OLDFIELD. The Liberty loan act says that we shall not charge less than the money of the various kinds that we borrowed cost us, but they could charge more.

Mr. FESS. But the rate of interest is fixed at a rate not to exceed a certain amount.

Mr. OLDFIELD. The rate of interest shall not be smaller than a certain amount.

Mr. FESS. Oh, no. Our point was that since the Government is paying the rate we are not going to fix the minimum but fix the maximum.

Mr. OLDFIELD. But the act says:

> But the rates of interest borne by any such obligations shall not be less than the rate borne by the short-time obligations so converted into long-time obligations.

Mr. FESS. That is economical, but what I am trying to get at is, your fear, as I understood, was that we might take these foreign bonds at too low a rate?

Mr. OLDFIELD. We might get a lot of worthless securities palmed off on us by the international bankers, too.

Mr. FORDNEY. They will be Republican Members on the commission.

Mr. OLDFIELD. I had hoped the gentleman would not say that. If there ever was an administration in this country controlled by international bankers and big business generally, undoubtedly the present one is. [Applause on Democratic side.]

Mr. FESS. I am sorry this has degenerated into that.

Mr. OLDFIELD. I am sorry myself.

My fear is on two grounds. The first is, they have too much authority. I think that the United States of America should be paid every dollar in principal that we have loaned to these foreign Governments. I think also that these foreign Governments should return us in interest every dollar they owe us of interest, and not a single dollar more or less. I do not want this Government to practice usury. I do not want the Government to practice usury on any of those Governments, but they should pay us just what they owe and that is all. You can have them do it under this bill, and there is an opportunity to do something else.

Mr. FESS. It would strike me, I will say to the gentleman from Arkansas, it would be a better business proposition for our Government to leave the rate of interest and the conditions under which it is to be paid to the Treasury Department.

Mr. OLDFIELD. I am not concerned about the conditions as to the length of the bonds, because I realize that it will be 50 or 100 years before they are paid in full.

Mr. FORDNEY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. OLDFIELD. Yes.

Mr. FORDNEY. Here is a point that the gentleman overlooks. This interest deferred will amount to $4,120,000,000, and if we do not exact from these foreign Governments a rate equal to that paid on our bonds, what will become of that difference? There might be some leeway there.

Mr. OLDFIELD. That is what Secretary Glass was referring to. You might cover it by saying that the principal, which is fixed, should stand. There is no doubt about the interest on these long-time bonds; that interest is already fixed. Now, you may take the interest proposition and the Grain Corporation proposition and this American administration matter and lump those together, and they would make $1,750,000,000.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Arkansas has expired.

Mr. COLLIER. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman two minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Arkansas is recognized for two minutes more.

Mr. OLDFIELD. In this bill you might arrange it so that you could give more latitude in regard to the interest on these other things, but there is no reason on earth why they should have authority to fix rates of interest that have already been fixed by previous acts of Congress; none in the world.

Mr. HUDSPETH. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. OLDFIELD. Yes.

Mr. HUDSPETH. If there is no power provided in this bill to supervise the acts of this commission——

Mr. OLDFIELD. None at all——

Mr. HUDSPETH. Suppose they should forgive a part of the debt? They can make any kind of a settlement?

Mr. OLDFIELD. Yes. They can take any securities they please. They can take railroad securities, railroad bonds of foreign countries. I have thought about this matter a good deal. What we should have done was to have given to the Secretary of the Treasury himself blanket power to do just what he pleases in this business and to report to Congress and let Congress determine whether it is reasonable and just.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Merely for report or for ratification?

Mr. OLDFIELD. For ratification. Let Congress pass upon it. Ratify or reject the agreements on settlements.

Mr. PARKS of Arkansas. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. OLDFIELD. Yes.

Mr. PARKS of Arkansas. Has your committee any information that this Government under this administration has carried on any negotiations with foreign nations for the payment of either principal or interest?

Mr. OLDFIELD. I do not know of anything that they have done. Of course they have come before us and said they did not have authority so far as interest is concerned, and some gentlemen have claimed that they did not have authority as to principal. However, I have not heard that suggestion made, except upon this floor.

Mr. FORDNEY. Negotiations have been going on all the time, but no settlement has been made.

Mr. OLDFIELD. I hope gentlemen will vote so that the Congress of the United States can ratify this proposition. We talk here for hours and for days sometimes on an appropriation of $1,000 or $2,000, yet here is $11,000,000,000 to be turned over to a commission, and the clerks and secretaries will attend to it in the end. Mr. Mellon and Mr. Hughes can not do it. They are already overburdened. They will turn it over to clerks, and the Congress can never know anything of the details and facts. [Applause.]

Mr. Chairman, I desire to extend my remarks in the RECORD by printing an editorial recently appearing in the New York Times. While the editorial has nothing to do with this bill yet the editorial interested me and may be of interest to other Members:

[From the New York Times, Sept. 20.]

CHINA AT THE CONFERENCE.

Without recapitulating the unhappy history of the Chinese Republic since the revolution of 1911, it is enough to say that there are now two Governments—Northern China, with its capital at Peking, which has been recognized by the powers; and the Southern Government, with its capital at Canton, of which Sun Yat-sen, the first president of the Republic, is the head. Dr. Sun was elected president by the southern parliament and was inaugurated president of all China on May 5. The Northern Government is largely the puppet of the military oligarchists. Rightly or wrongly, it is charged with being under the influence of Japan.

It may plead duress for its consent to the notorious 21 demands and the corruption attributed to it may be exaggerated, but its representatives at the Washington conference are not authorized to speak for China. The de facto government in the South controls six of the most populous and wealthy Provinces. Other Provinces, paying little or no allegiance to the northern government, have representatives in the southern. One or two Provinces are or were neutral. It appears to be the fact that the southern de facto Republic represents a population of some 200,000,000, half the population of China. The southern government is maintaining order. It recognizes China's obligation to foreign powers. In June President Sun asked Mr. Harding for immediate recognition of his Government. It is the one representative constitutional Government in China.

Washington is fully aware of the importance of having a united China, so far as that is possible, represented at the conference, of such vast concern to the interests and integrity of that sorely tried country. Our Government has suggested that it would be pleased if the Peking Government, "as the only authority in China which is recognized by the powers which will participate in the Washington conference, would include in its delegation representatives of the south China government." Mr. Ma Soo, who represents the Canton Government in New York, says of that:

"The facts are that Peking is under Japanese influence, that Peking signed the 21 demands, that Peking has borrowed millions from Japan, that Peking and its delegation will be dominated by Japanese intrigue. * * * The Canton Government can not join with Peking."

In short, if Washington wants all China represented at the conference it must invite the Canton Government to send delegates. There are two governments in China. Dr. Sun's Government is not only de facto, but it appears to have a much better title to be called a de jure government than the creature of the war lords in the north. It should be represented at the conference.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Arkansas has again expired.

Mr. FORDNEY. Mr. Chairman, I yield 15 minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. MAGEE].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York is recognized for 15 minutes.

Mr. MAGEE. Mr. Chairman, at the outset I ask leave to extend and revise my remarks.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the gentleman's request?

There was no objection.

Mr. MAGEE. Mr. Chairman, I trust that the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds will report to the House early in the next session of the Congress a public building bill. The dates of public building bills heretofore approved and authorizations made are as follows:

First, June 6, 1902	$19,258,900
Second, Mar. 3, 1903	6,800,500
Third, June 30, 1906	26,600,500
Fourth, May 30, 1908	32,200,500
Fifth, June 25, 1910	35,137,700
The last, Mar. 4, 1913	41,580,850

The purposes for which these authorizations were made and the respective amounts authorized therefor are as follows:

	June 6, 1902.	Mar. 3, 1903.	June 30, 1906.	May 30, 1908.	June 25, 1910.	Mar. 4, 1913
Increase in limits of cost	$6,084,900	$4,025,500	$2,966,000	$3,873,500	$3,490,000	$3,861,800
Enlargements and extensions		306,000	3,850,000	2,723,500	2,103,200	3,348,050
Buildings on land owned by the Government	1,436,000	1,340,000	6,433,000	9,565,000	14,750,000	15,223,500
Sites and buildings	8,942,000		9,724,000	9,570,000	10,637,080	13,873,000
Sites only	840,000	474,000	3,612,500	6,423,500	3,952,500	1,596,500
Miscellaneous	1,956,000	655,000	15,000	45,000	205,000	3,678,000

I am informed by the Treasury Department that the amount to be paid for the rental of space in cities where Federal buildings are located as reported by the executive departments during the months of May and June, 1921, for fiscal year 1922 is as follows:

Department of Agriculture	$311,387.37
Department of Commerce	62,048.49
Department of the Interior	72,576.68
Department of Justice	74,744.48
Department of Labor	54,859.46
Navy Department	295,085.08
Post Office Department	1,663,076.00
Department of State	3,500.00
Treasury Department	1,990,149.89
War Department	43,948.24
Total	4,571,375.69

The above amount of $1,663,076 for the Post Office Department represents only the amount paid for space rented to relieve congestion in Federal buildings and does not include the amount paid for the various substations.

During the fiscal year ended June 30, 1921, there were expended for repairs, maintenance, and so forth, the following amounts from appropriations made for—

Repairs and preservation	$917,293.68
Mechanical equipment	706,062.21
Vaults and safes	125,516.56
Operating supplies	2,729,554.26
General expenses	397,024.55
Furniture and repairs	777,992.92
Operating force	3,560,505.97
Total	9,213,950.15

There are many cities and places in this country where it is imperative that additional postal facilities be promptly provided to meet reasonable public demands. A typical illustration can be found in my home city of Syracuse, N. Y. In reference thereto the Secretary of the Treasury in November, 1919, sent to the chairman of the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds the following communication:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT,
Washington, November 14, 1919.

The CHAIRMAN COMMITTEE ON PUBLIC BUILDINGS AND GROUNDS,
House of Representatives.

SIR: Reference is made to your request of June 9 for a report in connection with bill H. R. 3160, which proposes to amend the existing legislation providing for the erection of a post-office building at Syracuse, N. Y., by increasing the limit of cost to $1,000,000, to authorize the accommodation of United States court and other Government officials in the building, and to authorize the sale of the present post-office building and site for not less than $300,000.

In accordance with the legislation contained in the acts of June 30, 1908, May 30, 1908, and June 25, 1910, a site for a new building at Syracuse, N. Y., has been acquired. The act of March 4, 1913, authorized the construction of a post-office building at a limit of cost of $550,000. On July 14, 1916, letters were addressed to the chairmen of the Committees on Public Buildings and Grounds of the House of Representatives and Senate, jointly, signed by the Secretary of the Treasury, Postmaster General, and Attorney General, calling attention to the fact that under the existing legislation no other than post-office accommodations could be provided in the new building and, after setting forth the need for providing court facilities in the building, recommended that the legislation be amended so as to allow for the same. The attention of Congress was again called to the matter in a letter to the Speaker, of February 24, 1917. (H. Doc. No. 2090, 64th Cong.)

In the opinion of this department the need for the additional legislation providing for accommodation for court officials in the present building as well as for more adequate accommodations for the post office than exist at present is urgent. In reference to the latter need, your attention is respectfully invited to the letter of the Postmaster General to your committee, of October 18, 1918, in which it is shown that at that time only 49 square feet of space was available for each postal employee.

It is estimated that as a result of the present condition of the labor and material market the erection of a two-story building having 48,000 square feet ground area, required to accommodate the postal, court, and other Government officials, will cost $1,800,000.

There appears to be no reason why the present Federal building should not be disposed of for not less than $300,000, as provided for in the pending legislation.

Respectfully, CARTER GLASS, Secretary.

The first step toward meeting the needs of Syracuse was taken in June, 1906. Outside of the acquisition of a site, the razing of the buildings thereon, which has resulted in practically no annual revenue therefrom, and the authorized appropriation of $550,000 under the act of March 4, 1913, all that is apparent to the eye is a hole in the ground covering a whole block in the heart of the city, inclosed by an unsightly board fence. I do not refer to this as a matter of complaint, but rather as showing how extreme has been the public patience. The Post Office Department, the Treasury Department, and the Department of Justice, heartily cooperating together in the public interest and recommending that the Congress take appropriate action in this case, have been wholly unable to date to get any results from the Congress.

I am informed that there are many other cases where existing conditions are just as exasperating. In this connection we must bear in mind the tremendous increase in the parcel-post business, which has been growing and will continue to grow by leaps and bounds. The parcel post meets a great public need, and I respectfully submit that we should make proper and reasonable provision for this branch of the Postal Service.

When we consider the millions and millions of dollars appropriated for rivers and harbors, for public roads, and for many other public improvements, it does seem to me that imperative appropriations for public buildings ought to receive some attention from the Congress in a period of eight years. I appreciate the high cost of construction, but we all know that this cost has reached its peak and is constantly tending downward. The Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds in authorizing appropriations for public buildings can reasonably anticipate this downward tendency. The important thing now is to show that we are really alive and propose to take prompt and reasonable action to meet pressing public needs as to our postal facilities. The construction of needed Federal buildings, which will give additional employment to labor, provide sanitary and healthful working conditions for postal employees, and meet the needs of the Post Office Department in its purpose to attain the highest degree of efficiency, I feel, will meet public approval. [Applause.]

Mr. Chairman, I thank the committee for its courtesy. I yield back the balance of my time.

Mr. COLLIER. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. JOHNSON] five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Mississippi is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. JOHNSON of Mississippi. Mr. Chairman, I shall vote against this bill unless it is amended so as to safeguard the interests of the people of this Nation.

On the 21st day of last June a bill was introduced in the Senate by Senator PENROSE asking that full authority be given to the Secretary of the Treasury to refund or convert and to extend the time of payment of the principal or interest, or both, of any obligation of any foreign Government now owing to the United States of America, or any obligation of any foreign Government hereafter received by the United States of America, including obligations held by the United States Grain Corporation, arising out of the European war, into bonds or other such obligations of such or any other foreign Government, and from time to time to receive bonds and obligations of any foreign Government in substitution for those now or hereafter held by the United States of America, in such form and of such terms, conditions, date or dates of maturity, and rate or rates of interest, and with such security, if any, as shall be deemed for the best interests of of the people of the United States of America, and to adjust and settle any and all claims, not now represented by bonds or obligations, which the United States of America now has or hereafter may have against any foreign Government, and to accept securities therefor.

Not since the Government of the United States of America was established have such powers been requested or granted to any Government official, except in time of war. On the 22d day of June last, the next day after the bill was introduced in the Senate, President Harding, in a letter addressed to Senator PENROSE, chairman of the Committee on Finance, advocated the passage of the bill, but the people of the country protested so vigorously against the giving of this unusual and extraordinary power to one man that the Congress was as quick to drop the proposition as the "nigger dropped the incense pot."

Now we are confronted with the former bill camouflaged. It is proposed by the bill before the House to create a commission to be known as the World War foreign debt commission, consisting of five members, one of whom shall be the Secretary of the Treasury, who shall serve as chairman, and four of whom shall be appointed by the President, which appointment, when other than Cabinet officers, shall be made with the advice and consent of the Senate. The same powers are given to the commission as were proposed in the Penrose bill which I have just referred to. Nowhere in the bill is it proposed to pay to the commission anything for its services, thereby leaving the impression to every reasonable mind that the President is expected to appoint members of the Cabinet as members of this commission.

If the Secretary of the Treasury can induce two other members of the commission to agree with him, the three men will be empowered to settle a debt owing to the United States of America amounting to $11,084,802,341.67. Of this amount, $9,435,000,000 is for money raised under the various Liberty bond acts. We all remember the means employed throughout the Nation to induce the people to purchase the Liberty bonds. No greater sacrifice was ever made by a people than the people of the United States in supporting the President in his efforts to win the war. No people more quickly responded to every call to duty than did our people in this great struggle. I know people in my State who had to borrow money and pay 6 or 8 per cent on the money with which to purchase Liberty bonds. From their meager earnings they finally paid for their bonds. and those who have been able to hold them are now unable to sell them at par. It was the money raised in this way, amounting to nearly $10,000,000,000, loaned to the foreign countries, creating the debt now due us, the settlement of which you propose shall be made by this commission.

You are about to establish a precedent repugnant to the Constitution of the United States. The Supreme Court of this country has on more than one occasion held that Congress can not delegate to another department nor to an individual nor commission the power generally or specially, to enact laws. This power is reserved alone to the legislative branch of the Government. By the bill now being considered by this House it is proposed to delegate to the commission power to change the rate of interest of the European debts, and this is violative of the Constitution of the United States.

You propose by this bill to give to the Secretary of the Treasury and two other men full power to say what shall be for the best interests of 110,000,000 people of the United States. If the commission sees fit to take worthless securities or reduce the rate of interest, or to refund the debt in a way that would not be for the best interests of the people of the country, their error or mistake could not be corrected. Why not authorize them to adjust the matter subject to the approval of the Congress of the United States?

Under Liberty loan acts the Secretary is authorized and is legally required to fund the demand obligations of these foreign Governments into bonds which will bear the same rate of interest and other terms of the Liberty bonds which our own hold. If these extraordinary powers now asked by the Secretary or the proposed commission be granted, certainly it will work to the detriment of the taxpayers of this Nation. The people are now bent by the weight of taxation. The great burden upon them is all that they can bear. Most of us know that the great banking interests of New York own millions of foreign bonds. They have advanced many millions to the European nations. We know that to give these extraordinary powers to the Secretary of the Treasury or commission, if he or it should refund the debts due the United States at a lower rate of interest than now due, or should extend the time of payment to a longer period than that which the Congress of the United States would be willing to accept, it would work a great benefit to the great banking interests of New York and would be to the detriment of the ordinary taxpayer of America. We must be careful in turning over to two or three men the powers to settle more than $11,000,000,000 indebtedness to the United States.

It has been charged on the floor of the House to-day that Secretary McAdoo violated the law in administering the Liberty loan act. That I deny, but if it be true, that was at a time when nearly all the world was at war. It was a time for quick action. Such is not the case to-day. We are at peace. We can think and reason coolly, calmly, and deliberately, and if a mistake was made in giving extraordinary powers during the war it is more the reason why we should safeguard the interests of the people now.

There is due the United States for interest on the European debt $943,534,755.99, which, added to the total obligations, amounting to $10,141,267,585.68, makes the sum total of $11,084,802,341.67.

Gentlemen of the House, are you willing to turn this matter over to the Secretary of the Treasury and two other men without any restrictions and authorize them to settle the debt or refund it, according to their notions? If you are, you are making a mistake which you will live to regret.

This ought not to be a party question. We ought to consider this together, Republicans and Democrats alike, for the good of the whole people of the United States, as was done when the Liberty bond acts were passed. We ought to adopt an amendment that will safeguard the interests of those who will be required to pay the enormous taxes with which to redeem these Liberty bonds.

Mr. FOCHT. In case an amendment is incorporated in the bill, will you vote for the bill?

Mr. JOHNSON of Mississippi. I reserve the right to vote as I believe to be to the best interests of the country when the matter comes up for a vote.

Mr. FOCHT. You are speaking of an amendment of your leader. That is the one I am asking you about.

Mr. JOHNSON of Mississippi. If our leader over here says it is all right I will vouch for it. If the proposed commission wishes, it can fix the rate of interest at 1 per cent, 2 per cent, 3 per cent, or no per cent, just as it sees fit, according to this bill. There is no need for hurry in this matter. Too much is involved to act hastily. There are other matters of great moment to the people of this Nation.

Why not take up the freight-rate question? This Congress has full authority to reduce the freight rates, and it can be done within a few hours. If this Congress is disposed, it can revive business in the United States within two weeks by granting the necessary reduction in freight rates. There is a stagnation of business throughout the country due to the unreasonable rates. When the railroads asked a few months ago to be allowed to reduce wages they led the people to believe that they were going to reduce the rates and give the people the benefits of the reduction in wages, but we need not expect anything voluntarily from the railroads. They are not going to do anything until they are made to do it.

Gentlemen, we ought to oppose this refunding bill in its present shape and adopt amendments that will protect the interests of the people of the country. [Applause.]

Mr. COLLIER. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. STEVENSON].

Mr. STEVENSON. Mr. Chairman, referring to the unlimited power of the proposed commission without reference back to Congress, I desire to call the attention of the gentleman to the fact that while this measure may not be what is technically known as a treaty, nevertheless it is settling a matter between nations in such a way as to be practically a treaty between those nations. It is settling a matter which will affect directly the revenue of the United States Government for the next 20 to 40 years, and it has been the policy of this Government and of the House of Representatives, always maintained, that whenever an agreement between this Nation and other nations is negotiated by the Executive under any authority which affects the revenue of this country it must come back to the Congress of the United States for approval. That was settled very thoroughly in the Hawaiian proposition, when authority was given to the President to make a certain proclamation on finding a certain state of facts and thereby to admit certain products from Hawaii at a reduced rate of tariff. It was done also in the arrangements made between this country and Cuba. It has been done on various occasions. It is an established precedent in this House that whenever any executive authority is to be clothed with the power to negotiate an agreement with another nation which affects the revenue of this Nation it is never allowed to become effective until it has been submitted to Congress and Congress itself has approved it, and for a very good reason. It is practically an infringement of the right to say what shall be the revenue-producing power of the Government.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STEVENSON. I yield to the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Why should not that apply equally to the bonds issued under the Liberty loan act?

Mr. STEVENSON. The bonds issued under the Liberty loan act, as has already been stated, were issued under an emergency. The gentleman need not smile on that ground. The rate of interest was fixed. The terms of the contract were set forth by Congress, and they had to bear that rate of interest, and therefore they were not allowed to make an open contract. That is the answer to the gentleman's proposition about the Liberty bond act.

Mr. LONGWORTH. As a matter of fact, none of them do bear a fixed rate of interest.

Mr. STEVENSON. As a matter of fact, the agreement entered into has always been understood to be subject to the terms of that act. And now, while I am on it, I want to direct the attention of the distinguished gentleman from Ohio to his position about the Liberty bond act, which he stated just a while ago. The gentleman said that the obligations of the securities taken from the foreign Governments by Mr. McAdoo should have borne all of the essentials of the bonds issued by the United States Government. In bearing out that position he read from the Liberty loan act of April 24, 1917, which says:

> Bearing the same rate of interest and containing in their essentials the same terms and conditions as those of the United States issued under authority of this act.

Congress, according to that, fixed the contract that could be made. But the gentleman contends that the obligations taken were not in conformity with that agreement. Between the gentleman from Ohio and the gentleman from Tennessee there is an issue, to which they themselves will direct their attention. I will not enter into it. But the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. LONGWORTH] overlooked reading from the act of September 24, 1917, under which the principal part of these advances was made, and he criticized Secretary McAdoo for not living up to the law, and read to you the wrong law. I will read what it says:

The Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized to purchase at par from such foreign Governments, respectively, their several obligations hereafter issued, bearing such rate or rates of interest, maturing at such date or dates, not later than the bonds of the United States then last issued under the authority of this act, or of such act approved April 24, 1917, and containing such terms and conditions as the Secretary of the Treasury may from time to time determine.

The gentleman failed to read that. That is the act under which he criticizes Mr. McAdoo for taking obligations which he says do not contain the terms which the bonds contain for which the money was obtained.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Then, as I understand the gentleman, he admits that the $3,000,000,000 issued under the first Liberty loan act were not in conformity with the law?

Mr. STEVENSON. No; I do not. I say that is an issue between the gentleman from Ohio and the gentleman from Tennessee; but the $7,000,000,000 that were issued afterwards certainly were not embraced within it, and the gentleman made an argument to this House this morning criticizing the great Secretary McAdoo as having violated the law, which law he did not read to you and which law did not bear out his position at all.

Mr. FESS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STEVENSON. I beg the gentleman's pardon. I have not the time now. The gentleman from Ohio makes another proposition, that these obligations must bear in all respects the same provisions as the bonds which were issued on which we got the money. Well, then, I want to know why this provision was put in there:

Provided, That he shall have the right to convert any short-term obligations of foreign Governments which may have been first purchased under the authority of this act, or the act approved April 24, 1917, into long-time obligations.

Now, there was no contemplation of short-time obligations of the United States under either provision, and yet if he will read the very act under which he criticizes the Secretary of the Treasury he will find that it was expressly provided that he could take short-time obligations of foreign Governments and afterwards convert them into long-time obligations, which shows conclusively that the gentleman's position is entirely fallacious and void of anything on which he could stand.

Now, Mr. Chairman, so much for the politics that have been embraced in it. Now, I want to look at the bill for a minute. You will find if you will look at lines 16, 17, 18, and 19, page 2, that they have authority to adjust and settle any and all claims not now represented by bonds or obligations which the United States of America now has or hereafter may have against any foreign Government and to accept securities therefor.

I understood that this was for the purpose of refunding the war debt, the debts growing out of the war. If that is so, the last clause has brought this from now until eternity, and it simply shows how careless this act, dealing with the biggest sum of money any Congress has ever had to deal with, has been drawn.

Mr. TEMPLE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STEVENSON. Yes.

Mr. TEMPLE. The gentleman says "from now until eternity"; would not that be limited by section 4, which says that the authority granted by this act shall cease and determine at the end of three years from the date of the passage of this act?

Mr. STEVENSON. Very well, from now until three years from now any debt that arises between this Government and any other Government, regardless of whether it grows out of the war or not, is included.

Mr. TEMPLE. The gentleman reduces the time from eternity to three years. [Laughter.]

Mr. STEVENSON. Well, three years will be eternity for some of us, but not for others. [Laughter.] But all the same, you are providing ostensibly to take care of the war debts, and you are embracing all debts that may be created during the life of the commission.

Mr. LONDON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STEVENSON. Yes.

Mr. LONDON. Can they not in three years do enough mischief to last until eternity? [Laughter.]

Mr. STEVENSON. Yes; and before we get through with them, it may be an eternity. Now, the gentleman from Michigan this morning, in answer to a question from a Republican, said that this commission could not modify the rates of interest that they fixed by the Liberty bond act. My answer to that is there set forth. The gentleman fled from that position as he would from a Democratic caucus.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from South Carolina has expired.

Mr. STEVENSON. Will the gentleman give me three minutes more?

Mr. CRISP. Acting for the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. COLLIER], who is out just at this time, I want to state that all of the time has been promised.

Mr. STEVENSON. Mr. Chairman, I ask leave to revise and extend my remarks.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from South Carolina?

There was no objection.

Mr. FORDNEY. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. FREAR] 30 minutes.

Mr. FREAR. Mr. Chairman, the Constitution provides that certain duties are to be performed by Congress, and all Senators and Representatives are required to make oath or affirmation to support the Constitution before they are qualified to fill any office or public trust under the United States. Every public official, through the aid of his own conscience and judgment, must decide the meaning of his obligation well and faithfully to discharge the duties of his office. The Constitution does not suggest anywhere that either House shall be subservient to the other, nor is either House required to accept instructions direct or indirect from the other, nor does such authority extend to any committee of either House; nor does the Constitution provide that any departmental officer or officers, however exalted, shall direct or dictate legislation in either House.

Even if the fathers who drafted the Constitution had determined otherwise in such matters, we who represent constituencies throughout the country should not surrender prerogatives assumed by our predecessors in office nor should we permit either branch of the American Congress or any department of the Government to encroach upon the fundamental rights of Members to independent action. Advice, whether secret or open, may properly be offered and considered, but direction or attempted dictation from outside sources should be resented by every self-respecting Representative.

This observation is offered because of belief that Members have full right to untrammeled action in their individual judgment of legislative measures not limited by any other restriction than their oath of office. Party political action is conceded on every question that by convention, pronouncement, or popular vote has been determined by the people, but liberty of action by individual Representatives can not be restrained in matters of general legislation when party policies or party prestige are not involved.

The proposition was squarely presented in the bill prepared by the Treasury Department wherein exclusive authority was to be granted by Congress to the Secretary without limitation or restriction of any kind as to terms or time of settlement, adjustment, and refunding of obligations of foreign Governments now reaching over $11,000,000,000. Personal criticism can not be lodged against any official for properly urging such legislation nor for testifying before the Senate or House committees in its support, but any assumption that Congress is a mere rubber stamp ought to be repudiated by every Member of Congress. The practice has arisen, possibly because of recent legislative history during the war when little deliberation or consideration could be given important war measures, but it must not be forgotten that the power was carried to such extremes that an upheaval in the House turned a Democratic majority of 156 into a Republican majority of 169 within eight years and was largely caused by the American people repudiating the subserviency of Congress on the one hand and rejecting on the other an autocracy that sought its control. Over 7,000,000 majority was recorded in disapproval of the practice.

SUBSERVIENCY OF LEGISLATORS SET FORTH.

Mr. Chairman, let me be more specific and present evidence of announced subserviency of legislative judgment to which I will never subscribe. I quote from the Christian Science Monitor of October 11, 1921:

Favorable action on the administration bill authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury to negotiate with the allied and associated powers for the liquidation of the $11,000,000,000 debt owing to the United States is anticipated to-day by the House Ways and Means Committee. JOSEPH W. FORDNEY, the chairman, will endeavor to get his committeemen to vote on reporting the bill to the House at an executive session this morning.

Unless unforeseen obstacles arise the bill will be reported to the House containing practically all the provisions sought by A. W. Mellon, Secretary of the Treasury, which would clothe him with almost unlimited power to carry on negotiations with the debtor nations. Every effort will be made by the administration to jam it through both Houses before the conference on the limitation of armament, though it is conceded that the Senate will probably balk at the proposal.

This easy program has been upset and needed amendments adopted, but who gave out this additional information sent by a reputable reporter, who in the same article says:

With the possible exception of JAMES A. FREAR (R.), Representative from Wisconsin, who bolted his party in reporting the tariff and tax bills, the debt-refunding measure will meet with a strict party vote in the Ways and Means Committee. While Mr. FORDNEY is confident of the bill being passed in the House, there will be substantial opposition to some of its provisions, particularly with reference to the amount of power lodged with the Secretary of the Treasury. It is possible that President Harding will have to exert executive influence to force the measure through the Senate. The House, being amenable to the wishes of the administration, will pass it after a sharp but brief debate.

Opposing two vulnerable committee reports, helping in committee and out to improve bills, and then swallowing completed measures because preferable to permanent law—that is the extent of my offending.

Clippings from Boston to Kentucky, in which I am reported to be out of harmony with my party colleagues on the committee, are also at hand of the same date. Whoever gave out the statement, and its source is not hard to find, guessed wrong. The committee kicked over the traces and refused to follow wrong leadership or to become "amenable" when such action violated the judgment of members of the committee.

My Republican colleagues vigorously protested four years ago against a vicious practice of congressional subserviency, and they demanded in debate by what authority of law and under what provision of the Constitution the last administration presumed to pass upon the policy, form, and purpose of legislative measures even prior to their introduction and action by Congress. Answer to their protest occurred in the November verdict.

POLITICAL MISTAKES PREVENTED BY THE HOUSE.

Let me go further and protest against constant efforts to draw party lines in committee or in the House on measures of purely economic purpose as shown by the article quoted, which represents a too common standard. When the soldiers' compensation bill was last before our committee, party lines were drawn in committee on a proposal to enact a turnover sales tax to raise funds for that purpose, although party members were in disagreement over the enactment of any compensation bill.

The sales-tax proposal was taken to a Republican conference and, against strong "party" appeals, the action of the committee was overturned by that conference and the sales tax stricken out of the compensation bill. At the beginning of the present session an effort was made to secure a "party" line-up on a turnover-sales tax provision for the revenue bill. Vigorous protests finally prevented such action and the attempt was defeated, although supported by strong committee members. A chemical embargo in the tariff bill was next made a "party" measure, and "party" leaders in and out of the committee sought to direct the action of the House in the matter, but the proposal was defeated, although the Ways and Means Committee divided practically on "party" lines. This verdict rendered by the House carried its own lesson. On a proposal to repeal the excess-profits tax and higher surtaxes as of date January 1, 1921, the committee again divided practically on "party" lines on a matter involving $540,000,000 in taxes that would be due in 1922, yet were to be remitted according to the demand of so-called "party" leaders of the committee and of the House. This time a Republican conference again reversed the committee.

The refunding proposal of $11,000,000,000 in foreign loans started out to give power to one Cabinet officer greater than was ever before possessed by man in time of peace. Protests against immediate action or acceptance of the departmental bill were vigorously made before the recess and thereafter. I leave it for any intelligent Member of Congress to say whether the bill has been improved over the bill referred to in the Christian Science Monitor and other papers or the funding bill as reported to the Senate. The committee refused to follow the lead of those who advocated swallowing the department bill—hook, sinker, and pole.

A FEW WORDS ON "BOLTING."

Mr. Chairman, "bolting" party dictum is not political treason unless a pledge has been given to its support; and "regulars" who proudly follow bellwethers like the Light Brigade, "theirs not to reason why," have an object lesson before them.

The Senate will without doubt sustain the House action on a dye embargo and on date of any repeal of excess profits and surtaxes, and the Senate is likely to take the position I did when the action of the committee was overthrown. The same is true of the turnover-sales tax; and, last but not least, the Senate may accept the present House funding bill in preference to its own measure, because the Secretary of the Treasury has found the limitations unobjectionable, even though he deems them unnecessary. Judged by this standard, my party colleagues are out of harmony with the House and Senate and in no position to talk about bolting.

But, apart from the high crime and misdemeanor implied in "bolting" a committee's or chairman's dictum, no man will doubt that ninety-nine out of every hundred of the people we represent will approve the action taken on the monopolistic dye embargo and against the effort to shift $540,000,000 in taxes onto those least able to pay, under the attempted retroactive repeal of excess profits and surtaxes as of January, 1921. Even the turnover-sales tax action and the funding bill as limited will be approved by the same people, because they bought Liberty bonds to raise the fund that we loaned the Allies and they will ask for every reasonable restriction in order to insure its repayment to settle our own debts.

I hold the highest respect for my colleagues on the committee for their ability, fairness, and generous treatment, but I believe when it is understood the House is "amenable" to no man, and that it refuses to become a "rubber stamp" for any department of Government, then we will be better able to return to the duties prescribed by the Constitution.

In all of the cases mentioned where efforts at outside dictation have been repudiated and "party" control of economic provisions has been attempted, the good sense of the House has prevented political and economic blunders, and as one Member who frequently has found himself out of harmony with party colleagues on these measures, but has been regularly sustained by the House or by party conferences, I urge upon my colleagues that we cease dividing on "party" lines when the subject under consideration has no political significance. Any other course is to play into the hands of interests that often move behind the scenes and have selfish ends to serve. It is a dangerous policy to pursue, and in every one of the cases cited carried a political liability without any justification for such action. It even caused party leaders frequently to reverse their own positions in order to line up political forces in the House. Partisanship does not call for such spectacles.

Far be it from my purpose to criticize any individual Representative, but as one who believes every legislative decision should be the untrammeled expression of the individual Member, I protest efforts to control or influence practically every action even down to framing of bills in committee under the plea of "party" regularity. When bills are received from outside sources the right to modify or change their terms should not depend on the acquiescence of anyone, but should be left to the action of Representatives who are responsible to their constituents for intelligent and just decisions.

"CRACKING THE WHIP" OVER THE AMERICAN CONGRESS.

Frequent news clippings in local papers that the Executive or other officials are expecting to crack the whip over the Congress of the United States are generally inspired by special interests which stand sponsor for such threats directed to the Congress and the country. The fathers of the Constitution to whom we refer on this floor so frequently would rise in their graves if able to do so, protesting against such usurpation of authority that recently sounded the overwhelming defeat of an Executive who cracked the whip over a coordinate legislative body.

Personally I believe the strong good sense and respect of the present Executive for a branch of government of which he was formerly a Member will never permit him to ignore the rights of legislators to untrammeled decisions. I say frankly that my remarks are not directed in any way to him, but to those who constantly assume to act in his name.

Mr. Chairman, this marked tendency of subordinating Congress to a position of unimportance in the functioning of government has never been more glaringly disclosed than by the policy pursued in handling our foreign loans. Aside from the vast financial interests involved that indirectly affect every taxpayer of the country, a fundamental objection existed to the passage of H. R. 7359 which is disclosed by a brief statement of facts. Congress has been ignored, its confidence abused, and its authority flouted heretofore in the administration of laws permitting Treasury officials to extend loans to foreign Governments, while the growing practice among certain officials of ignoring specific legislation is admittedly nonpolitical and is permitted by the easy acquiescence of Congress itself. The bill described in the newspaper article and as urged upon the Ways and Means Committee for passage, substantially as reported by the Senate Finance Committee to the Senate, is as follows:

THE PROPOSED TREASURY DEPARTMENT BILL, NO. 7359.

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury, with the approval of the President, is hereby authorized from time to time to refund or concert, and to extend the time of payment of the principal or the interest, or both, or any obligation of any foreign Government now owing to the United States of America, or any obligation of any foreign Government hereafter received by the United States of America (including obligations held by the United States Grain Corporation) arising out of the European war, into bonds or other obligations of such, or of any other foreign Government, and from time to time to receive bonds and obligations of any foreign Government in substitution for those now or hereafter held by the United States of America, in such form and of such terms, conditions, date or dates of maturity, and rate or rates of interest, and with such security, if any shall be deemed for the best interests of the United States of America, and to adjust and settle any and all claims, not now represented by bonds or obligations, which the United States of America now has or hereafter may have against any foreign Government, and to accept securities therefor.

This foreign indebtedness ought to have been settled and funded long ago. It must be done without needless delay, and the Secretary of the Treasury is a proper party in such negotiations, but H. R. 7359 is a climax to demands made by officials for unrestrained authority. It contemplated unrestricted control of negotiations affecting $11,000,000,000, the largest financial transaction ever undertaken by any Government in the history of the world. Eleven billion dollars is now owing from nearly a score of foreign Governments, and notwithstanding specific law these debts are only evidenced by a few scraps of paper. This vast indebtedness was proposed to be adjusted and settled by one man; a man whose position in finance, however great, and whose integrity, however unquestioned, was unknown to the people of the country one year ago. Without direct responsibility to any constituency, accountable only to the Executive, whose approval of administrative and legislative acts is ordinarily perfunctory, the proposal insisted on the necessity for secret negotiations when conducting these settlements covering enormous amounts of money contributed by the American people "until it hurt," in order to win the war. Because of this tremendous power proposed to be placed in the hands of one man or one department, I offered several amendments in committee on October 10, the same day the country was advised by the press the Mellon bill would be passed as drawn by the Treasury Department:

AMENDMENTS PROPOSED IN COMMITTEE.

First. A commission or board to consist of the Secretary of the Treasury, the chairman and ranking minority member of both the Finance Committee of the Senate and the Ways and Means Committee of the House, and the Comptroller General, six in all.

Second. Interest in refunding of obligations not less than is provided in Liberty loan bonds, by which the loan money was raised.

Third. No obligations of foreign Governments should be canceled or materially reduced in amount or delinquent interest extended beyond two years without authority of Congress.

Fourth. No bonds of other countries should be substituted for indebtedness of any Government.

Fifth. Notice to Congress within 60 days after settlements of loan with any country should be given stating terms thereon.

Sixth. Authority of commission to settle shall not extend beyond two years from the approval of the act.

AMENDMENTS ADOPTED BY COMMITTEE.

These amendments offered in committee in the form of a substitute bill were substantially accepted in part by the committee and are contained in the pending bill as follows:

First. A commission of five members to be appointed by the President and confirmed by the Senate. This was a compromise and far preferable to leaving the power with the Secretary of the Treasury or anyone man alone as proposed in the reported Senate bill.

Second. An amendment was accepted prohibiting the exchange of foreign Government bonds.

Third. An amendment was accepted that ended authority to act in three years instead of unlimited time as proposed in the original bill.

Fourth. Amendment was accepted providing for notice of progress in settlements to be printed in the Secretary of the Treasury reports.

Fifth. A prohibition against cancellation of any part of any foreign debt.

These provisions were not asked because of lack of faith in any commission that may be appointed, but because of propaganda and pronouncements by reputable authority in favor of reducing interest and principal of loans, extending even to cancellation proposals. Any commission acting under the provisions of this bill will be relieved from individual embarrassment on the above score by a legislative declaration placed in the bill. Again, the country is entitled to this assurance, and no valid objection has been urged.

In order that comparisons may be made between the amended bill and the bill as introduced, a copy of the bill here reported by our committee is set forth. It is short, and because of its far-reaching importance carrying the right to "settle" eleven thousand million dollars it is inserted.

REFUNDING BILL AS REPORTED.

A bill (H. R. 8762) to create a commission authorized under certain conditions to refund or convert obligations of foreign Governments owing to the United States of America, and for other purposes.

Be it enacted, etc., That a World War Foreign Debt Commission is hereby created consisting of five members, one of whom shall be the Secretary of the Treasury, who shall serve as chairman, and four of whom shall be appointed by the President, which appointments, when other than Cabinet officers, shall be made with the advice and consent of the Senate.

SEC. 2. That the commission created by section 1, with the approval of the President, is hereby authorized, from time to time, to refund or convert, and to extend the time of payment of the principal or the interest, or both, of any obligation of any foreign Government now owing to the United States of America, or any obligation of any foreign Government hereafter received by the United States of America (including obligations held by the United States Grain Corporation, the War Department, the Navy Department, or the American Relief Administration), arising out of the World War, into bonds or other obligations of such foreign Government and from time to time to receive bonds and obligations of any foreign Government in substitution for the bonds or obligations of such Government now or hereafter held by the United States of America, in such form and of such terms, conditions, date or dates of maturity, and rate or rates of interest, and with such security, if any, as shall be deemed for the best interest of the United States of America, and to adjust and settle any and all claims, not now represented by bonds or obligations, which the United States of America now has or hereafter may have against any foreign Government and to accept securities therefor.

SEC. 3. That this act shall not be construed to authorize the exchange of bonds or other obligations of any foreign Government for those of any other foreign Government or cancellation of any part of such indebtedness except through the payment thereof.

SEC. 4. That the authority granted by this act shall cease and determine at the end of three years from the date of the passage of this act.

SEC. 5. That the annual report of this commission shall be included in the annual report of the Secretary of the Treasury on the state of the finances.

A sixth amendment offered to the committee provided that no interest payment should be extended beyond two years from date and interest rates should equal the cost to the Government as evidenced by the rates provided in Liberty loans and accrued delinquent interest which is to be spread over the loaning period by additional interest rates.

The Treasury Department officials declared to the committee that a two-year period placed as an outside limitation of interest payments would be construed to mean a postponement for that period. That such interest payments were expected to be promptly made and for the full amount as now agreed by the debtor nations. On this understanding the amendment was not pressed.

LAWS THAT GOVERNED THE MAKING OF WAR LOANS.

An act to authorize an issue of bonds to meet expenditures for the national security and defense, and for the purpose of assisting in the prosecution of the war, to extend credit to foreign Governments, and for other purposes.

SEC. 2. That for the purpose of more effectually providing for the national security and defense and prosecuting the war by establishing credits in the United States for foreign Governments, the Secretary of the Treasury, with the approval of the President, is hereby authorized, on behalf of the United States, to purchase at par, from such foreign Governments then engaged in war with the enemies of the United States, their obligations hereafter issued, bearing the same rate of interest and containing in their essentials the same terms and conditions as those of the United States issued under authority of this act to enter into such arrangements as may be necessary or desirable for establishing such credits and for purchasing such obligations of foreign Governments and for the subsequent payment thereof before maturity * * *.

Provided, That the authority granted by this section to the Secretary of the Treasury to purchase bonds from foreign Governments, as aforesaid, shall cease upon the termination of the war between the United States and the Imperial German Government.

Attention is also asked to the following extract from act No. 43, Sixty-fifth Congress, H. R. 5901, approved September 24, 1917:

SEC. 3. That the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized * * * to convert any short-time obligations of foreign Governments which may have been purchased under authority * * * into long-time obligations of such foreign Governments, respectively, maturing not later than the bonds of the United States then last issued * * * and in such form and terms as the Secretary of the Treasury may prescribe; but the rate or rates of interest borne by any such long-time obligations at the time of their acquisition shall not be less than the rate borne by the short-time obligations so converted * * *.

These acts and others of the same tenor were passed during the war when Congress was compelled to extend wide authority to administrative officers without time for review. Under the various acts the Secretary of the Treasury loaned the following amounts to the Governments named.

From the foregoing statement it appears that up to and including the last interest period foreign obligations reached $10,141,267,585, and accrued interest $943,534,755, or a total indebtedness from foreign Governments to ours of $11,084,802,341.67. This does not represent any interest due on delinquent interest, although it has been contended such interest is properly due, because these loans were made by the American people through sacrifices that did not contemplate any different conditions than were imposed by the local banking institutions that carried their individual notes.

The acts of authorization passed by Congress in addition to prescribing terms of loans to foreign Governments also set forth that such loans were made "for the national security and defense and prosecution of the war by established credits" to foreign Governments "then engaged in war with the enemies of the United States." Authority to loan ceased upon the "termination of the war between the United States and the Imperial German Government."

According to available data, approximately $8,000,000,000 was loaned to foreign Governments prior to the date of the armistice, November 11, 1918. Since the date of the armistice about $1,500 000,000 more has been loaned to foreign Governments by the Secretary of the Treasury, without specific authority of law and in opposition to specific limitations.

AUTHORITY CEASED WHEN THE WAR ENDED.

Mr. Chairman, when the Secretary of the Treasury and Mr. Rathbone, Assistant Secretary, appeared before the Ways and Means Committee, February 15, 1919, asking for authority to make foreign loans as proposed by a bill there presented, the committee refused to act, but the Treasury Department continued making loans of public money to foreign Governments.

When asked by the committee what evidences of indebtedness are held by this Government for the $11,000,000,000 now due from foreign Governments, Secretary Mellon replied that the only documents in the Treasury are memoranda signed by the official representatives of the various countries, which are informal promises to pay and virtually I O U's from such officials. No pretense is offered that the obligations so accepted by the then Secretary of the Treasury are in the form of bonds or negotiable instruments or drawn in accordance with the terms of the Liberty loan acts, which provide that they shall bear the same rate of interest and contain in their essentials the same terms and conditions as those of the United States issued under the several Liberty loan acts.

These evidences of foreign indebtedness on file in the Treasury have been termed demand obligations, without any date of maturity. In other words, efforts by Congress to limit the term and restrict conditions of foreign loans by prescribing rates of interest, terms of loans, and purpose for which loaned were without effect, and the then Secretaries of the Treasury acted on their own judgment or lack of judgment. The foregoing statement in regard to foreign loans is offered to indicate the disregard evidenced by the Treasury Department in the past for acts of Congress that we call "law."

MONEY LOANED WITHOUT AUTHORITY OF LAW.

Nearly $1,500,000,000 loaned by the Treasury Department after hostilities ceased was raised from the American people by Liberty-loan drives and taxation that had been authorized to be used for the purpose of prosecuting the war. Treasury Department officials were aware of the fact that they had no authority to make loans after hostilities ceased. A writer on this subject, familiar with all the data on file, says:

> Millions of Liberty-loan money were loaned to Great Britain after all hostilities had ceased for the purpose of allowing her to build up her export trade and return to a normal basis. Thus the money raised from the American people to prosecute the war was used by Great Britain in competition with American foreign trade. From this public fund in the Treasury money was advanced long after the armistice to pay for expenses of certain delegates of foreign countries to the peace conference. Equally unauthorized were payments from the Treasury to foreign Governments wherewith to pay back installments of delinquent interest due from such Governments to our own.
> The Treasury Department continued making advances to foreign Governments while at the same time it was holding consultations and parleys with foreign Governments on a possible cancellation of all debts as proposed by these Governments.
> Most of the money loaned to foreign Governments was used to make purchases in the United States. By continuing the making of foreign loans to foreign Governments after the armistice so that they could return to normal the Treasury Department prevented the United States from returning to normal because the purchases made in the United States with such loans kept the prices in the United States at a war instead of a prewar level.

This is no attempt to frame an indictment against those who engaged in unauthorized acts, but when the Treasury Department asks unlimited power to control the settlement of $11,000,000,000 indebtedness in time of peace, it is time to fix responsibility on a department that has ignored the law under which such foreign indebtedness was created.

With this brief chapter disclosing official disregard for express provisions of law heretofore enacted by Congress for the creation of foreign loans, Congress was asked under H. R. 7359 to give large powers that invited restrictions, which I proposed for reasons that will be given.

POWERFUL INFLUENCES THAT WILL BE FELT IN SETTLEMENTS.

An effort will be made to point out influences that are certain to center their attacks upon those having authority from Congress to adjust and refund these foreign debts.

First. Private financial interests in this country known as international bankers who now hold foreign securities that depend for their payment on the course pursued in the refunding of these foreign debts to our Government. They are profoundly concerned in such settlements. In response to a question of the amount of privately owned foreign obligations thus held in this country Secretary Mellon estimated them at $4,000,000,000 or over at this time, which amount if given priority to claims held by our Government will then have a favored status.

Second. Pressure will be encountered for cancellation of foreign debts owed this Government. This desire may naturally be expected on the part of those last mentioned and especially from representatives of foreign Governments that would thus be relieved from debt.

Third. Efforts to secure reduction of loans if cancellation fails, also reduction of interest rate, are reasonably certain. Efforts to secure long extension of interest payments and long-time bonds in the belief that time may permit their eventual cancellation, and long extensions may enable foreign countries to accord priority to private debts that are being pressed for payment.

Fourth. Efforts to effect secret alliances or international agreements through settlement of these foreign obligations are openly suggested.

The foregoing suggestions are not intended to cover even a small part of the influences to which the Government refunding agency will be subject, but they are offered to remind those in another legislative branch of the Government that the funding bill reported to that body may not extend protection to which the country is entitled.

No interest has been paid on these foreign debts since May 5, 1919, or for nearly two and a half years. The policy of asking for interest on this amount is apparently determined against this Government and those who contributed the money are entitled to know that settlements hereafter will receive careful consideration from those who grant the authorization.

SECRETARY MELLON IN RELATION TO POSTPONING INTEREST.

When advised that claims had been made through the press and elsewhere that interest payments on foreign loans may be postponed for a long period, Secretary Mellon responded before the committee—

> As to that, there may exist such situation in the foreign trade conditions in regard to the rate of exchange, etc., that in the first place would make it very difficult for the debtor country and would add a very large percentage to the amount necessary to meet cash payments, and at the same time, if they were forced to pay, it might react against the interests of this country. That is, might be a block to the exporting of commodities from this country, if we forced payment of interest which would naturally depreciate their currency and raise the rate of exchange tending toward prohibition of sales from this country to that country, so there may arise conditions where it would be. I might say, necessary to defer the interest—it might be a great deal better for this country to defer the interest than to insist on its payment.

Mr. Chairman, I desire to discuss the proposed amendment, which is designed to prevent cancellation of any part of any foreign loan or the interest on such loan. On this question a few quotations from high authority will be offered.

POSITION OF ENGLISH OFFICIALS ON CANCELLATION OR REDUCTION.

From a letter dated October 10, 1921, addressed to Chairman FORDNEY of the Ways and Means Committee relating to this funding bill, copies of which were sent to me, I quote:

On February 4, 1921, the British chancellor of the exchequer, J. Austin Chamberlain, speaking at Birmingham, England, stated unequivocally that a proposal for cancellation of the British debts had been made to the Government of the United States. On February 12, 1921, Hon. David F. Houston, then Secretary of the Treasury, testified before the Senate Committee on Foreign Relations that Great Britain had not only once but repeatedly suggested the remittance of her indebtedness to the United States. Within the past week we have had a statement of Winston Churchill, one of the spokesmen of the present British Government, that Great Britain should again seek the cancellation of this debt in connection with the negotiations to take place at the forthcoming disarmament conference.

The foregoing has not been verified because of brief time afforded, but its publication throughout the country indicates its acceptance by the signers of the letter and by a large portion of our people who are familiar with its contents.

On September 18, 1921, about 30 days ago, John M. Keynes, who has been generously quoted on the floors of the Senate and House in recent times, expressed his judgment on the economic outlook in Europe. His article, carried in leading papers of this country, contains the following on cancellation of war debts:

The sum which Great Britain owes America is one which, if necessary, Great Britain can pay. But it is not likely that the sums which the other European Governments owe America can be repaid in any case. It is right that American opinion should face this distinction, which is obviously relevant. There are reasons for material self-interest for canceling the European debts which do not apply to the British debts. The arguments for an all-round cancellation are partly the foreign trade argument set forth above and partly connected with the origin of the debt which are not chiefly economic * * *. The settlement of the interallied debts is intimately bound up with the reparation settlement. The cancellation of the former would be a ground for a sensible conclusion of the latter * * *. It is also bound up with disarmament.

The following statement is equally significant. In a Washington newspaper of January 24, 1921, appears a report dated Paris, January 23, 1921, that the French minister of finance in an interview with a Paris journal gave his view of the suggestion that France's debts be canceled, and he is quoted as saying:

I think America is far more sympathetic to us than is believed. Time must be permitted to do its work; and as a new administration is to be installed, let us await March with confidence.

The new administration has been installed, and whatever confidence may be felt by the officials of France or of any other country in a change of administration can only be known by the representative of that country.

CANCELLATION NEARLY SUCCEEDED. (?)

On this subject of cancellation of indebtedness the following statement by Tardieu occurs in "The Truth About the Treaty" (pp. 343-345):

During the month of June I had several conversations on the same subject (foreign indebtedness) with Mr. House and Mr. Lamont. * * * It is thus that we considered the advantages and feasibility of a solution of which Mr. Keynes in his overweening pride has imagined that he is the author. I refer to the cancellation of all war debts. This cancellation would have been a first step toward thoroughgoing financial unity. Others would have followed. America, unanimous in not demanding for the time being either the repayment of our debt of $3,000,000,000 or even the interest thereon, was quite capable of taking such a step if its consequences had been fully explained. That is what Mr. Wilson intended to undertake immediately after his campaign for the ratification of the treaty of Versailles. * * * The result is that in 1920 we are further from our goal than in 1919. The Allies are partly responsible for this by having omitted for 10 months to enforce upon Germany the obligation to issue the bonds in their favor as provided for in the treaty. * * * The idea of unity which the peacemakers were about to realize is in eclipse. Will men be found to restore it to life and light?

In to-day's Washington Times, under large headlines, a cablegram from London proposes a cancellation all round or a wiping out of all obligations. This has been a proposition discussed in the past between our Treasury Department and English treasury officials, and, like Banquo's ghost, will not down.

I quote:

LONDON, October 21.

Debts owed by the various allies to Great Britain are as follows:

Russia	$2,245,600,000
France	2,228,000,000
Italy	1,907,200,000
Belgium	413,600,000
Serbia	88,400,000
Other nations	321,600,000
Dominions	576,000,000
Total	7,790,400,000

[Copyright, 1921, by International News Service.]

LONDON, October 21.

Great Britain is planning a great, spectacular move on the very eve of the Washington disarmament conference toward cancellation of allied debts.

The International News Service was informed by a high British authority to-day that Great Britain is considering a definite plan to wipe out all debts owed her by the other allied nations.

The movement has the approval of the cabinet, the treasury, and the foreign office, it was learned. Business men also have indicated they favored such a movement. The only doubt remaining is whether the British public will take kindly to the proposal.

British officials pointed out that such a step would enormously enhance British prestige and would have a strong influence upon exchange throughout the world in favor of Great Britain and would give the empire a strong grip on universal markets. It also, it was stated, would help to solve the unemployment problem.

It is likely the Government will embark upon an intensive campaign of propaganda, awaiting the most favorable moment to make announcement of the debt cancellation.

ANOTHER COUNTRY HEARD FROM.

England and France are not alone in hoping their debts will be canceled. Italy, the remaining member of the "big three," with obligations reaching over $1,800,000,000, is actively concerned. It is not necessary to go back to last year or last month or last week for information as evidenced by the following cablegram under date of October 18 of this week:

HOLDS UNITED STATES POLICY ON LOANS UNJUST—ITALIAN PAPER DEMURS AT REPAYMENT OF ADVANCES TO FOREIGN COUNTRIES.

[By the Associated Press.]

ROME, October 18.

The policy of the American Government regarding recognition of the payment of Europe's debts, especially Italy's, "is unjust and imprudent," declared the Popolo Romano in an editorial to-day.

"It is unjust," declared the editorial, "because America can not equitably claim payment of sums advanced to us for our needs which were directly and solely occasioned for continuation of the war in which Italy spent all her resources and was not able to continue without aid from the allied and associated nations, who were more powerful. The results of the war show who gained the major advantages. It is therefore logical that the burdens should be shared equally. Inasmuch as Germany will be unable to fulfill the financial obligations of the treaty of Versailles, it is unjust for America to force payment from us, who are materially impotent.

England lent the Allies £1,000,000,000 sterling. America in turn lent England £2,000,000,000. The London Government would remit the allied debt if America would remit hers.

"Italy is interested in making the Washington conference successful, because it would signalize the return of America into world affairs. We are the loyal ally of England, but we intend to remain America's best friend."

Mr. Tardeau, the French high commissioner to America, just quoted, speaks of his conferences with Mr. Lamont in reference to cancellation of foreign loans. It is possibly a coincidence that Mr. Lamont, who is a member of the American banking firm of J. P. Morgan & Co., is now and has been treasurer of the Italy American Society since its inception in 1918. Mr. Tardeau's interviews with Mr. Lamont and the editorial from the Rome paper speak for themselves.

OPINIONS OF OTHER AMERICAN FINANCIERS.

A report of a speech February 4, 1921, delivered by James G. McDonald at the annual meeting of the National Institute of Social Sciences is of especial interest in this connection. The society includes among its presidents and vice presidents Chief Justice Taft, honorary president, and Hon. Elihu Root, Charles M. Schwab, Oscar S. Straus, and others, vice presidents. The treasurer is "Henry P. Davison, care of J. P. Morgan & Co., New York City," and others of scarcely less prominence.

In his speech Mr. McDonald said regarding foreign indebtedness:

When we complain about the 12 per cent tax or about the impossibility of these German reparation terms, Lloyd-George may say, "I know they are pretty stiff, but, after all, allied indebtedness and reparations are all a piece of the same cloth." Whenever you think you can begin to talk to us about remission of interest or principal, why then we can talk about reparation terms. Lloyd-George in my estimate accepted this figure—this only my guess—as a means of bargaining with us about the allied indebtedness here.

Mr. McDonald then makes this significant statement:

The trouble with that calculation, if it is a calculation, is this: We can not talk about remission of debts to the Allies here. The country will not have it. Just because those in the particular circle in which we move are inclined to think it is a good thing makes me sure the country will not have it. Indeed, whenever my friends make up their minds about a certain policy I am almost sure it is a hopeless policy. I am perfectly certain this is the case about the remission of allied debts.

Among Mr. McDonald's "friends" and "particular circle," it may certainly be gathered, are the officers named. He adds:

My point about reparations is this: It seems to me if we can not be generous to France—and I don't believe at the present moment we are prepared to be generous—if we can't be generous to forgive her debts, let's be sensible.

And so forth.

Mr. Otto H. Kahn, who speaks for Kuhn, Loeb & Co., New York bankers, in a letter to the London Times of April 30, 1921, quoted in these same proceedings, says:

Whatever may be the shortcomings of the American people—

Mr. Kahn was a German soldier, according to Who's Who, and a British subject, before he became an American citizen in 1917—

no one can accuse them—Americans—individually or nationally of lack of willing generosity. Why then the distinct manifestation of public sentiment of late against the suggestions of relinquishing war indebtedness all around among those with whom we stood as brothers in arms barely more than two years ago? (P. 38.)

George E. Roberts, vice president National City Bank, New York, offers a contribution to the general desire for cancellation on page 26 of the same National Institute of Science report, previously quoted, when he said:

When the suggestion that the United States should forgive and cancel these debts was first made it must be conceded that the response in this country was very faint, but as the business public has been studying the ways and means by which international debts are paid and the influence of such payments upon exchange rates and foreign trade, interest in the proposal has grown in a very marked degree. Apparently a good many people are beginning to think that perhaps this country will do well to forgive its debtors and take advantage of whatever benefits are implied in the Lord's prayer, * * *. The sudden introduction into the exchange situation of a new factor, like $500,000,000 annually of interest payments, to say nothing about payments on the principal, would throw the exchanges, already badly demoralized, still more out of balance, tend to disrupt trade relations, and work especially to the disadvantage of American export business * * *.

In view of the fact that our own interests forbid the collection of the debts or the interest upon them at any near-by date, this question of whether the debts shall be canceled or not is not a pressing one and really of much less consequence than many people think.

Before the Senate Committee on Foreign Relations, Sixty-sixth Congress, first session (S. Res. 64), Mr. Frank Vanderlip said (p. 54):

There is a disposition in France and England to feel that it would be wise and just for us to forego the demand for the repayment of the large amounts of money we have loaned * * *. There is a distinct feeling in France and England that it would be a just thing for us to forego asking the repayment of the large amount of money we have loaned.

Senator McCUMBER. At any time or just at the present time?

Mr. VANDERLIP. No, sir; I really mean forego it.

Mr. Vanderlip's right to speak authoritatively appears from the fact that he was vice president of the National City Bank, New York City, from 1901 to 1909, and president of the same bank from 1909 to 1919. He is also stated to be chairman of the board of directors of the American International Corporation and of the International Mercantile Marine Co.

HIGH FINANCIAL STANDING OF MEN QUOTED.

With Mr. Roberts, before quoted, Mr. Vanderlip represents the sentiment of the First National Bank of New York City and of many of its affiliated organizations in their international interests. No man better represents Kuhn, Loeb & Co. than Mr. Otto Kahn. Mr. Lamont, of J. P. Morgan & Co., is quoted by Tardieu. Mr. Davison, of J. P. Morgan & Co., treasurer of the society, named among the friends of Mr. McDonald, carries much weight in his own right. Mr. Davison was formerly vice president of the First National Bank of New York, of which Vanderlip and Roberts were also officials. As a member of the J. P. Morgan Co. in 1915, before the war, Mr. Davison's company negotiated a loan to the French Government in addition to a $12,000,000 loan to the Russian Government. In 1915 Mr. Morgan was appointed commercial agent to the British Government and organized a syndicate in this country that floated a $500,000,000 loan to the Allies September 15, 1915. The foregoing is from Who's Who. Mark Watson, a financial writer, said of one transaction:

It is a striking commentary on the strange attitude exhibited by the most important clique of bankers in the country, which brought out the recent French notes, soaking the French Government pretty nearly all the traffic will bear.

What power these interests can wield now or in the future to influence action affecting settlement of foreign debts is a matter hard to determine.

Mr. Roberts and Mr. Vanderlip, of the great New York bank, and Mr. Kahn, of Kuhn, Loeb & Co., and those who stand in the background suggest pressure that may be in evidence from this side of the Atlantic, while the minister of finance of France, chancellor of the exchequer and prime minister of England, who have been quoted, are not adverse to postponement or cancellation of foreign debts now owing to America.

Mr. Chairman, singularly enough, among those quoted on foreign cancellations are financiers who were publicly charged with having knowledge of the peace treaty terms 10 days before they were communicated to the United States Senate. At that time public criticism was severe on the leak and fortunes to be made thereby, on one-man power, and on the apparent ignoring of a coordinate branch of Government immediately concerned in the result. The culmination of the disagreement resulted in a change of administration and a protest against one-man power, because it has no place in our kind of government.

The association of distinguished financiers in this country in any proposed settlement of foreign obligations is defended on the ground that they are familiar with business conditions here and abroad, but the policy of permitting in such negotiations outside bankers, however distinguished, is not calculated to represent the sentiment of those who largely contributed the money that was loaned to foreign Governments.

OPPORTUNITY FOR MONEY-MARKET MANIPULATIONS.

Again, "leaks" are punished severely when consultations and decisions of courts are revealed prior to public announcement, thereby enabling favored individuals to profit by the information. No such punishment is meted out to those in administrative or legislative circles, because both branches ordinarily are conducted in an open public manner.

When it was urged to have one man, however eminent, conduct and control all negotiations secretly, without restriction or limitation of any kind, without the interposition, direct or indirect, of a coordinate branch of Government, the possibility of leak scandals was certain, and the proposed abdication of responsibility by Congress as set forth by the bill first under consideration would have been indefensible.

In connection with proposed cancellation of foreign debts, other quotations could be submitted from press statements here and abroad, and from full-page propaganda advertisements in this country advocating cancellations of foreign debts, but no general discussion is here intended to show the extent to which such pressure is being urged by propaganda, both here and abroad.

Neither has any data been presented respecting efforts and representations that may have been made by foreign Governments officially to secure cancellation of debt. Quotations submitted are from public utterances of men open to the world, and indicate a sentiment here and abroad that will find no encouragement from limitations we have placed upon settlement authorizations.

A public advertisement is found in the Journal of Commerce, of Chicago, July 14, of this year, typical of others that may follow. Its publication was undoubtedly premature, because it could only serve to make the American people apprehensive of what may immediately follow the granting of authority to any agency by Congress for refunding of our foreign indebtedness. Propaganda with which financiers and Governments are past masters may be expected to follow the enactment of this bill into law. No pressure on Congress has exceeded the demand by large financial interests for the repeal of the excess-profits tax, the reduction of high personal-income taxes, and enactment of a general sales tax. What will be the effect of placing authority to settle these debts in the hands of any individual or of any commission when the financial interests involved reach the enormous sum of eleven thousand million dollars? Strong motive for propaganda in such cases is evidenced by the following advertisement, which will probably be reproduced in every conceivable form when the power is once laid by Congress with any individual or commission authorized to act:

[From the Chicago Journal of Commerce.]

SHALL THE ALLIED DEBT BE CANCELED BY UNITED STATES?

Should the debts of the Allies to the United States be canceled? Consider the following figures:

WHAT THE WAR COST IN MONEY.

England	$39,827,824,940
France	24,312,782,800
Italy	12,413,998,000
Belgium and other allies	3,963,867,914
United States	22,625,252,843

The $22,625,252,843 expended by the United States includes $10,000,000,000 loaned to the Allies.

WHAT THE WAR COST IN LIVES.

England	839,904
France	1,654,550
Italy	1,180,600
Belgium	272,000
United States	109,704

Following are estimated figures if the United States had entered the war at the beginning, as many think the United States should have done:

COST IN MONEY.

England	$30,000,000,000
France	20,000,000,000
Italy	10,000,000,000
Belgium and other allies	3,000,000,000
United States	30,000,000,000

COST IN LIVES.

England	500,000 to 1,000,000
France	1,000,000
Italy	500,000
Belgium	200,000
United States	500,000 to 1,000,000

Is $10,000,000 000 too much to pay for 400,000 to 900,000 lives of our American boys saved?

How much would it have cost to nurse and pension 1,000,000 wounded soldiers?

If we can not to-day discharge a debt of $3,000,000,000 to $5,000,000.000 asked by discharged soldiers as a bonus and rehabilitation appropriation (and President Harding solemnly warns us that we can not), what would we do with the obligation that would have accrued had we entered the war when the Lusitania was sunk?

Can business return to normal relationship before this allied-debt question is settled?

Did we ask Germany, who killed our boys, for any compensation?

Should we ask our allies, who saved our boys and civilization, to pay us?

Was not every dollar of the $10,000,000,000 which our allies owe us spent by them in keeping the common enemy away from our gates?

No bolder or more brazen attempt to misrepresent the attitude of this country could well be framed in equal space. It is presented without argument to show the viewpoint of those who demand the cancellation of foreign debts.

From the farmers' national council, claiming to represent 18 State or national organizations, the following extract from a letter sent the chairman of the Ways and Means Committee is pertinent. It indicates a sentiment more or less prevalent throughout the country that is not without some foundation, judging from extracts previously offered. I quote:

Of course, you know perfectly well what the plan of the big financial interests and investment bankers of our county is. They propose to remit these entire loans and accrued interest and make farmers and other workers pay the whole costs on the condition that our investment bankers get into the criminal game of grabbing concessions in backward nations and exploiting these peoples, as the financial interests of England, Japan, France, and Italy have done continuously and very conspicuously since the armistice which closed the war to make the world safe for democracy.

AMERICA ASKS NO FRUITS OF VICTORY.

The merits of the proposed cancellation will not be considered beyond a reminder that Great Britain, which is indebted to this Government for $4,500,000,000, under the peace treaty parceled off to itself 3,805,000 square miles of territory by the treaty, or as large an area as its ally, France, and of incalculable value in future business and in income to the empire.

In like manner France and other Governments were given slices of the earth's surface, and large quotas of the earth's people and future reparations evidenced by present indebtedness of Germany, Austria, or other Governments. New governments created from the wreck of war owe their present existence to the opportune military and financial aid of the United States, while our own country neither received nor asked one foot of territory nor one dollar of reparation for the losses sustained by our people. We spent $37,000,000,000 for war, and of this about $10,000,000,000 was loaned to Europe. A just repayment of moneys raised through sacrifices by our people and thereafter loaned to the Allies is all that is involved in the settlement and refunding proposal.

Public statements have been quoted showing sentiment among those whose influence may figure in the advice given any authorized settlement agency when such settlements are made. This judgment of men quoted may arise from purely altruistic motives, but it is immaterial whether influenced to any extent by financial consequences or whether private holdings of $4,000,000,000 on foreign debts have any bearing on the proposed postponement or cancellation of interest or obligations held by this Government against foreign Governments.

Congress and the country it represents are not concerned in motives or purposes, whether secretly or openly expressed, of powerful financial interests here and abroad that will advise in these settlements, but vital interest is manifest as to the effect of these influences upon any agency authorized to make foreign settlements, and as to the character of the settlements.

The question has been raised whether or not tentative proposals for settlement should be referred back to Congress for approval. I believe it would involve constant discussions in both Houses of Congress, similar to those which accompany debates on treaties in the Senate, because these settlements are in the nature of money treaties. It would involve similar discussions with every foreign Government, and in some Governments it would arouse strong opposition against any settlement on any basis, with long delays, great confusion, and possibly strained international relations because of such conditions.

These loans were authorized originally by the American Congress to be made direct by the Secretary of the Treasury without any limitation of amount or of interest, time, or payment to any country excepting under the general restriction placed in the Liberty loan acts. No further approval by Congress was suggested at that time, and the power here conferred on the commission is to refund these same loans. Many restrictions are placed in the present bill that were not provided for in the original act, which act permitted the Secretary alone to act with almost unrestricted authority.

If approval of settlements by Congress with 19 Governments was practicable we should certainly insist upon such action, but it looks like inviting countless disagreements, repudiations, and war. Strong opposition might occur in any country with attempted repudiation of such obligations, resulting in international complications. In my judgment it is not a question of principle so much as of practicability with which we are confronted, and I will support any further restrictions that are workable and that will carry out the will of Congress expressed in advance.

CONSTITUTIONAL DUTIES NOT TO BE IGNORED.

Mr. Chairman, no purpose exists to lay down any line of cleavage between legislative and administrative functions. That is a proposition to which many thousands of pages of mature thought have been devoted, and the only suggestion offered is for the purpose of presenting a proposition which must be passed upon by those to whom it is submitted.

Under its constitutional power Congress authorizes the raising of money needed for the common defense. Under that power Congress authorized the Secretary of the Treasury to make loans to our allies subject to the restrictions contained in the law. No approval by Congress or report to Congress of amounts loaned or terms thereof was required. Then was the time for such action, if at all. Based on that authorization loans were made practically without relation to conditions prescribed in the law and foreign Governments are indebted to ours to-day in the sum of over $11,000,000,000. This amount is practically three times the amount raised by taxes each year. If collected it will reduce the taxes collected each year. If remitted, canceled, or materially reduced, the direct tax on our own people will be affected by such action. A deferring of interest on such loans, not by action of Congress but by past administration officials, has prevented a promised reduction of taxes. No question of policy is here considered, but the matter of revenues is so directly affected by these foreign loans that no careful administrative officer under the power conferred by the Liberty loan acts would attempt to refund or settle those loans without specific authority to do so.

From the nature of things, it seems impossible for Congress to conduct settlements. On the other hand, the settlements proposed involve practically treaty powers. They are to fix terms with foreign Governments that are to be represented by specific obligations. If not performed or paid according to their terms they can only be enforced by arms. In the case of foreign Governments in this hemisphere we have placed force behind debts due private parties in Santo Domingo, Haiti, and elsewhere and equal significance must be attached to any default in debts in Europe when such debts are held by our own Government. No right of confirmation has been given the Senate to pass upon this proposed money treaty with a score of foreign powers when settlement is reached and no consideration hereafter is given either branch of Congress in H. R. 7359 or the committee substitute, both of which affect revenues as certainly as any revenue or tax law that may be passed.

For this reason every principle involved in the Constitution that calls for approval of treaties and determination of tax levies is called into force at the outset in the settlement of this foreign indebtedness. Congress should properly be represented on any commission that settles or refunds this indebtedness which reaches almost half of the present enormous public debt. Members from both branches of Congress and from both political parties should participate in such settlement as proposed in the first substitute amendment herein offered with the addition accepted from the minority members of the committee. I believe that substitute commission would have given general confidence to the country, but the substitute adopted is preferable in every way to one-man absolutism.

Secretary Mellon before the Finance Committee expressed his frank opinion when he said, "If a commission can be appointed, I would be very glad to be relieved."

The Secretary of the Treasury should not be relieved, but should be a member of the commission. Presumably pressure from great financial interests and from foreign Governments never before encountered will be brought to bear on the American agency selected by Congress to act. The necessity of reaching an agreement will bring a union of purpose and mutual concessions that always occur with all legislative bodies.

It will fix official responsibility that was originally incurred under a different political administration, and those selected to represent Congress and the country must command the confidence of both.

For this reason H. R. 7359 as originally presented to the committee and as reported was opposed. The amendments inserted are self-explanatory and of vital importance, first, because they serve as legislative limitations that point out the duty of the refunding agents of this country, not alone to govern themselves, but to guide those with whom they negotiate, and, second, such limitation will serve to relieve needless discussion throughout the country by providing limitations in advance. Experience has shown the importance for such action.

Mr. Chairman, I do not believe there ought to be any politics in this refunding proposal. I can not conceive of any purpose that would be gained by making a party issue of it.

Now, if that is true, let us see where we find ourselves at this stage of the proceedings. I am not going to discuss what has happened in the past, beyond the statement heretofore made, whether the authority existed in the Secretary of the Treasury to make the loans he made, whether he complied with the orders that appeared in the law or not, but I want to present to you the situation which confronts us in view of the proposal to have a tentative agreement entered into by the Secretary of the Treasury and this commission with foreign Governments. In this I am addressing myself to arguments offered to-day in debate favoring a referendum to Congress.

There are 19 Governments owing to us over $11,000,000,000. The gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. OLDFIELD], my colleague on the committee, whom I think very highly of, says it makes no difference to him whether we gave the entire power to the Secretary of the Treasury provided we refer the matter back to Congress for approval. Suppose, for instance, Great Britain, with her $4,500,000,000 debt, comes to the Secretary of the Treasury and after a long time they agree upon what they believe to be a satisfactory settlement. What is the next step according to the proposition urged by the minority report? Then it shall be sent back to the Congress of the United States for approval. It goes to the Senate and—without any criticism—we have had an exhibition of what will take place through what has taken place in the Senate on a treaty. For weeks it will be the subject of discussion. Then it must come to the House with 400 Members for consideration, and with the opportunity to make a partisan question, as has been done here to-day. But that is not the most serious side of it.

The agreement goes also to Great Britain. Great Britain then has the question presented to her and to her Parliament of whether or not they will agree to the settlement. It is not conceivable that England will repudiate it, but I hold in my hand a newspaper of to-day's issue containing a cablegram which affects this question. This article states that England may erase all debts, and the article goes on further to say that such a plan has the approval of the cabinet in Great Britain, and though it does not so state in the article, it is conditioned on this Government erasing the debts owed by the various Governments to us. That has been a matter of secret negotiations, as I presume the majority of the Members are aware. I am taking the strongest Government, Great Britain. It is discussed in their Parliament while it is discussed here. Possibly we will agree to the proposal because agreed to by our agents appointed to negotiate, and possibly we will not. If not agreed to by both House and Senate then it has to go back to the agents for reconsideration. There are 18 other Governments where we go through the same proposition and many times disagreements will occur in the legislative bodies of such Governments. It seems to me as a practical proposition that we must place the authority somewhere and provide the best possible restrictions so we can compel the agents selected to follow certain limitations. The gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. OLDFIELD] suggested that he will be satisfied with the Secretary of the Treasury to make tentative agreement, but I think the judgment of five men will be better, particularly when they are to be confirmed by the Senate, and after that their decision is to be approved by the President of the United States.

Mr. CRISP. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FREAR. Yes; certainly.

Mr. CRISP. I know the gentleman to be a very able, conscientious legislator, and being on the committee with him I know that he has labored to throw safeguards around this bill. In my judgment it is only just to say that through his efforts, largely, was this bill changed from a one-man power to a commission power, and I think the gentleman is responsible for clause 3 being in the bill. What objection has the gentleman to this commission being empowered to open negotiations, their action to be binding only when ratified by the Congress?

Mr. FREAR. I thank the gentleman for his kind words, personally, but that is the very point I desire to offer for your consideration now—the practical end of attempted ratification. There are 19 Governments concerned. Some of these Governments have strong influences at home to-day advocating cancellation of their indebtedness. They are discussing that in their parliaments, in their legislative bodies. We throw wide open the door by referring all agreements for their ratification, and the moment we say that we are going to send back to Congress they surely will insist that the same right and power be extended to them.

It may be that Congress will not in six months get to a determination of whether or not we are going to accept the agreement of our agents, and then it goes back for another tentative agreement. We do not get to any decision as a practical proposition. We must put the authority and responsibility somewhere and with the President and Senate acting as to the commission we have done all that could be expected.

Mr. LONGWORTH. And also one of these agreements might be concluded on the 5th of March, when Congress is not in session, and hang fire until the following December.

Mr. FREAR. The suggestion of the gentleman from Ohio is correct. Let me say one word more in this particular. Suppose we can not come to an agreement. Remember, this is not a note, as has been referred to here, or an I O U, that can be placed in judgment and collected. How are you going to collect if you do not come to some agreement? There is only one way to do so, and that is by force of arms. It seems to me futile to suggest on a matter of international relations that we are going to turn to our own legislative bodies and they to theirs, and subsequently try to thrash out the matter here and there, bearing in mind a possible desire upon their part to escape their obligations. It shows the danger that confronts us on such a proposition.

Mr. STEVENSON. Mr. Chairman, I understood the gentleman to say that this was practically a money treaty.

Mr. FREAR. Yes; it may be so regarded.

Mr. STEVENSON. Is there any way to escape its being referred to the Senate and ratified by that body?

Mr. FREAR. I put that statement broadly, but the Senate has no more power than we have under the minority proposal. The entire Congress of 400 House Members and 98 Senators are to be consulted and placed in agreement with parliamentary bodies of 19 foreign Governments. We have endeavored in committee to cover the point by requiring the Senate to confirm the members of the commission appointed by the President, and thereafter the President approves their action. That is as far as we can go, it seems to me. The Senate acted on the peace treaty and it took five or six months in which to do it, and that possible result might come in a case of this kind.

Mr. STEVENSON. Giving them the right to confirm the members of the commission is the same as they have to confirm the appointment of an ambassador?

Mr. FREAR. Yes.

Mr. STEVENSON. Confirming the appointment of an ambassador does not discharge their duty as to confirming a treaty negotiated by an ambassador.

Mr. FREAR. I understand, but I am not entering into a technical discussion with the gentleman when I say that it is a money treaty. I mention that for the sake of bringing to our minds what will be the effect. There are 19 governments to be treated with in reaching 19 debt agreements. Suppose 5 or 10 of them refuse to pay and suppose they repudiate the debt in their legislative bodies after their agents have accepted the agreements. What are we going to do then?

Mr. STEVENSON. I want to ask another question.

Mr. FREAR. But what would we do in such a case?

Mr. STEVENSON. Is it contemplated that there is to be one agreement or 19 separate agreements?

Mr. FREAR. Nineteen separate ones. Agreements with each debtor nation.

Mr. STEVENSON. Then we will handle the fellows who refuse to pay when we reach that point.

Mr. FREAR. I am trying to get at a practical solution of it that will involve a payment of the indebtedness and not in any international complications certain to result unless authority to act is placed somewhere.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FREAR. Yes; certainly.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. I think it is somewhat important to get an expression from some member of the committee as to what the language means in the bill—and settle any and all claims, not now represented by bonds or obligations, which the United States of America now has or hereafter may have.

And so forth.

I take it that language is broad enough to include claims entirely outside of these loans?

Mr. FREAR. Let me suggest this to the gentleman. I would be perfectly willing as an individual member of the committee to accept any restriction not only in regard to that, but in regard to interest payments that is at all workable, and to take out the words "subsequent claims," but I can see that subsequent interest may be subsequent claims.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. I know that, but it occurs to me that this might transfer any claims we might have on account of the Lusitania, say.

Mr. FREAR. If there is any danger of that the gentleman should perfect the bill if he deems it proper for him to do. One objection which to my mind is most serious that has been raised is as to the question of interest, and I will say I offered six amendments to this bill as it came in originally. The original bill, as you remember, placed all the power in the hands of the Secretary of the Treasury. It is not with any question of impeaching the Secretary's judgment, but it seemed to me some kind of a commission ought to be had. I preferred a commission that had representatives from this body and the Senate, but I realize the difficulties which would occur. So the commission form was eventually agreed upon as set forth in the bill before us. The amendment as to cancellation was agreed upon, and the question of the substitution of bonds was accepted. The question of the limitation to three years' authority of the commission, where unlimited under the terms of the original bill, was also agreed to.

The last provides for publicity, which seems to be almost vital. These amendments I offered in slightly different form and they were accepted. The question of interest regulation, however, was rejected. I had an amendment providing that no interest should be postponed for more than two years, but objection was raised to that by the Secretary of the Treasury that it might be taken as the purpose of Congress to permit the extension of all interest for two years, and that would be injurious to settlements, because in some cases they expected the interest to be paid at an early date.

Mr. J. M. NELSON. Would it not be a safeguard to the commission; would not they have something to rest upon when a claim is made that they should reduce the interest, in that they can point to that provision?

Mr. FREAR. I believe it would in reference to the question of cancellation and might well be a direction as to interest.

Mr. KELLEY of Michigan. What is the amendment?

Mr. FREAR. In line 14, after the word "interest," it has been suggested to insert "at not less than the rate now fixed by present agreements with such governments." Let me say that it is not original with me. The gentleman from Iowa [Mr. DOWELL] suggested something to that effect and I have drawn it crudely.

Mr. FESS. Will the gentleman yield for a question in reference to the interest? In the Liberty loan act we fixed the maximum rate because it was the Government who was paying the interest. Now, in this case it will be the other Governments who are paying the interest to this Government, where it is the minimum rather than the maximum below which it could not go.

Mr. FREAR. The minimum is suggested—"not less than."

Mr. FESS. And whether it would be safe to insert that inhibition as to fixing the minimum. I understand the maximum was fixed because we were dealing with our own people, but now, in fixing the minimum, we are dealing with a foreign country, and it might be we would fix it at a point where we would tie the hands of the Treasury to such extent that it could not function,

Mr. FREAR. Concede, for the sake of argument, that the gentleman from Ohio is right; in such a case a remedy would be to come immediately to Congress and present the situation and ask for further power, because, I believe, and I know you gentlemen do, that this is one of the most important propositions that we have had brought before us this session, and it is impossible to anticipate every situation; but the remedy will always be to refer back to Congress when further authority is needed.

We ought to make this law workable. Do not let us throw anything into the machinery. If there is any limitation that ought to be placed here, I for one, and I believe also the majority here are in favor of it if it can be made workable. If a case arises, as the gentleman from Ohio points out, of course, they could come back to Congress if necessary. The Secretary of the Treasury has said to our committee repeatedly that he believed the rates of interest now in force could be put into effect, but one thing that complicates or embarrasses the framing of an amendment is that delinquent interest is carried in the rate of interest here by agreement with foreign nations made by the Secretary. The original bill introduced here is the bill as it was introduced and reported to the Senate.

The only limitation put into it was five years given the Secretary in which to act. In other words, the Secretary of the Treasury had absolute power. He could do practically anything he chose. It was first urged it would be a lack of confidence to put in any limitation. To me it is a safeguard not only to Congress and the country but to him. It relieves him of great responsibility. So we have inserted these several safeguards. If there is anything along the same line that ought to be added I believe we ought to have it.

Mr. WINGO. Will the gentleman state what concrete proposals any of these nations have made for the refund of this debt?

Mr. FREAR. I can not. The Senate committee spent much time over that. The time limitation could not be fixed, of course, because it is all tentative. The British Government, as you probably know—and this is more a matter of correspondence—proposed various plans that were never made effective. There is nothing that can be determined until these gentlemen with authority, not only here but in the British and all other Governments, can sit down and say, subject to the limitations placed upon them, "We are going to reach a common agreement for the refunding of these loans and the payment of interest." That power must be placed somewhere, even if we tried to decide it on a referendum to Congress.

Mr. DUNBAR. On page 3 of the report there is a total of $465,271,688 paid by foreign Governments in interest. Has any been paid in the last year?

Mr. FREAR. I would rather that you would ask the chairman of the committee. I am discussing things that are to be placed in the bill and my time is limited. I understand interest payments have been postponed three years, to May, 1922.

Mr. ARENTZ. On page 2, line 15, of the bill are the words, "if any." Do they particularly refer to negotiations with nomad governments? Does that refer particularly to negotiations for security with so-called nomad governments, governments that are located in tents, like Armenia might be, or Turkey or Greece might be within a short time?

Mr. FREAR. You have got to assume that this commission is going to deal with the best kind of securities it can get from the best kind of governments. If you negotiate with nations like Armenia, you are up against the same proposition, whether you are Secretary of the Treasury, or if it is referred to Congress.

Mr. ARENTZ. And if it is a bond it is a government that is back of it?

Mr. FREAR. There has been no bond given by any government thus far.

Mr. ARENTZ. It is an I O U up to this time?

Mr. FREAR. That is all.

Mr. ARENTZ. And from now on we expect to exchange them for bonds?

Mr. FREAR. Now, we will accept the best we can get. When the war was on, we did not stop, as my friends on the Democratic side ought to keep in mind, to say to the Secretary of the Treasury, "Before you shall loan this money to this or that country at particular rates of interest you must refer it back to Congress." We gave blanket authority to the Secretary, and even limitations we did put on were not observed, as we know. That is one of the questions we have nothing to do with to-day. It will only be an obligation from the debtor government. Get the best obligation you can.

Mr. J. M. NELSON. What would be the objection to putting in the words "governmental security," so as to limit it to the obligations of a government?

Mr. FREAR. Let me say that in many countries an industrial bond is better than a governmental bond. That would be true in Austria. Of course, that is a matter of judgment.

Mr. TEMPLE. The phrase that "with such security, if any, as shall be deemed for the best interests," has raised a big question.

Mr. FREAR. Will the gentleman wait?

Mr. TEMPLE. Just one sentence. This authorizes the commission to accept bonds with security. Now, that certainly does not mean war bonds.

Mr. FREAR. I would prefer not to enter into further discussion at this stage. There has been a question raised here as to party regularity. I regret very much that we have gotten into a partisan discussion here even to the slightest degree. Word was sent out, as I have stated before, that I stood alone on the Republican side of the committee in my position on this bill. I have tried to perfect the bill, just like every other member of the committee wants to do; but I resent the idea that anyone, I care not who he is, can make a political proposition of a bill of this kind. I believe we have certain duties under the Constitution that we can not avoid, and I object to the party lash being cracked over me to compel me to vote for things until we have given them due consideration. If it comes from a convention of my party, I may consent to it, but I do object to anyone saying to me that I must forego my own judgment on a bill of this character.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I want to thank my own committee members on both sides, and say in this case that the members of the committee made it possible—the members on the Republican side as well—to perfect and improve this bill. While I offered tentative amendments, they perfected them and improved them.

I have in my remarks given the history of these loans briefly, and I have given the judgment of a number of people who hope for cancellation or who are in sympathy with that idea. That is covered by a limitation in the House bill, although it is not contained in the Senate bill.

Mr. J. M. NELSON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FREAR. Yes.

Mr. J. M. NELSON. I want to express the pleasure that I personally feel, as the colleague of the gentleman, at his success in making this bill a practically good one. Some weeks ago the gentleman showed me, among others, his proposed amendments. I did not think they would be adopted, but the committee adopted a good many. I want to say that the bill is now a very good bill.

Mr. FREAR. It could not have been done unless the members of the committee had acted as honestly and fairly as I did; and I appreciate their cooperation.

Mr. KELLEY of Michigan. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FREAR. Yes. Certainly.

Mr. KELLEY of Michigan. I take it that the views advanced by the Secretary of the Treasury and by Dr. FESS and others relative to the incorporation of a provision respecting interest, impressed the gentleman from Wisconsin sufficiently, so that he thinks it advisable not to include limitations as to that?

Mr. FREAR. Not to include the limitation that I proposed, because it might be construed to postponement for two years. It is proposed in the suggested amendment I have read that no extension should be made at a lower rate. I believe that is a very good proposition to put in, if it is workable, and nothing suggested will interfere with its practical operation.

Mr. FAIRCHILD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FREAR. Yes.

Mr. FAIRCHILD. What is the purpose of this statement in lines 3, 4, and 5, on page 2, "or any obligation of any foreign Government hereafter received by the United States of America"?

Mr. FREAR. Well, all I can say on that is this: Section 2 was practically the resolution or bill as sent us from the Treasury Department and as reported by the Senate committee without amendment.

That is the Treasury Department's phraseology. The committee did not change that in any respect. The gentleman can form his own conclusion as to that as well as anybody.

Mr. FAIRCHILD. What does it mean? It says "hereafter received."

Mr. FREAR. "Including obligations held by the United States Government." We have certain commitments that are out at the present time.

Mr. FAIRCHILD. Is there any purpose after receiving the refunding bonds to take refunding bonds after three years?

Mr. FREAR. No. That is a matter for future consideration. The bill as amended is greatly improved, but is by no means perfect. My time has expired, and I thank you for your attention.

[Substitute bill H. R. 8762, carrying the five restricting amendments, passed the House October 24 by a vote of 199 yeas to 117 nays.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Wisconsin has expired.

Mr. OLDFIELD. Mr. Chairman, I yield three minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. LONDON].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York is recognized for three minutes.

Mr. LONDON. Mr. Chairman, this country has inherited from the war, in addition to the heavy burden of taxation, two very grave problems; one, the Far Eastern problem, the situation which arises by reason of the increase of the power of Japan; and the other, the interallied debt question.

There can not be any doubt but that this country, as well as the rest of the world, would benefit by a mutual cancellation of debts. If the associated powers took seriously the object announced by the United States in entering the European war; if the world took us seriously when we said we were going to make the world safe for democracy; that we were going to save civilization from a dangerous enemy; then we were more than two and a half years late in beginning to defend civilization. Then, for two and one-half years, we martyrized the rest of the world and fattened the plutocracy of America. Then, for two and a half years, we permitted Belgium and France and England and England's colonies to bleed while we were revelling in luxury; and they may well say, "Since you have fought together with us to save the world, to save our civilization"—I do not know whether it is worth saving; I put that in parenthetically and incidentally—"but since you have, we invite you to pay for it."

They may ask us to pay for the phraseology we employed during the war. France has lost 70 per cent of her youth in this war. Neither France nor England can possibly make Germany pay adequate indemnities for the damages caused by Germany during the war; and no matter how cruel the Versailles Conference may appear, so far as the reparation features are concerned, so far as the recovery of the actual damages inflicted by Germany is concerned, it is utterly impossible to recover a substantial part of the damages.

Of course I do not believe in punishing the Germans for having overthrown their Government. And I do not believe at all in the principle of reparations. The imposition of so-called reparations is a fraud upon the German people who acted upon our invitation to overthrow their Government.

I am sorry I have not the time to develop the subject. I want to say a word or two about the bill itself. This bill is an attempt to take the question of the settlement of $11,000,000,000—to take it out of the broad daylight of congressional and legislative action into the dark room of financial conspiracy. Ultimately it will be a couple of financiers who will determine what shall be done with these debts. Under the first clause of this bill the President may appoint five members of his Cabinet to be the commission, and if he appoints members of his Cabinet, of course they need not be confirmed by the Senate, because they have once been approved as members of the Cabinet.

Now we come to the question of the payment of the debt, and I contend that the terms of this bill as drafted are so broad as to permit a virtual cancellation of the indebtedness by permitting the commission to postpone indefinitely the time of payment. Lines 12, 13, and 14 of page 2 of the bill read that the obligations may be paid—

> In such form and of such terms, conditions, date or dates of maturity, and rate or rates of interest, and with such security, if any, as shall be deemed for the best interests of the United States of America.

The commission may make the bonds payable in 75 years, in 100 years, in 200 years, and by prolonging indefinitely the period of payment of these bonds the commission may in effect cancel them.

If there is to be a cancellation of the debt let it be by the deliberate action of Congress, the very same Congress which has raised the billions of revenue by taxing the people, and let it be done in the open.

Next we come to the question of obtaining security. All this talk of getting security from a sovereign Government is nonsense. There is no security that England would give or could give, no security that France would give or could give without surrendering its sovereignty. So far as England, France, and Italy are concerned, who owe together more than $9,500,000,000, there can be no question of security. Nor can there be any so far as Belgium is concerned, because Belgium is under the protection of England and France.

Well, then, we come to the question of getting security from the smaller nationalities. Some of the Governments have no post-office address. [Laughter.] From some of these little Governments you can get security. Of what will the security consist? It may mean a mortgaging of their revenues. It may be a pledging of their railroads. It will be a pawning of their natural resources, which means again that the financial oligarchy of this country will get control and will engage in a race with the plutocracy of other lands for the capture of the natural resources of the smaller nations. That is what it means. And then we will be asked to build bigger armies and navies to protect our investments, the investments of our plutocracy.

I can not vote for this bill. I can not surrender the power of Congress.

Mr. J. M. NELSON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LONDON. I yield to the gentleman from Wisconsin.

Mr. J. M. NELSON. How would the gentleman construct an amendment which would provide for a method of not postponing the date of payment?

Mr. LONDON. I have before me an appropriation bill wherein, in specific terms, permitting of no doubt and no equivocation, it is provided that $5,000 shall be paid to so-and-so, $2,400 to an assistant secretary, $1,600 to a clerk, 2 clerks of class 2 at $1,200, and so forth. We spend weeks and weeks in discussing in every regular session appropriation items involving $1,000. Here you permit a commission of five to take $11,000,000,000 collected from the toil of the people and to do with that gigantic sum as they please—an outrageous surrender of all the rights of Congress.

Mr. J. M. NELSON. But the gentleman has not answered my question.

Mr. LONDON. The gentleman wants to know how I would amend this thing? I would amend it by throwing it out. That is how I would amend it.

Mr. J. M. NELSON. No; but constructively, how can you prevent some action as to the postponement? If a Government can not pay, how can you prevent postponement?

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. By permitting the law to remain as it is.

Mr. LONDON. Suppose a Government does not pay you? What are you going to do about it? Are you going to fight? Are you going to war to recover the money?

Mr. J. M. NELSON. Unless there is some discretion given you would have to do that or forgive the debt.

Mr. LONDON. Whatever is to be done should be done by Congress. A proposition involving the economic stability of the world and fraught with far-reaching consequences to the peace of mankind should not be left to a commission over which neither Congress nor the people will have any control. Nor is the suggestion that the life of the commission is limited to three years of much value. As I said earlier in the day, the commission may in three years do enough mischief to last an eternity.

Mr. FORDNEY. I yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. TEMPLE] five minutes.

Mr. TEMPLE. Mr. Chairman, the most important part of this bill, of course, is the second section. The first section creates the commission, the second section gives it power. The third, fourth, and fifth sections put limitations on that power which are easily understood.

The second section authorizes the commission to refund, convert, and extend the time of payment of the principal and interest of any obligations that foreign Governments now owe to the United States—three things, either to refund, or to convert into another form of obligation, or to extend the time of payment of any obligation now owing to the United States, or of any obligation of a foreign Government which may hereafter be received by the United States, provided the obligation arises out of the World War. It includes all debts owed to the United States Government, whether for direct loans made under the Liberty loan acts or obligations growing out of the American Relief Administration, the sale of surplus supplies by the War and Navy Departments, or of wheat and other foodstuffs by the United States Grain Corporation. For the purposes set forth the commission may receive, in substitution for the obligations now or hereafter held, new bonds of foreign Governments with such dates of maturity, rates of interest, and with such security as may be deemed for the best interests of the United States.

In addition to that the commission is authorized also on page 2, lines 16 to 20—to adjust and settle any and all claims, not now represented by bonds or obligations, which the United States of America now has or hereafter may have against any foreign Government and to accept securities therefor.

That is a very broad authorization. What claims are they? In the first place they are not the amount of the loans made under the Liberty loan acts, because we have already received bonds or obligations representing all these loans and this provision applies only to claims for which we have no bonds or obligations. Neither are the claims here referred to the debts owed to the United States Government for the sale of surplus war material, because for these debts also we have received the bonds or other obligations of those Governments, and this authorization applies only to claims for which we have received neither bonds nor any other obligations.

The same line of reasoning shows that this provision does not refer to debts owed on account of sales by the United States Grain Corporation. The Secretary of the Treasury has given us a list of those obligations with the dates of the obligations and their dates of maturity.

Neither does it apply to debts due on account of the work of the American Relief Administration, for the Treasury of the United States has already received from this agency the bonds or other obligations of Armenia, Esthonia, Latvia, and other countries, amounting to $84,000,000, and the letter of the Secretary of the Treasury gives us in each case the date of the obligation and the date of its maturity.

What, then, are the claims referred to in this provision—claims which the commission is to have power to adjust and settle?

The letter of June 21, addressed to the President by Secretary Mellon, will be found in the printed hearings before the committee which considered this bill. In this letter, near the bottom of page 4, is found this sentence:

It is also of importance that the department should have adequate authority to adjust and settle—

The same language contained in the bill—to adjust and settle claims against foreign Governments which are not in the form of bonds or obligations; as, for example, the claim for cost of our military forces of occupation.

The example mentioned here indicates, then, that this provision is intended specifically to cover certain claims against Germany. The language is very broad—any and all claims * * * which the United States of America now has or hereafter may have against any foreign Government—though the general provisions of the bill apply, of course, to this matter and limit the activities of the commission to a period of three years and show that no claims are to be dealt with but such as arose out of the World War.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Pennsylvania has expired.

Mr. FORDNEY. Mr. Chairman, I yield three minutes more to the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. TEMPLE. Then there are also claims arising out of the World War. A short time ago Congress passed a resolution which was commonly called the peace resolution. It is recited in the preamble of the treaty with Germany, which was ratified the other day in the Senate. The resolution and the treaty reserve to the United States all the rights stipulated for us in the treaty of Versailles. Whether the provision I have been discussing is broad enough to refer to the commission all claims of that sort and to authorize it to make all the adjustments that will be necessary under the recently ratified treaty, I do not know. But it does include, as indicated by the Secretary of the Treasury, the claims against Germany for the cost of military forces of occupation. Now, I have no time to discuss this matter at length, but it is one of exceedingly great importance, and I call attention to it in order that you may have it in mind for consideration.

Mr. STEVENSON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TEMPLE. Yes.

Mr. STEVENSON. Does the gentleman think it would be wise to have the losses sustained by the sinking of the Lusitania and the military occupation settled by a commission without having some action by Congress on them?

Mr. TEMPLE. We have had action by Congress, and we have now a treaty, ratified in due form by the Senate. Having settled general principles by the peace resolution and the treaty, there would be nothing unusual in appointing a commission to work out and adjust the details.

Mr. FORDNEY. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. TINCHER].

FREIGHT RATES.

Mr. TINCHER. Mr. Chairman, I take the floor for the purpose of congratulating the President of the United States upon the manly stand which the press accredits him with taking in regard to the proposed railroad strike. As I understand, the President has said the railroads and railroad labor must comply with the orders of the Government agencies or be outlaws. This is the commendable stand in which at last the Chief Executive of this Nation has decided that the hundred million people not engaged as operators, employees, or owners of railroads have some rights in this great public question.

It will be remembered that the long session of the Sixty-sixth Congress adjourned about the 5th of June, 1920, and it is still fresh in the memories of most of us that at that time the deflation policy was on, and that farm products were on the downward grade, and that the so-called deflation as a policy of the then Secretary of the Treasury, Mr. Houston, was a fact. Still, in the face of that, on July 20, 1920, came the Labor Board's decision, granting not only an increase of wages but dating that increase back, making it retroactive. Every good thinking man knew when he read of that action on the part of the Labor Board that it was absolutely improper, and that those two agencies of our Government, namely, the Secretary of the Treasury and the Labor Board, were working at cross-purposes. Most Members of Congress were at home. I live in a little town that has a railroad division. Times were hard there. In fact, the railroad employees of that town were the best paid labor in the town before the raise. They had more ready cash than any other labor, and they would be affected less by the deflation that was then a part of Mr. Houston's program than any other class of men.

I said then, and I still claim, that that order made the 20th of July, 1920, was made for political purposes, that it was an order that was striking at the very foundation of our Government. Prior to the presidential election of 1916 we had had the notorious and now considered infamous Adamson Act; and then on the eve of the election of 1920 we had this order, which every good thinking man knew could only bring trouble for our Government, and which, apparently, did not even have the desired effect of bringing votes to the Democratic Party.

Any man who has had any experience with labor at all knows that to raise an efficient man's wages for the performance of a given work is easy, but to lower that same efficient man's wages for performing that same line of work, even though the lowering of the wages may be necessary by the conditions and the times, is one of the hardest things in the world to do and have any good feeling between employer and employee. When we stop to look back upon the wage raise of July, 1920, and the simultaneous raise in freight rates, not only to cover the wage increase but still beyond that, we wonder how anyone can justify it, and the result of that act was just as apparent to every good thinking man on that day as it is to-day.

Personally, I have never favored the Labor Board. I have never believed that it was a practical matter of business to have one board fixing wages and another board fixing rates. Surely, that objection is apparent now, as undoubtedly if the Interstate Commerce Commission had had the power to fix wages as well as rates it would not have had the nerve to have decreased the wages and still permitted rates that are improper and unjust, and that are destroying the business and commerce of this country, destroying the production of the country, to have remained.

I do not propose in this matter to follow Mr. BLANTON, nor do I propose to follow Mr. BURKE. They each represent a radical view. I believe from the President's expression, as reported by the press, that I will be able to follow him; and if I am any judge of the sentiment of this Congress, the railroad men and the railroad owners can be sure of two things—first, there will be no more Adamson Acts, or anything akin to them; second, freight rates are going to come down so that the commerce of this country can be carried on. Freight rates are going to be equalized; the people of the producing middle section of this country are tired of paying rates that are enabling the railroads paralleling waterways to destroy legitimate traffic on those waterways. There has been an awakening; the Interstate Commerce Commission should see it. People are beginning to realize that they are following in the footsteps of the railroads and permitting these gross inequalities in rates. We have had an idea in Kansas, and have been putting it into law, that the masses have an interest in such controversies.

In my judgment there will be no railroad strike. The men have voted, as I understand it, to put the power to strike in the hands of their leaders. I think the men have taken a desperate chance. A strike on the part of the brotherhoods, tying up the commerce of this country at this time, would arouse no sympathy upon the part of the public. The men know that, and I believe these leaders do. This Congress will not be held up by either the operators or organizel labor. The hundred million citizens interested though not connected with transportation have rights, and those rights will be considered by the present administration.

I am not on the Interstate and Foreign Commerce Committee. We have able representatives of the people on that committee. I do not like to suggest to a committee whose duty it is to originate these matters what they should do. I will say, however, that I believe that if this committee would decide to-morrow that an antistrike law was necessary or proper, the Congress would pass it. The American people will not tolerate the present freight rates, but the American people will proceed in an orderly, legal, and fair manner, within the law, and depend upon their Government for this adjustment. The American people will not tolerate the proposed strike. They will proceed, however, within the law, and depend upon the Government. Any organization that defies the Government at this time, defies law, will simply be courting its own downfall. A hundred million people in the United States are struggling now to get along on a prewar basis in their business. The railroad owners and organized labor should take this fact into consideration, and if they refuse to do so we, the representatives of that hundred million people, must do so.

Mr. FORDNEY. There will be only one more speech. Will the gentleman from Mississippi occupy the balance of his time?

Mr. COLLIER. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. TAGUE].

Mr. TAGUE. Mr. Chairman, I wish to say, as a member of the Committee on Ways and Means, that the question of partisan politics in this matter is the furthest thing from the mind of any member of the committee. There is a difference of opinion as to just how the details of our loans to foreign nations should be settled, and the question should not be political in any way, shape, or manner. I realize that during the war we did a great many things we would not have done under ordinary conditions. We were at war. There was a great emergency existing, and we gave to the powers in control in the management of the war authority never thought or heard of before, and no doubt we would do so again under the same conditions. But those days have gone by. Now the question is in the settlement of the debts that are owed to this country—not how much they are or how contracted. The debts are before us, and the question is how they are to be settled and under what conditions. I am opposed to this bill, first, because I believe it gives to this commission powers greater than are given to the President of the United States. They have the power to do as they please almost in the settlement of these debts, and they are responsible to no one except the President of the United States, who appoints them.

We are the body elected by the people to appropriate money, and we appropriated this money. We went before the country and we said to every man and every woman and child in this country, "Buy Liberty bonds; they are worth 100 cents on the dollar"; and we promised that these Liberty bonds would be paid when due at the rate of interest specified on the bonds. Now, what are the conditions? We then loaned this money borrowed from our people to our Allies to help carry on and win the war. The money is now due and we find many of the countries unable to pay. It is true that over 90 per cent of these debts is owed to us by four or five countries, and perhaps some of them are not in a condition to pay even the interest on the debts. Under such conditions we do not intend to do anything to cause embarrassment; rather do we want to help further. I am not so sure, however, but that some of them are in a position to pay at least the interest on the debt. In the daily papers we read of the great amount of money being spent and the work that is being done by Lloyd-George and the other British statesmen in building up their business in countries all over the world. The gentleman from New York [Mr. FISH] this morning said that they had loaned to Argentina $50,000,000. What for? For the purpose of getting their trade. A few days ago Lloyd-George asked for an appropriation of £10,000,000 to assist in solving the problem of unemployment. Why, we have men walking the streets of this country in every city and town unable to get employment, yet because of our enormous debt we are unable to help our unemployed. Therefore our unemployed remain idle and in want, while everything possible is being done by Great Britain to assist and secure employment for their people.

We promised our soldiers and sailors of the war that we would give them a bonus, and this House passed a bill to do so, but that bill was sidetracked in the other branch because the country, on account of its debt, was not in a position to pay that bonus; at least, such was the excuse.

Great Britain has paid a bonus to their soldiers and sailors, something that we are unable to do, yet they are not able to pay the interest on their loans from this country.

This country has practically stopped all work in the way of building and even repairs of our Navy, yet Great Britain keeps on building up their navy.

We have reduced our Army to the lowest possible size because of our debt, while Great Britain still maintains her large army on the money she owes this Government.

Yet you hear Members stand up here and say that they are willing to wipe out this debt, made up of the hard-earned money of the working people of this country, many of whom are to-day in want and who can not secure 90 per cent of the amount of their investment which they freely and gladly gave to help win the war.

This is one of the most important matters that has come before this body, and I contend that we have no right to vote to give any commission or set of men the power to settle, as they may see fit, the question of the payment of debts due us.

It is part of our duty as the direct representatives of the people of the country, if we are worthy of that trust, to face this question as we have faced all other questions.

I believe that there is sufficient power in the Liberty loan acts to allow the Treasurer of the United States to make settlement of these debts without this bill, but if we are to have a new bill, it should be provided with a section that would require the commission to report their findings and recommendations to the Congress before final settlement will be made.

Mr. COLLIER. Mr. Chairman, I would like to know how the division of time stands.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Mississippi has 47 minutes.

Mr. COLLIER. I will yield five minutes to the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. QUIN]. [Applause.]

Mr. QUIN. Mr. Chairman, I do not presume that this measure is any surprise to any Member of this House, after witnessing the shameful spectacle of the enacting of the Fordney tariff bill and the so-called "great tax bill" which would oppress the American people. After those two performances on the part of the Republican majority of this Congress it is necessary to come forward and hit the people of this country under the belt. This is a bill to refund the debts that the foreign Governments owe the United States of America, giving power to the Secretary of the Treasury and four associates to be named as a commission by the President of the United States—to do what? To take $11,000,000,000 that is owed to the taxpayers of the United States and juggle it at any interest rate they may see proper, to accept any class or kind of security, so called, that they may see proper to accept for the taxpayers of the United States. To whom is this august commission obliged to report? To no one. The Congress of the United States, the representative of the people, had these bonds issued by special acts, and we taxed through the Congress of the United States the people of this country to raise the interest on $11,000,000,000 that the Governments of Europe owe us to-day and are not even paying the interest. I want to see our Government collect every dollar of that money in the proper manner.

The Congress authorized the loans and the Congress should supervise the refunding and the collection of them.

The Congress is the legislative body. Why should any of this legislative power be vested in a commission of five people over whom the Congress could exercise no power whatever?

This bill that the majority proposes, and which I assume they will put through this House, takes away from the representatives of the people any kind of control or consideration of the collection of that $11,000,000,000, and takes the power of control from the 110,000,000 people of this Republic and centralizes it into the hands of five men, responsible to whom? Not to the people of this Government, not to their representatives, not to either branch of Congress to even review it. I can not see in a democracy, in a republic that is presumed to be a representative government, how Congress can invest such power in the hands of a few. Gentlemen, it must be the work of some invisible government that is pushing this scheme through this House. Can you believe it comes before this Congress with clean hands? Why should not the Congress of this Republic have the right to review the report of those five men, the commission created in this bill? Why should the people of this country be divested of that power and have it placed in the hands of five men? In my mind, Wall Street, with its tentacles stretching from one end of this country to the other, unlimited in power with the international bankers of Europe and America, would revel in a carnival and saturnalia of high finance in a scheme that would be a blot on the Congress of the United States, which is presumed to safeguard and protect the interests of the people. I think this bill should be defeated. The Congress of the United States should have the power to review, accept, or reject any kind of deal that this commission might make. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. COLLIER. Mr. Chairman, I yield the remaining portion of the time allotted to me to the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. GARRETT.] [Applause.]

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, a number of years ago in one of the States with which I am somewhat familiar there was a very spirited contest over the election of a governor. The legislature which was to serve during his administration and his administration was to be charged with the duty and responsibility of refunding the debt of the State. The opposition to one of the candidates for governor stressed very earnestly an insistence that he was not a business man and that he ought not to be charged with the responsibility that a governor would have to bear in the refunding of the State debt. He replied to this by saying, in substance: "My fellow citizens, I resent that charge more than any charge that has been brought against me. I know what refunding a debt is. It is to take up an old note and give a new one, and I have had half a century of personal experience in that line of activity." [Laughter.] This amused the people of that State, but it so happened it did not appeal to their judgment when election day came.

Now, this bill which we have before us is not one to be dealt with trivially. I do not wish to speak in terms of exaggeration, but I feel safe in saying that this Congress will not have before it any proposition of larger portent or of greater magnitude than that which is involved in this bill. Your tax bill, which is in the slow process of being formed; your tariff bill, if you ever reach it to pass it, are to affect taxpayers of the future. If mistakes are made in them an early opportunity will be presented for the correction of those mistakes. But what have we here in this bill? We have loaned to other nations of the earth, let us say, in round numbers, $10,000,000,000. That is money that has been already raised.

From where did that money come? It came from all classes and kinds of people. It came from the millionaire; it came from the washerwoman; it came from the wealthy; it came from the children of the poor. Politics in this matter? There ought not to be. Peoples of all political faith contributed to this fund—Republicans and Democrats and Socialists—and all alike. As a Representative in the Congress which provided it, I voted for the legislation essential to raise those funds in the manner in which they were raised. I voted to give the authority to the Secretary of the Treasury to take the funds thus raised from millionaire and washerwoman, from business man and school child, and loan it to those with whom we had become associated in the war.

I do not believe, Mr. Chairman, that my responsibility as a trustee of this fund ended there. Being still a Member of the Congress of the United States, I for one feel that the responsibility rests upon me, in common with all my fellow Members of this House, to follow that fund in so far as it is legislatively possible and have a say in what shall be done in regard to the final settlement.

Politics? Indeed, no. We have not attempted to play politics here. It does happen that the minority report is signed only by members of the minority party. But that does not make this a partisan question. All of us would delight in the final and just settlement of these debts. We Members of the House are the trustees of an express trust. The responsibility, to my mind, rests with peculiar force upon this body, because under the Constitution of the country the House of Representatives is charged with the origination of revenue legislation.

Mr. Chairman, I have no patience with the suggestion that a vote against this measure can by any possibility be construed as a reflection upon the Secretary of the Treasury or any commission that may be appointed. With all possible respect to gentlemen who offer the suggestion that if we withhold the power which the Secretary of the Treasury seeks we are expressing a lack of confidence in him, that is the merest pettifoggery. It is not a lack of confidence. It is not a question of individual integrity. It is a question of the division of the powers of this Government. This measure proposes to commit to the commission, of which the Secretary of the Treasury shall be the head, not merely matters of administration, not merely matters of executing notes or accepting bonds and issuing receipts, but it proposes to commit to them broad questions of policy going to the very fundamentals of national indebtedness, questions which ought to be determined by the legislative branch and by the legislative branch alone.

It is necessary by reason of some things that have been said here—as it would be proper under any circumstances—to briefly recite the history of these loans. I had never heard before to-day the allegation, or, so far as I can remember, even the intimation, that the Secretary of the Treasury who happened to be then in office, in complying with the authority given by Congress to make loans to the foreign nations, had violated the act of Congress. Not until to-day, when it was intimated by the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. FORDNEY] and by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. LONGWORTH] that they believed Mr. Secretary McAdoo had violated the spirit if not the letter of the law, have I ever heard even a suggestion to that effect.

In the interest of the truth of history I declare there is no foundation for such an intimation; not alone as a matter of defense of the integrity of the then Secretary of the Treasury, but for the credit of my country I dispute that allegation. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

The Secretary of the Treasury, Mr. McAdoo, performed a service such as no other Secretary of the Treasury in history, not even Alexander Hamilton, ever surpassed. Never before during wars were the finances of the Government handled so well. During the war of secession, when the administration sought to finance a Government fighting for its existence and bonds were issued as a matter of necessity, agents of the large financial interests were called into conference, were employed by the Government, and were paid large commissions to place those Government obligations in the hands of the people, and in many instances the obligations were sold at a discount. When this last war came the Secretary of the Treasury, Mr. McAdoo, handling five times, aye, ten times, as I remember it, the amount that was handled during the great war of secession, went forth himself to the people of the country and sold every bond for 100 cents on the dollar. [Applause on the Democratic side.] It was a great work that he performed. He had the assistance not alone of those in his own office; he had the assistance of substantially every Member of the Congress,

Democrat and Republican, and he had the assistance of private citizens everywhere. But back of the entire movement, back of all that was done, he stood as the organizer of the force, and to him is due everlasting credit for the magnificent service which he thus rendered his country. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

The gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. STEVENSON] has already pointed out to the House that the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. LONGWORTH] read only a part of the law under which he brought this indictment against the former Secretary of the Treasury. I do not wish to take up the time in repeating, but let it be said here that the gentleman from Ohio did read only a sentence from section 2 of the act of April 24, 1917, and omitted to read from section 2 of the act of September 24, 1919.

Mr. LONGWORTH. I read the entire act, the first one.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. But the gentleman did not read the second.

Mr. LONGWORTH. With the comment that they did not extend the powers beyond that to the second.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Without reading—it is set forth in the minority report, and I do not want to take up the time—let gentlemen read the second act, the act of September 24, 1917, supplemental to the act of April 24, 1917.

Now, I understand that these loans were made in this way: A nation, say, for illustration, Great Britain, would go to the Treasury Department through a commissioner, or through the British Ambassador, and would say, "To meet our obligations we desire to obtain so much," let us say, for illustration, a billion dollars. Thereupon the Secretary of the Treasury would take from the agent or ambassador an obligation. And bear in mind that law does not say that the Secretary of the Treasury must accept bonds. Do you suppose that it was contemplated by the Congress of the United States that they should have bonds, gilded and printed, and ready to deliver? I do not think so. It says "obligations." I have always thought a promissory note or a due bill or I O U was an obligation. It goes further and says that that obligation must comply with the law and the terms of the law.

What happened? Having signed the obligation, the ambassador or the representative, whatever he might be, would be assured that there was placed to the credit of that country upon the books of the Treasury a billion dollars, if that was the demand, and from time to time that fund would be paid out; not all at once.

Now, how could the Secretary of the Treasury, complying with the law, have required a specific bond at the time the commitment was made? He could not. He could not determine the rate of interest. The law said it should not be less than the money cost the United States. If the money cost the United States 3½ per cent, he had the power to loan it at 3½ per cent; but he could not tell when this entire billion dollars was to be paid, or from what particular fund raised by sale of Liberty bonds that money so loaned the foreign Government would come. Some might come from the first issue; some might come from another issue in the future, the interest rate of which might not yet be determined by the Congress.

The Secretary of the Treasury accepted the obligation, and he wrote into that obligation the terms of the law. The Secretary of the Treasury in his annual report for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1920, gives us a specimen copy. He states that all of the obligations are of the same general character. He says, "The following is a skeleton copy of an obligation received under the fourth Liberty bond act," and even at the expense of time I wish to read it in full. I read:

CERTIFICATE OF INDEBTEDNESS.

The Government of (name of foreign Government), for value received, promises to pay to the United States of America, or assigns, the sum of (number of dollars in words) on demand, with interest from date hereof at the rate of (rate per cent) per cent per annum. Such principal sum and the interest thereon will be paid without deduction for any (name of foreign Government) taxes, present or future, in gold coin of the United States of America of the present standard of weight and fineness at the Subtreasury of the United States in New York, or, at the option of the holder, at the Treasury of the United States in Washington.

This certificate will be converted by the Government of (name of foreign Government) if requested by the Secretary of the Treasury of the United States of America at par with an adjustment of accrued interest into an equal par amount of (rate per cent) per cent convertible gold bonds of the Government of (name of foreign Government), conforming to the provisions of acts of Congress of the United States known, respectively, as second Liberty bond act, third Liberty bond act, and fourth Liberty bond act. If bonds of the United States issued under authority of said acts shall be converted into other bonds of the United States bearing a higher rate of interest than 4¼ per cent per annum, a proportionate part of the obligations of the Government of (name of foreign Government) of this series acquired by the United States under authority of said acts shall, at the request of said Secretary of the Treasury, be converted into obligations of said Government of (name of foreign Government), bearing interest at a rate exceeding that previously borne by this obligation by the same amount as the interest rate of the bonds of the United States issued upon such conversion exceeds the interest rate of (rate of this obligation) per cent, but not less than the highest rate of interest borne by such bonds of the United States.

——— ———,

(Signature of representative of foreign Government.)

For the Government of (name of foreign Government).

Dated the ——— day of ———.

Mr. SINNOTT. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Yes.

Mr. SINNOTT. I did not understand the gentleman to read any provision so far as concerns the payment of interest annually. Am I correct in my understanding that that does not provide for that?

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. That specific provision does not appear here. Of course the acts are cited here, and the gentleman knows that the law is a part of the contract.

Mr. SINNOTT. Does the act require the payment of interest annually from foreign Governments?

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. I do not for the moment remember. I have the act here before me. I do not think that provision is in there.

Mr. TEMPLE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Yes.

Mr. TEMPLE. Do not the acts require that the obligations of foreign Governments shall have such dates of payment of interest and such dates of maturity as the obligations of the United States?

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. I think they do; yes; and undoubtedly the language in this skeleton which has been read here would be sufficiently broad to cover it.

Now, I want to get to the interest question for a minute——

Mr. LONGWORTH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Certainly, I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. LONGWORTH. The gentleman does not consider that the word "obligation" means a bond, but thinks it means any sort of note of hand. Why, then, was there added in the proviso at the end of section 2 of the first Liberty loan act the provision—

That the authority granted by this section to the Secretary of the Treasury to purchase bonds as aforesaid from foreign Governments as aforesaid shall cease upon the termination of the war between the United States and the imperial German Government.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. The gentleman probably can answer that question better than I, because he was a member of the committee that drew this act.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Precisely; and we intended that bonds should be taken as security.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Does the gentleman mean that the committee intended that nothing but bonds should be taken?

Mr. LONGWORTH. Surely.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Then why did you use the word "obligation" in the first part of the act? Why did you not confine it exclusively to "bonds" there?

Mr. LONGWORTH. In order to remove any doubt we put in the word "bonds" in the proviso. That was the intention of the Congress at the time, and was so admitted by every Democratic member of the Committee on Ways and Means.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Does the gentleman think it would have been possible for the Secretary of the Treasury to require bonds in every instance at that time?

Mr. LONGWORTH. I do.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Let me call the attention of the gentleman to matter which he quoted this morning. One of the very reasons—and there were very few given, I must say, by the Secretary of the Treasury—why he desired this power was that the securities taken, if he were to take them under existing law, would not be in as good form for the purposes of our Government, because, he said—

The authority there is so restricted that it makes it very difficult. Our securities taken from England, for instance, would be split up, and some of them bear one rate of interest and others bear another rate of interest, because the rates of interest were different under the several Liberty loan acts, and we would have to follow each particular act for the settlement of that part of the claim.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Surely.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. If the present Secretary of the Treasury can not do that without confusion, how much more confusing would it have been if the then Secretary of the Treasury, notwithstanding the committee had said to him that he might take obligations, and had used the express word "obligations"—if he had gone to this proviso and said that "because it says after the war I shall not buy bonds, therefore

I am confined in the whole text to the act merely to buying bonds and split these matters up."

Mr. LONGWORTH. Certainly. The word "heretofore" referred to the first part of the act, which provided that bonds must be taken.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. If that was in the committee's thought at the time, why the committee did some very loose drafting.

Mr. LONDON. Will the gentleman yield just a moment?

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. I yield to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. LONDON. I see in the act of April 24, 1917, as well as in the act of September 24, 1917, wherever any reference is made to foreign obligations they use the word "obligations" instead of "bonds."

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Throughout.

Mr. LONDON. Throughout the act.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. And in that same connection let me call attention to the proviso in the act of September 24, 1917. I do not see anything about bonds there. What the act of Congress said there was:

Provided, That the authority granted by this section to the Secretary of the Treasury to establish credits for foreign governments as aforesaid shall cease upon the termination of the war between the United States and the Imperial German Government.

Let me ask the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. LONGWORTH] if it was the intention of the committee, by putting in the first act a proviso using the word "bonds," that the Secretary of the Treasury should be confined to taking bonds alone, if that was the full thought of the Ways and Means Committee throughout, why was it that when they came to write the proviso in the act of September 24, 1917, they disregarded the word "bonds" and said "to establish credits?" Ah, my friend from Ohio does not recall distinctly what was in the minds of the committee at that time.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Will the gentleman yield just a moment?

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Certainly. I yield to the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. LONGWORTH. When Mr. Davis, who was Assistant Secretary of the Treasury, appeared before the Ways and Means Committee—I read again from the unpublished hearing—I asked him this question:

Mr. LONGWORTH. Take a concrete example. Our first loans to the Allies were provided with the 3½ per cent Liberty loan. In return for that we were under the law to get a 3½ per cent bond of the same kind as the one we issued.

Mr. DAVIS. That is true.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. If I understand this matter correctly, there is a distinct understanding on the part of the foreign nations that they will pay at least 5 per cent on these obligations, and there has never been any complaint about it.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Yes; but Mr. Davis admitted that under the law we should have received a 3½ per cent bond. He admitted that.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. The gentleman is talking about that first Liberty loan. I have not the time to continue this quarrel with the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Oh, there is no quarrel.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Then we will call it this arguing of differences of opinion as to the Secretary's act. I think the Secretary of the Treasury, Mr. McAdoo, can very safely stand upon the record that he has made. The fact is that nowhere, not from any source, has there ever come a question on the part of any nation as to the legality of any of the obligations taken by the Secretary of the Treasury, nor is there ever any likely to come.

Now, Mr. Chairman, these acts passed the Congress, as I remember it, unanimously. They gave powers to the Secretary of the Treasury. They carefully limited the exercise of these powers, and, Mr. Chairman, every power given to the Secretary of the Treasury then is possessed by the Secretary of the Treasury now. This power was not conferred on Mr. McAdoo the man; this power was conferred upon the Secretary of the Treasury. This power in its completeness was not exercised by Mr. McAdoo the man; it was exercised by at least three men, McAdoo, Glass, and Houston, and it may be continued by Mr. Mellon. It is the office, not the man, upon which this power was conferred, and Mr. Mellon has to-day every iota of power that was conferred at the time Mr. McAdoo was Secretary of the Treasury.

I assert, furthermore, Mr. Chairman, that until the time the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. FORDNEY], as chairman of the Ways and Means Committee, indicated to Mr. Glass, the Secretary of the Treasury, by letter that there was a doubt in the minds of the Ways and Means Committee as to the power of the Secretary of the Treasury to deal with interest, that no question had ever been made concerning it. And subsequently, as has been already brought out in this debate, in April, 1920, the gentleman from Michigan, after full conference with the members of the committee, advised the Secretary of the Treasury, or his successor, Mr. Glass, that the majority of the committee was of the opinion that there was no legislative bar to his proceeding.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Only so far as the postponement of interest was concerned.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. No legislative bar to proceeding along the lines that he was proceeding. The full letter of Mr. FORDNEY is here; it is in the minority report. It is as follows:

COMMITTEE ON WAYS AND MEANS,
HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
Washington, D. C., April 2, 1920.

Hon. DAVID F. HOUSTON,
Secretary of the Treasury, Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. SECRETARY: Referring further to my letter to your predecessor under date of January 19, 1920, wherein I undertook to express the opinion of the members of the Ways and Means Committee that, at the time of the enactment of the Liberty loan acts, no thought was given to the possibility of the suspension of interest payments on foreign loans and that there was no intent on the part of Congress to grant or imply such authority to the Secretary, I am instructed by the committee to state that upon further investigation a majority of the committee are of the opinion that there is no legislative bar to your proceeding with the extension plan last submitted by you to the committee, although such contingency was not in the mind of the committee at the time the legislation authorizing foreign loans was framed.

With reference to the policy of the plan, the committee feels that in such matters as these, where no legislation is pending, it is not in accordance with the best practice that standing committees of Congress should express an opinion or advise executive departments as to the course to be pursued.

In the light of the foregoing, therefore, I will be pleased to have you consider my letter of January 19, 1920, as withdrawn.

Very truly, yours,

J. W. FORDNEY, Chairman.

Mr. LONGWORTH. The Secretary of the Treasury wanted to postpone the payment of interest. That related simply to the power to postpone interest.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. The fact is that was what Mr. Glass was proposing to do and that was what he submitted to the committee, and he gave the reasons why he thought the payment of interest ought to be deferred. If the committee then felt that his actions were improper, the committee had the power, politically and numerically, to report legislation to check this action.

Mr. McFADDEN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Yes.

Mr. McFADDEN. Is it the usual custom of the Secretary of the Treasury to go to the Ways and Means Committee for an interpretation of the laws passed by Congress?

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. No; it is not. The Secretary of the Treasury, Mr. Glass, stated, in substance, that his legal advisers were of one opinion, but he said that on account of statements made on the floor of the House there still seemed to be some doubt about it, and as a matter of precaution he came to a committee controlled by an adverse political party—I do not care to inject politics into it—but he came to a committee the majority of whom he knew was desirous of destroying so far as it could every iota of his activity as administrator of the Treasury Department, and submitted the question to it.

Mr. LONGWORTH. One of the members of the Ways and Means Committee who was against deferring interest was the gentleman from North Carolina, Mr. KITCHIN.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Then, you would have had a strong aid in opposing it, stronger aid perhaps than you could have had by anyone on your side of the House. [Laughter on the Democratic side.]

Mr. FORDNEY. The gentleman does not assume that the Ways and Means Committee has authority to grant privileges to the Secretary of the Treasury with the authority of Congress, does he?

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. I do not, but I do know that the Committee on Ways and Means has the power to report legislation, and if it is privileged in character can get it up without any difficulty.

Mr. FORDNEY. That is the very thing the Secretary of the Treasury requested we do not do, and that was to have legislation. He wanted authority from the Ways and Means Committee alone that had no power to give him authority.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. He told you what he was doing; he said, "Gentlemen, I am doing this," and put all of his cards on the table. He gave out a public statement not only to the people of the United States but to the world, and for a part of which he was assailed by the British press with more vigor than any American statesman has ever been assailed. You knew what he was doing, and absolutely acquiesced in it.

Mr. FORDNEY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. I will yield to the gentleman.

Mr. FORDNEY. I do not want to bother the gentleman, but I want information. Let me say that I was quite in sympathy personally with Mr. Davis, then Secretary of the Treasury, and his request to help the Treasury Department, but I believe that every Democratic member on the committee opposed what the Treasury Department wanted, not only Mr. KITCHIN, but the entire minority.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Then, I suppose there must have been a considerable number of Republicans who were in sympathy with the administration.

Mr. FORDNEY. I was in sympathy with the purpose of the Treasury Department to get some satisfactory adjustment of that matter.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Of course, the entire upshot of the matter is this, and there is no use of going into the political features of it: The majority of the Committee on Ways and Means, whether party or numerical majority, I do not care, evidently agreed that what the Treasury Department was doing was all right, or else they would have brought in legislation to stop it.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. I will.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. I want to be fair with Mr. Davis. I was one who thought that the extension of interest was perfectly proper, and approved of what was done and what was being done in reference to it. I still think it was the best thing to do, and I do not know of any particular complaint about it.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. I think the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. LONGWORTH] and the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL] this morning both declined, when asked the direct question, to enter into any criticism of the wisdom of that transaction. As a matter of course, everyone knows——

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Tennessee has expired.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Then I will ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. FORDNEY. Mr. Chairman, I yield the remainder of my time to the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. GREEN].

Mr. TEMPLE. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, I have not time to discuss these matters which occurred in the past, and in fact I have but very little interest in them. The question is, What ought to be done under the present situation? The attitude of gentlemen on the other side has been characteristic of what they have assumed throughout all of the proceedings of this session. They openly admit that they have no plan to present. They practically concede that they do not know what ought to be done. They do not dare to make a suggestion as to what should be done, but they say that this whole matter should be brought back to them by a commission, to be determined then by gentlemen who have no ideas on the subject of what course should be pursued.

The real question at this time is, What is the best manner to proceed to collect the vast amount which is due this country at this time—debts due us from certain nations, some of whom can pay in the future but none of whom can pay now? Some may pay in the future if they work and save; otherwise not. Some, and I have in mind those so-called nomadic governments, probably never can pay no matter what their will or their purpose may be. Yet gentlemen come in here and say that we ought to bring this whole thing back to this House to determine what conditions should be applied to each one of these 19 nations; that the commission should come back in each case and ask how much time should be granted to Great Britain and how much interest should be demanded of her, and that we should take the same course with France, with Belgium, with Italy, with Austria, with Armenia.

Mr. Chairman, what is to be done in the case of Austria? Is there a gentleman on the other side, which side has been so free in criticizing this bill, who is willing to undertake to say now what ought to be done with that nation which has been characterized as the poorhouse of Europe, where wan and starving children stagger about the streets of Vienna, a nation whose treasury is bankrupt, whose money is worthless, which has not the means of supporting itself now, but which has to be aided by charity?

Is any gentleman here ready to say what ought to be done in that case? Is any gentleman ready to determine what ought to be done in the case of Armenia, the remnants of whose people walk the earth, they know not where—the few who have escaped from the murder and destruction of the Turks, without any property, without any clothing, with insufficient food? Are we to collect that debt in full, or what is to be done with them, according to the arguments of gentlemen who are so determined that this commission should be given no power?

And what kind of a commission do we propose to create? A commission that goes forth and says, "Well, we will receive any proposals that you have to make and submit them to the American Congress." What is the use of such a commission? Why not simply send a letter of inquiry? If this is done will not the debtors insist upon the same privilege of submitting our proposals to their Government? Or will they in the first instance say, "We can pay so and so; will you accept that?" Our commission would then have to reply that they did not know, that they would go back to the Congress and perhaps in a year or so be able to tell them whether that thing can be done.

Mr. Chairman, every Member of this House ought to bear in mind that after all the payment of any of these debts depends on the good faith, the intentions, and the friendly feeling of the government which owes the debt. Not any of it can be collected except with the consent of the debtors. The richest of them could not pay now, and some are so poor that no amount of force could wring payment from them.

Some two years ago and over I went abroad. I passed over the field of the Somme, every foot of which has been bathed with the blood of an English soldier. I walked along with the gentleman from Texas, whom I now see sitting in his seat, over the blood-stained region of Verdun, with its vast caverns, with its holes blown by opposing artillery, where more than 100,000 Frenchmen went to an unknown grave asserting with their last breath, "They shall not pass."

Do we owe nothing to those nations? I stood at one time before some representatives of Belgium. They had kindly said that America had saved Europe. I told them that with more truth it could be said that Belgium had saved the civilization of the world. Do we owe nothing to England, to France, to Italy, to Belgium? Are we to say now that we will not give a commission authority to even extend the interest, to remit some little penalty, to be lenient with these people who have incurred these vast debts and poured out this flood of blood in order to save the world from subjection to a military autocracy?

Mr. J. M. NELSON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. I have only 10 minutes.

Mr. J. M. NELSON. The complaint has been that this postpones the debt. Is not the situation such that there must be payment on demand, at once, or a postponment of some of it?

Mr. GREEN of Ohio. No gentlemen who sits before me but will concede that these nations can not pay this now.

Mr. J. M. NELSON. On demand.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. It must be postponed, and the question is Who will be best able to determine the extent of the postponement, the terms of the postponement, and the rates of interest? Do gentlemen think they know all of the circumstances which relate to foreign business, exchange, the resources of each country, the amount of the indebtedness, so that they are able to better judge of this matter than a commission which will specially investigate these matters? If they are, why have the commission at all? Let us either give the commission some power or dispense with it. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired; all time has expired, and the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 2. That the commission created by section 1, with the approval of the President, is hereby authorized, from time to time, to refund or convert, and to extend the time of payment of the principal or the interest, or both, of any obligation of any foreign Government now owing to the United States of America, or any obligation of any foreign Government hereafter received by the United States of America (including obligations held by the United States Grain Corporation, the War Department, the Navy Department, or the American Relief Administration), arising out of the World War, into bonds or other obligations of such foreign Government, and from time to time to receive bonds and obligations of any foreign Government in substitution for the bonds or obligations of such Government now or hereafter held by the United States of America, in such form and of such terms, conditions, date or dates of maturity, and rate or rates of interest, and with such security, if any, as shall be deemed for the best interests of the United States of America, and to adjust and settle any and all claims, not now represented by bonds or obligations, which the United States of America now has or hereafter may have against any foreign Government and to accept securities therefor.

Mr. FORDNEY. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise.

Mr. FREAR. Will the gentleman withhold that a moment so that I may have an amendment pending?

Mr. CRISP. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. CRISP. The minority has an amendment which they desire to offer at this time. If the committee now rises will it be in order to offer that amendment when the committee resumes the consideration of this bill?

The CHAIRMAN. Certainly.

Mr. FORDNEY. There is no purpose to shut off anybody.

Mr. CRISP. I did not think so, but I thought now was the time to have that settled.

Mr. FREAR. I would like to have my amendment offered and lie on the table and be pending.

Mr. TINKHAM. Mr. Chairman, I would like to offer an amendment also.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Michigan [Mr. FORDNEY] offers a privileged motion. All amendments desired to be offered will, of course, have their place just the same as if offered at this time. The gentleman from Michigan moves that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. TOWNER, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee having had under consideration the bill (H. R. 8762) had come to no resolution thereon.

LEAVES OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted as follows:

To Mr. RAINEY of Illinois, indefinitely, on account of illness in family.

To Mr. RYAN (at the request of Mr. KLINE of New York), on account of illness in family.

ELECTION OF A MEMBER TO A COMMITTEE.

Mr. COLLIER. Mr. Speaker, by direction of the minority of the Ways and Means Committee I offered the following resolution.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the resolution.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That Mr. RILEY J. WILSON, of Louisiana, be, and he is hereby, elected a member of Elections Committee No. 2.

The resolution was agreed to.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. JOHNSON of Mississippi. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is sorry, but it is too late.

Accordingly (at 4 o'clock and 50 minutes p. m.) the House, under its previous order, adjourned to meet on Monday, October 24, 1921. at 12 o'clock noon.

Mr. DIAL. Mr. President, I desire to offer a resolution and ask for its immediate consideration. I will state that it merely provides for a reprint of a public document.

Mr. PENROSE. I would like to inquire what has been presented to the Senate?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the Secretary will read the resolution offered by the Senator from South Carolina.

Mr. PENROSE. For information only.

The reading clerk read the resolution (S. Res. 158), as follows:

Mr. PENROSE. I object to the consideration of the resolution at this time, and I shall object to the consideration of any business other than the revenue bill, requiring unanimous consent, until a unanimous-consent agreement can be reached concerning a part or all of the revenue measure.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Under objection, the resolution goes over.

TAX REVISION.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 8245) to reduce and equalize taxation, to amend and simplify the revenue act of 1918, and for other purposes.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. HITCHCOCK] to the amendment of the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. MCCUMBER].

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President, I would like to perfect the amendment to the amendment by inserting after the words "calendar year 1922" the words "and thereafter." That is to make it harmonize with the McCumber amendment, which makes the reduction apply not only to 1922 but thereafter, so that my amendment will read as follows:

The rate of surtax for the calendar year 1922 and thereafter on net incomes exceeding $100,000 shall be the same as for the calendar year 1921.

Mr. President, under the existing circumstances I do not think that any reduction should be made this year or next year in the taxation of incomes. We are still too near to the war expenditures to make any such reduction desirable. It is true these taxes were put on for the purpose of raising great revenues to carry on the war, but those revenues are still necessary to maintain the present cost of Government. Our cost of Government has not returned to normal, and it is therefore too early to return to the normal on the taxation of incomes or anything else.

Confessedly we have to raise this year four or five times as much revenue as we raised for the support of the Government before the war. That is not quite as much as we had to raise during the war, but it is four or five times as much as we had to raise before the war. It can not be said, therefore, that the country has returned to normal times where wealth can expect to be relieved in any large part of taxation.

The committee have proposed small reductions in taxes on incomes that are below $100,000 a year. Those reductions are very small. They aggregate considerable because there are very many such incomes, but on any particular income the reduction is small. When it comes to incomes of $100,000 and over per year, the committee amendment proposes a very radical reduction, and that is where I differ from the committee. My amendment, while it does not affect the reduction of taxation on incomes below $100,000, proposes that as far as incomes are concerned which are over $100,000 they shall remain next year and thereafter the same as they are now. When I say "thereafter" I mean until Congress finds that the needs of the Government will permit their reduction. Of course, I do not believe that the present rate of taxation on incomes is normal nor should forever continue, but the special occasion still exists for heavy taxes on incomes.

Mr. President, we hear violent denunciation of the high rate of taxation on great incomes. I have heard owners of great incomes complain bitterly. The man with an income of $1,000 a day for every working-day in the year will denounce the tax and tell you that the Government takes from him every year perhaps $150,000. He dwells upon that fact as an enormity and an outrage. Ask him if he is able to spend the remainder of his income and he will regard it as an impertinence. The fact is that that man is enjoying something more than an income; he is enjoying a yearly increase of his capital. What he objects to is a system of taxation which puts a slight check upon the piling up of his wealth. He already has more than he can spend, and a large part of what he calls income, what we tax as income, is nothing but a capital increase which he invests in additional securities.

Take a man whose income is a million dollars a year, Mr. President—and there are a good many such—under the present law his surtax is $583,000. That seems a tremendous amount of tax for him to pay to the Government. Undoubtedly when he comes to add his State taxes and his normal tax he has less than half of his income remaining. The fact is, however, that after he has paid this large tax and his local tax such a man still has hundreds of thousands of dollars received during the year which he can not spend. What he wants is the privilege of piling it up, piling it up for his heirs, piling it up for his children, so that they may come into the world with a great unearned fortune.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Nebraska yield to the Senator from North Carolina?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I yield.

Mr. SIMMONS. I wish to say to the Senator from Nebraska that the man to whom he refers would have much less under the present law than one-third of his income remaining. Under the present law the man with a yearly million-dollar income is paying to the Government 72 per cent. It is estimated that the State taxes will average about 12 per cent, which will make his total taxes 84 per cent. Under this bill as proposed to be amended at the instance of what we call the "bloc" such a man would pay to the Government 58 per cent, to the State he would pay 12 per cent, which would make 70 per cent, while under the pending amendment he would pay more than two-thirds of his entire income.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. My experience is that when it comes to paying taxes in the various States the possessors of large fortunes to a considerable extent evade taxation by establishing country homes, and one device and another, so that they escape much of the State taxation which poorer people are compelled to bear. However, whatever the exact figures are, however much such a man does pay out in taxes—and the amounts are now temporarily large—he still has remaining hundreds of thousands of dollars. He does not intend to use that money as income, but he intends to use it to make other capital investments, so that year by year his fortune grows larger and larger, and as it descends from father to son it increases with the snowball process of accumulation without any particular merit.

Mr. SIMMONS. With reference to the exactions of the States, I wish to say to the Senator, while I do not know how it is with other States, in my State we levy for State purposes no property tax whatever; we raise all our taxes for State purposes by license taxes, automobile taxes, income taxes, and inheritance taxes.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I know the Senator's State is somewhat peculiar in that respect; that it differs from most States.

Mr. SIMMONS. So that the levy in my State upon incomes and inheritances is very heavy, indeed.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. But whatever the circumstances are, the man with an income of a million dollars a year has a constant accretion to his capital; he becomes richer and richer every year, just simply by the accumulation of hundreds of thousands of dollars that remain after his taxes are taken out. Mr. President, it is hard for me to sympathize with a man in such circumstances.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, will the Senator from Nebraska pardon a suggestion there?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I yield to the Senator from Missouri.

Mr. REED. As to the man who has an income of a million dollars a year, on the first $5,000 of that income he pays exactly what the individual pays who has only a $5,000 income; upon the next $5,000 he pays exactly, and no more, what an individual pays who has a $10,000 income; and upon his income—not to follow the illustration into detail—up to $100,000 he pays just what the man pays who has an income of $100,000, and so on. The highest surtax applies only to that part of the income which is in excess of the smaller brackets of the bill.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Undoubtedly that is correct, and there is a false impression existing as to that.

Mr. REED. Therefore, when we say that such a man pays a certain tax upon his income it is not a tax levied upon the whole million dollars at the high rate which is fixed, but he pays just the same rate on the smaller income that the recipient of the smaller income pays; he pays these high taxes only when his income becomes so excessive that the excessive part is reached by the high rates.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Undoubtedly the Senator from Missouri has stated the matter very clearly.

Mr. SIMMONS. And very correctly.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. But, Mr. President, there are people at this time who need not only the sympathy of Congress but they need the assistance of Congress. It seems to me strange that an effort should be made so directly to bring relief at this time to those people whose incomes are greater than they can expend, when we have in this country hundreds of thousands of people who have no income whatever this year.

Out in the West where I live there are hundreds of thousands of farmers and stock raisers who find themselves not only without any income for the current year, but find themselves this fall poorer than they were at this time last fall. They have been compelled to go into their capital, they have been compelled to go into debt in order to live. The price of their products has gone down so terribly—their corn, their wheat, their live stock and everything almost that they produce upon the farm—that they can not get for them in the market enough money to pay for the cost of production. So they have gone to their local banks—generally small banks, as we know—and borrowed money until the banks can lend them no more; and hundreds of banks in the West, finding themselves already in an embarrassed condition, are using every effort to compel those borrowers to market their products; and every time such an attempt is made to market their products, the price is reduced again and their losses are increased. They can get a mere fraction of what they formerly got for their cattle, their hogs, their corn particularly, and their wheat. Income to them is an unknown thing. They are the people we have got to sympathize with; they are the people who produce the food of this country.

I have a great many letters from my State and I know from them something of the conditions prevailing. I am not going to weary the Senate with reading any considerable number, but let me read a paragraph from a letter from a banker in what has been a rich and prosperous part of Nebraska. The paragraph reads as follows:

> The farmers, cattle men, sheep men, and cotton interests are bankrupt. Something should be done at once, and even now it is too late to save half of the stockmen and farmers. Let me hear from you, and you will oblige—

I have another letter here from a banker in the northern part of Nebraska. I will not give his name, nor the name of his bank, nor the name of the town, but will read what he says:

> DEAR SENATOR HITCHCOCK: For some time I have thought of writing this letter, but have daily put it off, hoping for some improvement in conditions; but, instead of improving, the conditions have been gradually getting worse. It does not seem to me that Congress can realize the situation this locality is in; but the truth is that, unless there is an immediate substantial raise in the price of corn, the farmers are all bankrupt, and if the farmers go there is absolutely no hope for the country banks.
> The price of oats to-day is 21 cents a bushel and the price of corn is 26 cents, and it is practically certain that new corn will start less than that.
> Now, as far as a renter is concerned, when he pays for shelling his corn, as well as the landlord's share, and pays for husking the same, he will not have enough left even to pay the interest on his obligations, let alone apply anything on the principal; and, from the landlord's side, there are very few farms which are not encumbered, and there is not a farm in this locality that will pay the taxes and the interest on the loans or come anywhere near it.
> I know you have no idea of the conditions here or the frame of mind the farmers are in. They took their medicine like good sports last year, and have worked faithfully and been very saving this year, many and many denying themselves absolute necessities in the hope of getting on their feet again; but the prices offered now have knocked the last hope from the most optimistic ones. The condition here is desperate, and nothing will save this community except an immediate advance in the price of corn. Is there any way we can get the least encouragement?

That letter is dated this month.

Then I have a communication dated October 11 from the Chamber of Commerce at Kearney, Nebr., in the middle western part of the State. The letter is addressed to me, and the writer says:

> DEAR MR. HITCHCOCK: I hand you herewith copy of resolutions unanimously adopted by the 420 members of the Kearney Chamber of Commerce at their regular meeting Monday, October 10, 1921. As outlined in the resolutions, we hope for your hearty consideration on this most important problem. I might also add, the situation in Nebraska is quite serious.
> Yours, very truly,
> MRS. ESTHER STOCK KROGER, Secretary.

Here is the resolution:

> KEARNEY CHAMBER OF COMMERCE, October 11.
> The following resolution was offered and adopted unanimously by the Kearney Chamber of Commerce Monday, October 10, 1921:
> "Whereas prices of agricultural products have fallen far below the cost of production; and
> "Whereas bankruptcy and financial ruin are confronting the farmers of this State unless immediate steps can be taken to relieve the situation: Now, therefore be it
> "Resolved by the Kearney Chamber of Commerce, That the Representatives and Senators from Nebraska be urged for the time being to lay aside other matters, and to immediately promulgate and press legislation that will save from financial bankruptcy the farmers of this State.
> "Resolved further, That a copy of this resolution be sent to the Congressmen and Senators from Nebraska by the Secretary of the organization."

Mr. President, Nebraska is a fruitful State, a State that produces enormous quantities of the animal food and the grain food that the world needs, and the farmers have worked hard this year. One of those letters says they have denied themselves everything, and yet, after a second year of hard work, in desperate circumstances, they find that the product of their year's labor will not sell even for enough to repay to them the cost of producing it. You talk under these circumstances of changing your legislation so as to take the taxes off of men who have $200,000 a year or $300,000 a year or half a million dollars a year or a million dollars a year! These farmers are the people that need attention, these people who are producing for the country, and not the people who have these great incomes; and yet, in saying that, I am not one who can be called a socialist. I am not one who is in favor of spoliation of the rich just because they are rich; but I say it is the duty of these rich people, who have incomes greater than they can consume, greater than they can use, to continue to bear for a time, at least, the burdens which have grown out of the war.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President—

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. CUMMINS. I have a great deal of sympathy with the views expressed by the Senator from Nebraska, generally speaking, and I do not want the inquiry that I am about to make to be construed into any hostility to his view; but this is what is bothering me: I have not taken any part so far in either the formation or the discussion of this bill. The Senators who favor a reduction in the rate of taxation upon the large incomes defend their position by insisting that the reduction in the rate of taxation upon the large incomes is not in order to help the men who have the large incomes but in order to help the very people of whom the Senator from Nebraska is speaking, namely, the men with no incomes or with small incomes. I have not heard all the discussion, but I have not had the opportunity to hear anyone who is seeking to maintain the present rate of taxation upon high incomes, or to increase it, discuss that view of the case; and I want the Senator from Nebraska, in whose economic judgment I have great confidence, to say something before he concludes with respect to the contention made by the members of the Finance Committee.

Will a reduction of taxation upon high incomes help the laboring men of the country? Will it help the farmers of the country, who have at this time, at least, no income? Will it help those who are really suffering the distress which we now experience?

That, I think, is the real proposition here. It is not because these men of high incomes ought not to bear, equitably speaking, the rate of taxation which has hitherto been imposed upon them, but it is because it is alleged—and I am not satisfied with regard to the proposition—that if they are relieved from this taxation to a degree, that will have a tendency to bring up the prices of agricultural products, that it will have a tendency to increase the production of the country in a manufacturing way, and that it will have a tendency to put to work a vast army of men who are now unable to find employment of any kind.

That is the phase of the situation which I should like to hear discussed on the part of those who are against this reduction, because I think that is the critical and the crucial question involved in the bill which is proposed by the committee.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, will the Senator pardon me if I make a suggestion—that the assertion that taking the taxes off those who enjoy every large income will benefit the men who enjoy no incomes is a proposition that ought to demand the proof from the man who makes the assertion. He ought to show the fact. The burden certainly is on him.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, if I may reply for a moment to that, that is a matter of the future, and it depends upon the judgment of men. The judgment of Senators ought to be as good as the judgment of anyone else with respect to such a subject, and I want the Senator from Nebraska to give some attention to it.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. That is a fair question, and I shall take it up in a fair way. I should like, before I do so, to read extracts from another letter along the line of those I have already read. This is a letter just received, and I will simply read extracts from it. This correspondent of mine, who is a farmer, says:

> Permit me, as a plain, ordinary, hard-working Nebraska farmer who has been practically made a bankrupt along with thousands and thousands of other poor devils of farmers who have been exploited by economic reformers and uplifters both in and out of Congress until we are flat broke—permit me to say—

Now, I will read extracts:

> At central and eastern Nebraska points we are offered 16 to 18 cents for new corn. December corn in Chicago is 48 cents, which means that it takes 2 bushels of corn to pay the freight and commission of 1 bushel, and then we can buy 3 tons of soft coal for $15. After we pay the sheller, we can get a ton of very ordinary coal for 3 tons of good shelled corn delivered at the elevator, and if we should be so reckless as to want hard coal we can get it for $23 per ton. After paying 3 cents per bushel to the shelling machine, we can buy a ton of hard coal for from 150 to 200 bushels of shelled corn, according to locality.

Then he says, later on:

> I have seen good butcher cows, shipped from this town ninety miles from Omaha, bring the shipper as little as $1 per hundred.

I have read those letters, and I could read a hundred others, to show the terrible condition existing in the agricultural West among the people who have worked a solid year to produce a crop that they can not sell for the cost of production. What is true in the producing West is true in the producing South, where cotton is the chief product; and here we have this great nation with this enormous body of producers actually reaching this fall season not only without any income for this year, but poorer than they were a year ago!

Those are the people that I say should have the attention of Congress, and not the men of great wealth whom you seek to relieve from taxes in this bill—not only income taxes, which you propose to reduce for them, but you propose to take off the excess-profits taxes on the business enterprises in which they are engaged.

The Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS] asks me whether I think there is any force in the argument that the taxes on the incomes of these men of great wealth should be reduced, not for their benefit, but for the benefit of the industrial interests of the United States and the workingmen of the United States who otherwise may find themselves out of employment to a greater extent than they are now, who otherwise will not be provided with work because capital will be lacking in the enterprises which provides them with work. I consider that an incandid argument. I will not say that Senators who make it here are insincere, but I mean that every time it has originated it has come from the mouths of the very men who seek to escape taxation. Naturally, they will not come forward and ask to be relieved of taxation on the ground that they feel it too much, on the ground that it prevents them from accumulating wealth as rapidly as they otherwise would; so, in order to gain favor, they say that the rest of the country, the untaxed man, is suffering because they are taxed too much.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I know that the Senator wants to be perfectly fair in this matter, and so do I, and I want to assure him that there are two sides to this question without a doubt.

The Senator says that the man who asks this reduction in the high rates of taxation on incomes is the man who is going to be benefited by it. I do not think that Secretary Houston stood in that position. I do not think that even Secretary McAdoo, as Secretary of the Treasury, stood in that position. I do not think to-day that any Secretary of the Treasury would do it because of any personal interest he might have in it; and I assure the Senator that if I did not believe with all my soul that it can be proved beyond a question of a doubt that wherever the rates are as high as the 50 per cent bracket would be, together with the normal tax, the money will not go into industries but will find tax-exempt securities, I would not for a moment suggest such a thing.

I can not see, I say to the Senator frankly, why it should be 50 per cent. Fifty per cent will not keep this money out of tax-exempt securities any more than 65 per cent will. I can not see any reason for that change. If they are not going to have a rate which will not force it to at least give the man an equal chance if he goes in the new industry, and possibly a little more, there is no need of any change at all.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I am glad to hear the Senator admit that the proposed committee amendment will not prevent the men with great incomes from investing their money in tax-free securities. That ends one of the arguments in favor of this amendment which the Senator from North Dakota offers.

Mr. SMOOT. Will the Senator object to my stating a case which shows succinctly what will happen in the case of a man who has an investment of $12,500,000?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. SMOOT. I will make it very short, indeed. Mr. President, the man who has a capital wealth of $12,500,000 and who invests that amount of wealth in tax-free securities at 5¾ per cent would have an income of $718,750. His income, if that were invested in preferred stock at 8 per cent, would be $1,000,000. The surtaxes on the dividends from the preferred stock would be $583,510 and the net income, after the surtaxes were paid, would be only $410,000. The rate he would make upon that 8 per cent investment, if these surtaxes were imposed, would be 3.3 per cent. He can put all of that money in tax-exempt securities and get at least 5¾ per cent. Is a man going to do that? That is the whole question in a nutshell.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I have heard that argument before. It is to the effect that high income taxes on great incomes defeat themselves; that they drive big fortunes out of desirable enterprises into the refuge of tax-free bonds. To that I say, very well. When invested in tax-free bonds, capital will be limited to a return of 5 or 6 per cent, and a limitation on income in such cases is one of the desirable things to attain. The more profitable enterprises will be undertaken by those having moderate means. If the fortunate possessor of an income of more than $100,000 a year chooses to escape the high rate of taxation by selling his coal stock, or his oil interests, or his manufacturing stock, or his hotel stock, or his newspaper stock, or his bank stock, or his elevator stock, or any other form of highly profitable investment, and put his capital into State or municipal bonds, which are tax free, let him do it. His profitable holdings will be purchased by smaller capitalists not afraid of the income tax.

In this respect the tendency is to distribute the highly profitable stocks and bonds to a larger number of people. That process has been going on in recent years, since we put on the graduated income tax. To the same extent that the big fortunes have been getting rid of highly profitable stocks and bonds, small capitalists, not afraid of taxes, have been taking them over. We are decentralizing the ownership of those enterprises, and confining big capital and great fortunes more to the tax-free bonds, which yield only small incomes. Thus we have put in operation a force which tends to limit the big fortunes and big incomes. We have given to small capital access to more profitable securities.

These enterprises are not going begging. When companies can make large profits in oil, or coal, or newspapers, or hotels, or manufacturing, or mining, or any other form of enterprise, capital will be found to go into them, and if the men of great fortunes are not able to do so, and prefer to hide under the smaller incomes they derive from tax-free securities, let them do it. One of the purposes of the income-tax legislation is undoubtedly to produce some amelioration of the evil this country suffered from for years, of the centralization of wealth in the hands of the few by reason of the enormous profits they made.

The graduated income tax takes away from the wealthy man the inducement to go into great ventures where enormous profits are won at the expense of the general public. It leaves open to the more modest and more moderate incomes of the world the opportunity of investment in these profitable ventures, and confines the great wealth of the country to the smallest possible income which it is willing to receive in order to escape the payment of taxes.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, will the Senator pardon a suggestion from me?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Certainly.

Mr. REED. I do not want to interrupt the Senator's line of thought, but if it is true that the way to benefit the farmers of Nebraska and Missouri and the South is to take these taxes off very large incomes, so that the possessors of those great fortunes may rehabilitate industry and start the wheels of commerce going, if that is the right remedy, why do we not apply it? Why do we not take all of the taxes off of big incomes, and let them go out and take care of the rest of the world?

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, there is a good reason why, I will say to the Senator; but I do not want to take the time of Senators now to state it.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I want to say that this country is not suffering from lack of active capital.

Mr. SMOOT. This country is suffering, however, from having its capital invested in industries which could be developed and would be developed if it were not for the larger brackets of the income tax law.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I disagree with the Senator absolutely. This country is suffering at the present time because it produces more than it can consume, and because it must ship its surplus to the rest of the world, and because at the present time the rest of the world is not able to buy that surplus. We are suffering because we have more than half of last year's cotton crop unsold because Europe can not buy it. We are suffering because we have an enormous accumulation of copper and other raw materials in this country that Europe has not been able to buy, although she needs them, and the mines that produce that copper and other raw materials are shut down, and the men who work the mines are idle. We are suffering because the output of our manufacturing institutions at the present time, which are unable to sell the surplus which they formerly sold abroad, is reduced, and they are now operating only on 30 or 35 per cent of their capacity, and more than half of their men are out of work. We are suffering because the farm products of the West have been overmarketed, because the farmers have been forced to throw them upon the market, and the foreign demand being in an embarrassed situation and they being unable to pay, we have more farm products than the market has been able to absorb, and the price has been forced down below the cost of production.

We are suffering because the result of all these matters is that the railroads have had their business enormously curtailed, and we are suffering at the present time because the railroad rates have been put so high as to absolutely prohibit the shipment of goods to market in the Western States. That is one of the things we are suffering from. As one of these men whose letters I have read said, it takes two bushels of corn to ship one to the market in Chicago.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, will the Senator not add that one of the chief causes of our suffering is that the manufacturer and the wholesaler and the retailer are charging war prices to-day, and the farmer, the producer, is getting something less than prewar prices to-day; and we are suffering because a farmer has to sell the hide of a good steer for $1.25 and still has to pay $10 for shoes, which he ought to be able to buy for $5.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President, I have not very carefully answered the question of the Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS], but I feel in my soul that reducing the taxation upon the great incomes of the country is not going to induce any additional investments in enterprises which will employ labor. During the very highest years of the prosperity of the United States, when everything was running at the highest tension, and when production was at the highest point, we had these surtaxes. Business men paid them, and had an enormous surplus left over. They were not attempting to abandon and get out of their productive enterprises at that time, except as they found it more profitable to do so by buying tax-free securities, and when they found it more profitable to buy tax-free securities they had to sell the securities they had in profitable industries, and when they sold those upon the market, as they have upon the stock market in New York and elsewhere, they were purchased by the smaller capitalists of the country, and you have seen the ownership of the railroads get more and more diffused, you have seen the number of stockholders in the great steel trust enormously increase, you have seen the figures showing that the stocks of the Standard Oil Company have been much diffused, but for every great fortune which is taken out of those investments a hundred small fortunes eagerly go in to take the stock they dispose of. So I say there is no evil to come from allowing the smaller capitalists of the country to come into the enjoyment of these highly profitable enterprises and to compel the great fortunes to be invested in low interest-bearing securities in order to escape taxation.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator yield to the Senator from New Mexico?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I yield.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Very much has been pressed upon the attention of the Senate as to money going into tax-exempt securities. I want to offer this suggestion, demonstrating, I think, that that is not being done to the extent it is urged here.

Prior to the war, good State securities, municipal securities, and so on, were being put upon the market at a rate of 4 per cent. It is now admitted that the rate of interest upon all those securities has been greatly increased. The Senator from Utah uses the illustration of such securities bringing 5¾ per cent. I rather think the figure which he mentions is about correct. So that the rate of interest on these so-called tax-exempt securities has increased from about 4 per cent, prior to the war, to 5¾ per cent now. Does not that demonstrate that there is no undue scramble for such securities at this time? If there were such a scramble, the rate of interest would be decreased, there would be more bidders for them, and they would be willing to take them at a less rate of interest. But we find the actual fact to be that the rate of interest on all these tax-exempt securities has increased in about the same proportion as the interest on all other kinds of securities.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I think the Senator makes a very legitimate argument, but I am admitting the premises stated by the Senator from Utah and others that the effect of maintaining high tax rates on large incomes will be to drive them into tax-free securities. I say let them go, let them leave to the smaller capitalists of the country, who have moderate incomes, the use of their money in the more profitable enterprises.

Mr. SMOOT. There is another side to that question which I think I ought to call to the Senator's attention and I think he will agree with me. I never want to see the time come in the United States that a man of small means will invest all he has in these hazardous industries. When a man asks me whether he shall invest in a mining company or the development of a mining company, I say, "No; not unless you can afford to lose every dollar you put in."

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I am not talking about such companies. I am talking about the acknowledged profitable investments in the country.

Mr. SMOOT. That does not apply to the manufacturing concerns, nor is it so of general business. The industries that pay the large profits are the ones that were referred to by the Senator a few moments ago—the oil companies, mining companies, and industries of that kind. They are all hazardous in their nature, and I do not think that a man of ordinary means should invest in them.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President, we do not want to stray to that issue. That is not really the issue we are on now. One of the recognized economic evils in the country a few years ago was the pronounced concentration of great wealth in the hands of a few people. It stirred the whole country. It was recognized to be an evil. It has grown largely out of the formation of trusts and the exploitation of the great resources of the country. It was due to speculation and various other causes, but we know that we passed through an era of enormous concentration of wealth in the hands of comparatively few people. The American people were looking around for some sort of restraint upon that tendency.

That fact was one of the inducements for the constitutional amendment giving Congress the power to tax incomes. It was not altogether to raise revenue. It was one of the reasons why Congress made the tax a graduated tax instead of making it a flat rate on incomes of all sizes. It was a governmental effort to check the piling up of great fortunes by the snowball process by which a fortune grew in size as it rolled along from father to son. It was an effort to force a partial return to the public from time to time, in taxes, of the enormous fortunes taken from the general public by speculation, exploitation, monopoly, and enterprise. I believe in this principle of taxation and I always have. We must have taxes to maintain government. Taxes are a burden. Let that burden be distributed so as to fall upon the taxpayer—

First, in proportion to his ability to bear it.

Second, in proportion to the benefits which he receives from civilized society which protects his life and his property.

Third, let it fall in such a way as to put a restriction on the undue concentration of this country's capital in the hands of the few.

Mr. President, in closing, I wish to reiterate that these taxes on the great incomes are to restrain undue increase in the capital of those who enjoy those incomes. Any great income that goes up into the hundreds of thousands or millions of dollars a year means an increase of capital for that individual.

There is only a certain amount of wealth produced in the United States every year. There ought to be a fair distribution of it. Capital ought to have its fair share. There are gentlemen who are very anxious that labor should not get more than its fair share. There is a very general and popular desire at the present time to crowd down labor on the theory that it is getting more than its share. Shall we allow capital to get more than its share? Shall we allow these accumulated fortunes to grow and increase in size because they go to men who can not use them as income and who simply use them to increase the vast capital holdings which they already have?

I do not wish to be thought a Socialist, but I believe it is to the interest of the people to continue these high taxes on great incomes as long as this emergency lasts, while the country is compelled to raise four or five times the amount of revenue that it formerly raised and probably thousands of millions of dollars more than it ought to raise for the maintenance of Government. As long as this emergency lasts let the special taxes remain as they were.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to insert at the proper place in my remarks a number of telegrams from bankers and farmers in the West similar to those that I read.

Mr. PENROSE. Mr. President, I do not want to make any objection to the printing of the telegrams. I merely want to say that these hard-luck letters and telegrams can be duplicated from Pennsylvania and from every State of the Union in almost identical language.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the telegrams referred to by the Senator from Nebraska will be printed in the RECORD.

The telegrams are as follows:

Senator HITCHCOCK, Washington, D. C.

The farmers of Cheyenne County, Nebr., must have financial relief within 60 days. Decline in wheat market will break them. Kindly use your influence toward obtaining relief.

Senator GILBERT M. HITCHCOCK, Washington, D. C.

Will you use your influence to stop further demoralizing of wheat market? Unless farmers can realize more on present crop, bankruptcy will be result. Present price will not pay taxes and expenses of raising crops.

GILBERT M. HITCHCOCK,
United States Senator, Washington, D. C.

We earnestly request you take immediate steps to catch the declining market on grain. Present prices mean ruin to farmers and other lines of business.

Hon. G. M. HITCHCOCK,
United States Senator, Washington, D. C.

Do not believe you fully realize just how serious a position the farmers of the Middle West are in after deducting excessive freight rates. Farmers' products will not pay what they owe the banks, to say nothing of interest delinquent and falling due on their farm mortgages. For 30 years we have been in farm loan business. It has never been so hard to collect interest as it is to-day, and we are making no attempt to collect principal; but investors all over the country who have bought farm mortgages must have interest. Farmers can not pay under present conditions. Immediate action should be taken by the Government to stabilize prices, or our farmers will go bankrupt by thousands.

Mr. CALDER. Mr. President, I shall oppose the amendment offered by the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. HITCHCOCK]. I represent a great agricultural State. The second in the United States in the value of its production. I speak here for that great State with its 11,000,000 people.

I have received the same sort of letters the Senator from Nebraska has, hundreds of them, from farmers all over my State; from business men, from manufacturers, from workingmen, and from many men out of employment. From every phase of life in that great State I have received the same complaints the Senator from Nebraska has received from his State. I have been trying to find a way to relieve the conditions of which he complains.

It has seemed to me that if we are to hope for relief it can only come from inducing the business men of America to take the risk of business, and for that reason I differ with the Senator from Nebraska. He complains that the men who produce on the farm can not find a market for their products, and where they do it is at such low prices as to make production hardly worth while. That is true all over the country. That is true to-day in manufacturing to a large degree as well as in agriculture.

But the Senator in his remarks does not propose a remedy. He does not come to us and say, "Incorporate in this bill these ideas and it will bring relief." On the other hand, those of us who differ with him argue that these high rates of surtaxes have tended to detract from active business the means of the wealthy men of America. I live in New York City, and I have watched the development of industry there. I have noticed the effect of these large surtaxes, for instance, upon our mortgage market. I know many men in New York City who have in the past invested a very large proportion of their income—in fact, of their wealth—in mortgages upon homes and every sort of real estate. These mortgages to-day are unprofitable; because of the high taxes the investor finds himself unable to earn a return within 50 per cent of the amount he can secure from tax-exempt securities. So to-day the rich man of America is gradually withdrawing from that form of investment. In fact, they have been doing so for the last three years and are putting their money into other things with a larger and surer profit.

There are many men with money invested in all sorts of enterprises. I have in mind one particular transaction where a man could have sold a piece of property at a profit and have been able to place the results of that sale in other construction developments. He did not do so, however, because the Government would have taken away from him over 50 per cent of his profits, and with that deduction he could not replace the property at the present construction costs.

So, Mr. President, I advance the thought that if we reduce these taxes to the point that will attract capital back into active industry again it will immediately create a confidence in the business of the country that will materially remedy the conditions of unemployment of which we complain. For with our labor employed we will have a demand for the products of the farm that will stimulate business everywhere.

The executive departments of the Government have made their estimates for next year. They have carefully gone into every proposed expenditure and have eliminated every unnecessary item. A specified sum must be raised to meet our obligations. The interest on our debt exceeds $1,000,000,000. We must contribute toward the amortization of that debt. Our Victory loans must be refunded in the near future, and at the time of the refunding a portion of the principal must be paid. We must make the appropriations necessary to provide for our sick and wounded soldiers; the pension list for the Spanish and Civil Wars exceeds $250,000,000. An appropriation of $700,000,000 is needed to operate the Army and Navy. I need not refer further to the fixed expenditures of the country, because they have been discussed time and time again, but the fact is that we must raise a sum exceeding $4,000,000,000 through the taxes provided in this bill and from other sources. We can not get out of it. There is no possible way to cut down the cost of government below a certain rock-bottom figure, and means must be found to obtain revenue necessary to meet the Government's requirements.

We are met by the insistent demand that taxes be levied upon the rich and not placed upon the backs of the poor. The demagogue decries a tax levied directly upon the articles consumed by the people of moderate means; but it is a simple fact that the poor man pays his share, no matter what the method, for an indirect tax is handed down to him through adding an additional sum to the things he consumes in everyday life; and that can not be avoided.

Under the terms of the pending bill we repeal the transportation tax and many of the so-called luxury or nuisance taxes. In repealing these taxes the committee has recommended amendments which provide for a maximum surtax of 50 per cent upon incomes and a tax of 15 per cent on the net profits of corporations.

I had hoped it would be possible to fix the maximum surtaxes on the higher incomes not to exceed 25 per cent. The House bill fixed the rate at 32 per cent. The Finance Committee has raised this to 50 per cent. I am utterly opposed to the tax being increased beyond 32 per cent. Despite the opinion of tax experts, I believe that a 32 per cent tax will raise more money than 50 per cent.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. EDGE in the chair). Does the Senator from New York yield to the Senator from Ohio?

Mr. CALDER. I yield.

Mr. POMERENE. Assuming that Congress should reduce these taxes to 25 per cent in harmony with the views of the Senator from New York, out of what subject of taxation would he raise the amount which the Government would thus lose?

Mr. CALDER. I had intended to deal with that subject a little later on in my remarks, but inasmuch as the Senator has asked the question, I will say to him that I would levy a manufacturers' tax of 1 per cent, not 3 per cent as the Senator from Utah proposes, and that 1 per cent would make up the difference, in my opinion.

Mr. PENROSE. Mr. President, will the Sentor permit an interruption in answer to the Senator from Ohio?

Mr. CALDER. Certainly.

Mr. PENROSE. It is clearly demonstrated to my mind, after a very careful investigation of the matter, extending not only over the consideration of this bill but preceding revenue bills, that the 25 per cent rate would in a very few years produce a much larger revenue than the present rate. The answer to the Senator's inquiry, therefore, is that the Government would not lose money but would be better off by not trying to draw all the blood at one operation, but by taking it in a sensible, logical, and gradual way.

Mr. POMERENE. I have heard that statement made before. I realize that that is the position many students of the subject take. It may be that they are right; but it has seemed to me that when a conclusion of that kind is stated we have to accept it rather on faith than on actuality.

Mr. PENROSE. I take it, Mr. President, that it is a case where one opinion is as good as another, and I think my opinion is a little better and more fully sustained.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from New York will proceed.

Mr. CALDER. Mr. President, we are told by those who are well versed in tax matters that when surtaxes pass 32 per cent, men of large incomes withdraw their money from industry and invest it in securities not required by law to pay a just proportion of Federal taxation.

It was my privilege last year, as chairman of a subcommittee of the Senate, to make an exhaustive study of the construction industry in this country. The report of my committee indicated that the Nation needed $20,000,000,000 of new construction work. In this connection, Mr. President, I may say that this statement is agreed to by the recent unemployment conference presided over by the Secretary of Commerce, Mr. Hoover.

In that estimate was included the extension of our railroad systems, both trackage and equipment, the building of factories, the improvement of our highways, and the construction of homes for our people. I say $20,000,000,000 is needed for these purposes, for to-day many construction enterprises are halted for lack of financing at reasonable rates. The funds are not available because of the high rate of taxes upon incomes derived from industrial securities and business generally. Men and women who formerly invested in securities of this kind now invest in Federal, State, and municipal bonds which are tax exempt. This question has been discussed pro and con for the last day or two in the Chamber.

It is said that there are from fifteen to seventeen billions of dollars worth of tax-exempt bonds in the United States. A man with an income of from $100,000 to $500,000 can derive a greater net return by investing his money in such tax-exempt bonds bearing interest at 5 per cent than he could if his money were invested in railroad securities or other industrial bonds bearing interest at 10 per cent. This is particularly true as contrasted with the net return from investments in mortgages on real estate.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from New York yield to the Senator from Iowa?

Mr. CALDER. I do.

Mr. CUMMINS. Does the Senator from New York want to bring about a state of affairs in which Government bonds, State bonds, municipal bonds, and other bonds that are tax free can not be sold?

Mr. CALDER. No, Mr. President; I do not; and I am not sure that I should favor an amendment to the Constitution that would enable the Federal Government to levy the same tax upon income derived from State and municipal bonds as is levied upon other incomes. I would not do that because the States and municipalities must raise money for their improvements.

Mr. CUMMINS. I am quite in sympathy with the Senator from New York on that point. I think that all wealth ought to be taxed, no matter whether it is represented in a Government bond or in a State bond, but I think it would not be good policy to adjust the Federal taxation upon the theory that we intended to drive out of the market the bonds which may be issued by the Government and by States and municipalities.

Mr. CALDER. Mr. President, I quite agree with the Senator from Iowa; I would not do that; but I think if we levied a tax of approximately 30 per cent upon the incomes from industrial enterprises, from public utilities, and from business generally, that would afford a sufficient margin to attract an adequate supply of money to State and municipal securities and to level up the taxes derived from business enterprises and those from other forms of investment; but I shall deal with that question a little later on.

Mr. POMERENE. Will the Senator permit a further interruption?

Mr. CALDER. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. POMERENE. The Senator from New York has just said that there is a shortage of buildings, and that that is due to the fact that the rate of tax on higher incomes is such that moneyed men refuse to invest in mortgages or in other similar securities. I recognize it to be a fact that when we encourage investments of any kind we are improving the country as a whole; there can not be any doubt about that proposition; but I have not been able to get the consent of my mind to the proposition that the shortage of building funds is due to the high rate of taxation, which, of course, only touches those whose incomes fall within the higher brackets. Rather, I think the condition is due to this reason: Primarily there is a lack of building because of the high price of building material and the high price of labor. When men invest their money in mortgages or in buildings they know that ultimately there is going to be a shrinkage in the value of the buildings; they know that when a building costs 60 per cent more than it ought to cost under normal conditions, if there shall come a depression in real estate values their interests will be jeopardized.

We are all concerned in the proper housing of the laboring classes; everyone wants that done; but I do not know whether it is serving the laboring man to build a house for $3,000 that ought to be built for $1,800 and have him take that house off the contractor's hands at $3,000, thus making him pay $3,000 for a house that is worth only $1,800. I think that condition is the reason why there is a shortage of funds for the building of houses and other structures at the present time. It is that rather than the high rate of taxes which is imposed in some of these higher brackets.

Mr. EDGE. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from New York yield to the Senator from New Jersey?

Mr. CALDER. I yield.

Mr. EDGE. While the illustration of the Senator from Ohio as to the increase in the cost of construction is unquestionably correct, as showing in the case given an increase from $1,800 to $3,000, at the same time have not the wages of the men who would occupy such houses shown a proportionate increase?

Mr. POMERENE. Certainly, their wages have been increased; I realize that; but I am speaking especially of the benefit which may accrue to the man who is to buy the house; he is the man I am thinking about. It is to me a shocking proposition to ask the laboring man, who has his family to support, to pay $3,000 in installments for a house which normally would cost him only from $1,500 to $1,800.

Mr. CALDER. Mr. President, the Senator from Ohio refers to the cost of the construction of houses under normal conditions. By "normal" does he mean the cost during the period before the war?

Mr. POMERENE. No, Mr. President, I do not think that in many of the centers of population costs and prices will ever get back to what they were before the war, but they are going to drop.

Mr. CALDER. Mr. President, the cost of building to-day is about 60 per cent more than it was five years ago. The Senator has the figures about right; a building that cost $1,800 in 1913 or 1914 now costs $3,000 to erect. There are two elements that enter particularly into the increased cost of construction, namely, the cost of material and the price of labor.

In the years 1919 and 1920 building material costs were about 150 per cent higher than they were in 1914. I refer to building material generally, such as lumber, brick, plumbing material, roofing, and commodities of that kind. They are now 60 per cent higher than they were in antewar days. Material prices have dropped off at least 40 per cent below the 1920 level. They have dropped, I will say, Mr. President, more than the prices of any other commodity.

It is true that in the large centers of population—and I speak of New York City particularly, because I know the conditions there—the labor costs continue at the very highest point. To-day we are paying masons, plasterers, and carpenters as high wages as were being paid to them at the peak of labor costs during and since the war. I doubt very much if we can hope for some years to reach much lower material costs, and I am speaking particularly of lumber, brick, and cement, the three principal commodities that enter into construction. We may, Mr. President, have lower labor costs, but I doubt if we will have much lower labor costs until the commodities which labor has to buy for its wage are reduced in price.

I repeat, in answer to the Senator from Ohio, that I believe one of the greatest contributing causes, if not the greatest—and it is even greater, in my opinion, than the high wages and high material costs—which is retarding building is the lack of sufficient financing. In New York and other large cities where I have had occasion to look into the matter, I find plenty of money for mortgages of $3,000, $4,000, and $5,000 on improved real estate, but very little or no money for mortgages of $50,000, $75,000, $100,000, and $500,000 for the larger building developments, which house so many families and which give employment to so many men.

In my own State the law forbids the charging of more than 6 per cent interest on mortgages. Under these conditions a man with an income of $500,000 only nets about 2 per cent, as against over 5 per cent derived by the purchase of State, city, or Federal bonds, and with the latter he has no difficulty, except to draw his interest when it becomes due.

Now, with a maximum 32 per cent income tax we arrive at a point when it is really not profitable to invest one's money in tax-exempt bonds as against industrial or public utility bonds drawing 7 or 8 per cent.

I can not understand how Senators can take the ground that the reduction of surtaxes to 32 per cent takes the burden from the backs of the rich and puts it on the poor. After all, the man of moderate means, the working man, and the business man with an income which is practically all spent for living expenses finds himself meeting the entire burden of taxation, while the rich man manages to evade most of it. Another material factor in this situation is the fact that many of these investments in Federal, State, and municipal securities are for nonproductive improvements, such as the construction of courthouses and many other public improvements. A million dollars spent in constructing a courthouse, while desirable and often quite necessary for the proper and convenient conduct of public business, is just so much money invested without bringing in a return.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator a question?

Mr. CALDER. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. NELSON. The Senator a moment ago referred to the rich, and intimated that it was easy for them to evade taxation. Can the Senator explain why the rich have a disposition to evade taxation on all occasions? Does not that indicate a certain species of moral depravity?

Mr. CALDER. Oh, Mr. President, I can not agree with that statement. If the rich sought to evade taxation during the war, perhaps we might accuse them of that; but I venture the statement that, perhaps, with the exception of the distinguished Senator from Minnesota, there is not a Senator in this Chamber who does not try to pay just as little taxes to the State, to the city, and to the Federal Government as he can legally do.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, the Senator has just indicted the Senate. I wonder if he will apply that to the country generally, or does he think that Senators are worse than the remainder of the population?

Mr. CALDER. Why, Mr. President, of course I think that, with the possible exception of myself, Senators are more patriotic when it comes to paying taxes than any other people. I think that every man and every woman in America pays just as little taxes as he or she possibly can in these times of peace, and that they maneuver in every way to get out of paying taxes when they can do so legally.

Mr. President, money invested in mortgages on real estate and the development of our railroads, or, in fact, in any going business, has an earning capacity from the very minute the investment is made. It is a productive investment which pays its way over and over again.

Mr. President, with our present system hundreds of millions yes, billions, have been withdrawn from business and invested in securities which are really of little direct benefit in developing our communities.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President, will the Senator explain how that money is withdrawn?

Mr. CALDER. I have intimate knowledge, Mr. President, of just how it is withdrawn from real estate mortgages. When the mortgages are due they are called, and, because of the great demand for real estate generally, the men carrying such investments have been able to realize 100 cents on the dollar. I doubt very much if it is the policy generally of business men to sacrifice their holdings unless in sacrificing them they make money by doing so. They find it more profitable to invest in tax-exempt securities; but from my examination of the question I will say to the Senator from Nebraska that these men with large incomes do not, as a rule, sell their holdings except when they find it absolutely profitable; but they do invest in tax exempts all of their surplus income.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. So the Senator thinks they are still holding on to their investments that are paying 20 per cent, say?

Mr. CALDER. Of course, they are; I will say to the Senator from Nebraska that the man of large income is not selling investments netting 20 per cent because they are more profitable than 5 per cent.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Then the Senator really thinks they are not withdrawing their money, but are simply investing their surplus?

Mr. CALDER. They are investing their surplus, and they are selling their securities where it is more profitable to invest their means in tax-exempt securities.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Who purchases these securities when they sell them?

Mr. CALDER. When they are sold at a sacrifice, very often the public buys them.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Does the Senator mean by "the public" the people of more moderate means?

Mr. CALDER. Wherever it is profitable for them so to do; yes.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Is it not a good process to let those people have those securities?

Mr. CALDER. It is a good process, of course; but my contention is that because of the attractiveness of these nontax-paying securities large sums of money are taken out of active industry which otherwise would be put into business that would turn over and over again, earning money, putting money into active business circulation, and therefore making profits and business for the country generally.

Then, too, Mr. President, people with large incomes to-day are in the habit of dividing up their properties in order to avoid high taxation. Under the present law it is possible for an individual to divide his property among four or five members of his family, and thereby materially reduce his taxes, while the business man of moderate means is compelled through his business needs to keep his capital intact, and is required to pay taxes on his entire income.

The whole idea of excessive surtaxes being a tax on the rich alone is a fallacy, and until we understand that we can not hope for a complete revival of business activity.

I shall vote, Mr. President, to fix 32 per cent as the maximum surtax rate, and I shall do so with the conviction that my vote will be in the best interest of the whole country, for in my judgment the continuance of a rate of taxation in excess of that will be most damaging to the real prosperity of the Nation.

Mr. President, I favor the elimination of these so-called "nuisance taxes," and I shall join with other Members of the Senate in an endeavor to find a substitute; and if one can be found that will levy taxes really equitably upon all of the people, it will have my support.

It has been difficult, Mr. President, to bring myself to believe that a manufacturers' tax of 3 per cent on all finished products would be welcomed by American business men. It is true that we have organizations here who claim they represent the great manufacturing interests of the country, who are willing to have a tax of 3 per cent levied on their business; but these men in the main are already paying a sales tax to the Government, and they insist that if they are taxed, and very properly, too, that every other industry should likewise be taxed.

I am sorry that in the measure proposed by the Senator from Utah the rate is not fixed at 1 per cent. I do not believe there would be serious objection to this by the people of the country, and I believe the Government would be furnished with sufficient revenue to make up the items we have eliminated. I have in mind the small "nuisance" taxes, the reduction of surtaxes to 30 per cent, and the reduction of the corporation tax to 10 per cent.

For my part I am fully convinced there is little to be gained out of these higher levels of taxes; and indirectly they will do great harm in materially retarding the business prosperity which, if this Congress acts intelligently, is at our very door. We should by all means repeal the excess-profits taxes, reduce the maximum surtax, and encourage necessary investment in productive industry.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator from Nebraska a question, if I may. What is the Senator's construction of the amendment that he has proposed as to what surtaxes, in his opinion, it would apply to?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. It would apply to the surtaxes on all incomes over $100,000.

Mr. LENROOT. Is it the Senator's intention that it should apply only to the brackets over $100,000?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. What I mean is that every income in excess of $100,000 shall be taxed the same next year that it has been taxed heretofore.

Mr. LENROOT. Is it the Senator's intention, so far as those incomes are concerned, to apply a different rate in the lower brackets as well as in the higher ones?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I have just accepted the amendments of the committee on all incomes under $100,000.

Mr. LENROOT. No; I mean in the case of an income of over $100,000 the brackets that would be applied upon that income of over $100,000 up to $1,000,000 would be what?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. The same brackets as the present law provide.

Mr. LENROOT. So the Senator's construction, then, is—and I think it is correct—that upon brackets below $100,000 he would have one rate of surtax for incomes below $100,000 and a different rate for incomes above $100,000, whereas under the present law and under the committee amendment they are the same?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I had not the intention of bringing about anything of that sort. The committee has offered an amendment to the present law, and I am willing to accept it as far as I am concerned up to the point of $100,000 incomes, because it makes very trifling reductions; but above incomes of $100,000 I think the same brackets ought to apply that prevail under the present law.

Mr. LENROOT. That is, brackets from $5,000 up?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. The brackets as far as they affect incomes of $100,000 and over.

Mr. LENROOT. Of course, the Senator understands that under the present law each bracket is considered in a class by itself; and all incomes, whether $1,000,000 or $10,000, pay in the bracket to which they belong, and then, in addition, in other brackets for any additional income.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I doubt whether the Senator is justified in making the construction which he seeks to make. I am only attempting to change the amendment of the committee to the extent that it applies to the excess over $100,000.

Mr. LENROOT. Yes. Now, clearly the Senator's amendment does not accomplish that, because the surtaxes are the sum of all the brackets upon a given income.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, the Senator from Nebraska has tried his hand at simplification, and if you will read his amendment you will see that it is very simple, indeed. He says:

> The rate of surtax for the calendar year 1922 on net incomes exceeding $100,000 shall be at the same as for the calendar year 1921.

That sounds simple until you begin to apply it; and he begins to apply it, as is suggested by the Senator from Wisconsin, on the $100,000 basis, where the preceding brackets have been changed, so that the rate upon the $100,000 and above the $100,000 must necessarily be different, because they include what is paid upon all of the preceding brackets. The error of the amendment of the Senator is that in reality it restores the 1921 rates on the brackets below $100,000 as well as on the brackets above $100,000.

With the assistance again of the experts, whom I have called upon to get the results of the Senator's simplification of the law, we have this: The tax on $100,000 under the amendment proposed by the majority, or the bloc amendment, would be $30,140. Under the Hitchcock amendment the tax on $100,000 would be $30,140. So far there is no difference, but the tax on $100,001 proposed by the majority amendment would be $30,140.56. In other words, there would be 56 cents more tax for that one dollar; but under the Hitchcock amendment the tax on $100,001 would be $31,190.60, or a difference of $1,050.04 upon that one dollar of earnings above the $100,000.

In other words, an increase of one dollar of net income under the proposed majority amendment brings about an increase of 56 cents in tax, while under the Hitchcock amendment as drawn an increase of one dollar in income brings about an increased tax of $1,050.04.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, all that may be true. It may be that technically the Senator from Nebraska has not properly fitted his amendment to a bill which is absolutely nonunderstandable by anybody except an expert; but we understand the purpose of the amendment, and it can be framed easily enough. The purpose of the amendment is to keep the surtaxes on incomes above $100,000 where they are under the present law, and if the amendment is not in exactly the proper form it can soon be put in form. It is no reflection on the intelligence of any Senator that he has not been able to draw hastily an amendment which fits into this complicated scheme.

Mr. President, in the physical condition in which I find myself this morning I think I shall only want to occupy the floor for a few minutes; but I desire to call attention to some fallacies which I think have been long enough repeated on the floor of the Senate. One of these fallacies is the reason given for industrial depression and unemployment, namely, because the people who have money are asked to pay taxes upon what they have. The theory that has been argued here to-day was advanced with great vehemence when the committee reported a bill which refused to advance surtaxes beyond 32 per cent regardless of what the income might be. It is contended that when high taxes are levied upon the profits of wealth, wealth will immediately cease to be invested in those things producing large profits, and that investments yielding smaller returns will be eagerly sought; in other words, that in order to escape giving up part of their profits in the way of taxation, gentlemen will be so foolish as to put their money into something that pays so small a profit that they will not have any taxes to pay, thus depriving themselves of the difference between the taxes and the gross income, which leaves them a net amount far in excess of the small interest bearing investment.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Missouri yield to the Senator from Minnesota?

Mr. REED. Gladly.

Mr. NELSON. Does not the Senator think that those wealthy men who invest their money in State and municipal bonds are, after all, conferring a blessing on the States and the municipalities by furnishing them funds by which they can carry on development and improvement, and in that way help the development of the country?

Mr. REED. Yes, Mr. President; I had occasion to say so a few days ago; and the Senator from Minnesota, with his usual good common sense, which is the best kind of sense in the world, puts it very clearly and directly.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President, if the Senator will further allow me, would it not be too bad to deprive those rich people of the privilege of helping the States and municipalities in their development? Is it not a good plan to encourage them in that task?

Mr. REED. I think we are in no danger of having too many bidders for our State, county, and municipal bonds. I think the more we have bidding for them the better.

Another fallacy which is akin to the one I have just mentioned is that the way to benefit the farmer who is making no money, and the laboring man who is out of a job, is to take the taxes off the men who are making enormous incomes. The Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS] asked the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. HITCHCOCK] to answer that claim. It would have been more in line with the usual custom if he had asked those who make that startling proposition to adduce their evidence in support of it. I have heard no evidence in support of it. I have heard assertions, but when a man makes an assertion that the way to take care of the man who has suffered a loss, and yet must pay taxes, is to take the taxes off a man who has made profits that year, I think it requires some very conclusive and convincing evidence before it ought to be accepted.

Such an argument is akin to the one we have heard for a good many years in this country—in fact, I think it is its child, either legitimate or illegitimate—that is, if you take care of big business, big business will take care of the country. It always has taken care of the country by taking care of itself out of the country.

We might as well discuss this question here to-day in its broad sense, because it applies not only to surtaxes upon incomes but to the question of excess profits as well. We are told now that the excess-profits tax is to go; that that has been agreed upon as a compromise between certain unknown patriots, who met in secret and served notice upon the chairman of the Finance Committee that unless there was a yielding on certain other things they would help defeat the bill. We are told that they compromised by agreeing to sacrifice the excess profits.

The argument which applies to excess profits, and the argument which applies to surtaxes upon very large incomes, are basically the same, namely, that if you tax great incomes or great profits the patriotic gentlemen enjoying the great incomes or profits will refuse to invest their money; that the business of the country will languish; that everybody will suffer; and that the only way we can get business reestablished is to take the burden off the man who is making money and put it on the man who is not making money. That is the whole question in a nutshell.

Mr. President, the last thing in the world I want to do is to put myself in a class with individuals who make war upon men who have made money. I think we ought to encourage men who make money, but I also think when a man makes money he ought to be willing to help bear the expense of the Government that protects him in the possession of that money.

Sir, it is proposed to levy a tax upon a farmer who raises his produce at a loss, and who is confronted by an increased mortgage upon his farm, and to reduce the taxes upon the man who made an enormous profit in his business by pricing the things he sold to that farmer so as to make an outrageous profit. Moreover, it is argued that it is done for the benefit of the farmer. The man who advocates a proposition of that kind could advocate any kind of a proposition, however insane or idiotic it might be. You may tell that to the Members of the Senate of the United States, but none of you will go out and tell it to your people.

I know I will be met with the proposition that if the farmer has lost money he has neither an excess-profits tax to pay nor has he a surtax to pay upon his income; but, nevertheless, I assert that he does pay his tribute, although he may not have to pay a tribute directly to the Government, and I propose to take the time of the Senate just a moment to make that very plain.

I am speaking of the farmer, not because I am a professional farmer, but because he represents to-day 49 per cent of the people of the United States, and his welfare, therefore, concerns not only himself but the entire population of the United States. He is to-day selling his produce at prewar prices and below. We need not pause for the moment to consider why that is, although a little later I think I can point out the whys and the wherefores. He is bringing that produce to the market and sacrificing it at prewar and below prewar prices. When he buys the things which he must buy, he must pay almost war prices for them. He is paying a gentleman eleven or twelve dollars for a pair of shoes which he ought to be able to get for four or five dollars if the shoes had been reduced as his prices were reduced. He is paying corresponding prices for his harness, for his agricultural machinery, for clothing for himself and his family. To whom is he paying it? He is paying it to gentlemen who have enormous incomes, on which surtaxes are to-day levied, and to institutions that are making enormous profits and will come within the excess-profits clauses of the law.

The necessary revenue of this Government must be collected from somebody, and if it is not collected from those who reap high profits it will have to be collected from those who earn moderate profits, those who make no profits at all, and those who are obliged to pay by contributing out of the capital they now possess; yet the battle on this bill, which is yet to come, and which is allied with the present contest, is a battle over the question whether the man who has made 20, 30, 40, 100, or 1,000 per cent profits shall pay taxes upon those profits or shall be permitted to escape taxation on those profits, and the question whether the taxes shall be wrung from the rest of the people of the United States. That is all there is in it.

There never was a bolder proposition put forward in the interest of the profiteer than the assertion that we shall take the burden off the profiteer at the very time the great mass of the people of this country are suffering losses and making no money.

I am going to reduce it to a very simple illustration, which, of course, is purely an illustration. As I look at the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. NELSON] it comes to me that a farmer in Minnesota who raises a crop of 1,000 bushels of spring wheat, and who has to sell it in Minnesota to-day for about 90 cents a bushel, hauls his 1,000 bushels of wheat to town, gets $900 for it, and is actually out money by the transaction. He is poorer than when he began. He goes to an emporium dealing in agricultural implements to buy the plows and farm machinery necessary for next year's tillage. I shall assume that the institution he deals with makes 40 or 50 per cent profit, and hence would be called upon to pay an excess-profits tax under the law as it stands now. I want somebody to tell me what aid it will be to my farmer to have the excess-profits tax forgiven that institution which extorts and always has extorted the last dollar it can get from him.

What it pays to the Government it will pay to the Government because it is forced to do so, and if it is not required to pay it will have that much more money to distribute to its stockholders. A flattering letter will be sent out to the stockholders telling how much money they have made; the stockholders will take those profits and add them to their incomes. In addition, if they pay surtaxes, then by the provisions of the pending bill the surtaxes will be reduced.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. REED. Gladly.

Mr. NELSON. The Senator from Missouri omitted one step in the program, and that is the stockholder would try to get his income in the shape of stock dividends, and be entirely immune.

Mr. REED. He would be immune until he reached the surtax point, and now when we get to the surtax we propose to reduce that. Let us see who is affected by the surtaxes. Let me see if I can make this thing so plain and so simple that the country can understand it. I believe the Senate understands it now.

We start with the tax on a man who only makes $1,000 if he is single, or the girl who only makes $1,000 and who works in a store or an office. Upon that thousand dollars they must pay a tax, and the man who has a million dollars income pays on the first thousand dollars of that income just exactly the same as that girl who earns $1,000 and has no more, and has to spend every dollar of it. Following, if the man who has a million dollar income is married he does not pay any tax on the first $2,000; that part of his income is exactly on a par with the man who earns not a cent more than $5,000 and who has to spend it all to support his wife and his children. What is the hardship there? The millionaire as to the first $5,000 of his income is on a par with the poor man who has nothing but that income and spends it all.

Let us follow that a little further. Here is a man who earns $10,000 and pays on that $10,000 a stipulated per cent. The millionaire, the man who has a million dollar income, pays on the first $10,000 of his income exactly the same as the poor man or the man with the moderate income. So we proceed to the $20,000 income, the $60,000 income, or $100,000 income, and in each instance on that part of his income which reaches the $100,000 bracket or the $20,000 or $10,000 bracket, the man enjoying the income of a million dollars pays just the same tax as the individual who has an income of only the amount which brings him within the bracket.

So we proceed until we reach the income of $68,000. It was at that point that the overstrained heart of the majority members of the committee broke and they proposed that when a man has an income of more than $68,000 he shall not pay an increasing tax on the amount of income he has above $68,000. In other words, there were 12,000 men in the country having incomes above $68,000, which certainly represents a fortune of more than $1,000,000. When we reach that class of 12,000 millionaires there should be no further increase in the surtax. Coupled with that is the proposition to wipe out the excess-profits tax. As to both of them we are told the same story, namely, that if we do not wipe out this tax these gentlemen will refuse to invest in business and the farmer will not have any market; that that is going to wipe out the farmer's market.

Now, how will it wipe out the farmer's market? Let us ask that question in all seriousness and see if it can be answered. Will it make the people of the United States eat any more corn meal, any more flour, any more cattle, wear any more shoes, consume any more of what the farmer produces, if we take the tax from these 12,000 millionaires and take the tax from the profiteers who have fattened and battened upon the country? Why, the tax upon the profiteer if properly levied only makes the profiteer disgorge a part of his loot. There have been Senators who have advocated laws to punish as criminals men who exacted more than certain profits, and some of them will vote to take the tax off of the profiteer altogether. Some of those very individuals will undoubtedly vote that way when the roll is called.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, the Senator ought not to forget, however, that the majority aided the farmer by placing 35 cents a bushel on the value of his wheat and 15 cents a bushel on the value of his corn crop.

Mr. REED. That is true. The theory of the bill is that if A has an income of $1,000,000 a year and we reduce his taxes upon that $1,000,000 he is going out and distribute to the people as benefactors the money which he otherwise would have paid to the Government. Will some of the Senators who advocate this add an amendment to the bill to provide that the money saved by this reduction of taxes shall be loaned to farmers at a certain rate of interest, that it shall be invested for the benefit of the people, or that it shall be used in public benefactions? Will some of you introduce an amendment of that kind? You know and I know and every man with any sense at all in his head knows that the money will be used by those people as they properly have a right to use it. It will go into their bank account or into their future investments. It will be kept by them as they have a right to keep it if we demand it by taxation.

The next astounding theory is that we must lower these taxes because they are evaded. We have the statement of the distinguished Senator from New York [Mr. CALDER] to the effect that citizens everywhere, including Members of the Senate, are trying to dodge taxes. Well, if everybody is trying to dodge his taxes, then taxes will be dodged whether we reduce them or whether we do not reduce them. If we are going to deal with this proposition upon the basis that everybody is a scoundrel and will dodge his taxes if we do not reduce them, and that the people who now pay low taxes are already dodging, then the argument gets nowhere because they are going to keep on trying to dodge, no matter what the taxes are.

But I do not agree with the wholesale indictment of Members of the Senate or the wholesale indictment of the country by the Senator from New York. I think that the great majority of the people of the United States are entirely willing to pay the taxes that the Government levies, and try to make an honest return, and do make an honest return as far as they are able. It is only occasionally that somebody intentionally defrauds the Government, and that is becoming a more and more dangerous proposition every day.

That there have been honest mistakes made, growing out of a law that nobody could understand, that had to be construed, and that the department has frequently construed one way and the courts another, is, of course, true. In those instances there are disputes, but the great mass of people of the United States propose to make honest returns and try to do what is fair by their Government.

If it is true that men enjoying incomes of a million dollars and more are defrauding the Government by false returns, as has been argued here, then I say that they are the last people in the world deserving any consideration at the hands of the Government, and that the Government had better get busy in order to compel them to pay what is justly due from them.

I say that the argument that the Government is powerless and therefore we must take off the tax is a coward's argument. Can it be argued that the Government is so impotent and that it can not collect taxes from the rich while it can exact them from the poor? Such an argument does not commend itself to my judgment. I invite Senators on the other side of the aisle to proceed, if they dare proceed, with the proposition to take the tax off the profiteer and put it upon the man who has made no profit.

Now, Mr. President, every time an advocate of a cause wants to have a change for the benefit of some class of people he comes forward with the assertion that present hard times are caused by the particular condition he asks to have changed. If a man wants the taxes taken off the rich, he says it is the taxes on the rich that make the hard times. If he wants the taxes taken off the profiteer, he says it is the tax on the profiteer that makes the hard times. If he has a pet theory of internationalism, he says that it was our failure to go into the League of Nations that made the hard times. And so we go. "Hard times" is the general excuse offered for every ill of mankind.

I should like to appeal to the common sense of this body and to an observation of the obvious, if you please. The obvious solution from which there is no escape is found in the toil and labor of many years.

Mr. President, prior to 1914 the world, working and toiling in peace, found itself barely able at the end of the year to meet its responsibilities and liabilities. At that time Europe was clamoring for better conditions. The labor of England was almost at the point of some kind of industrial revolt. The labor of our own country was none too well employed. Yet we were living under conditions of absolute peace and no industry was disturbed by any threat of war. Notwithstanding, with everybody working, without the waste of war, the world was finding it hard to make both ends meet.

Then, in 1914, what happened? First and last, a call from the creative industries of the world for 30,000,000 men. If there had been a general strike of 30,000,000 men in the world, if they had simply quit work for five years, without firing a shot, the world would have faced an overwhelming industrial crisis.

A mere civil strike would have produced unspeakable conditions; but we did more than that, sir. These men started fighting, and when they fought they not only destroyed themselves but they destroyed the accumulated property that had been gathered for years. Back of the lines of fighting men it was also necessary to mobilize the whole industrial force of the world. Instead of forging implements for the farms, building habitations for the people, or manufacturing steel and iron and wood and all kinds of material that would go again into the creative industry of the country, we massed these forces on the battle fields and destroyed them.

What has been the result of all that? A burden that must continue with us for many years. To meet that burden is our task to-day.

Mr. President, when we look into the question of hard times we find the answer in the inability of people to purchase. We may pass all the laws we wish to pass, we may resort to all the artificial things we desire to conceive, but the fact of the matter is that the man in Europe who has been impoverished and who has scarcely clothing for his back can not purchase the amount of goods that he would have been able to purchase if there had been no war and if he had his income unimpaired and his property in hand. A nation stripped of wealth can not be a large purchaser.

We need not look far for an illustration of that. The South was a great purchaser, a great customer of the North before the Civil War; we were held together in the closest kind of commercial unity, but when the South had gallantly stood upon the battle line until the best of her sons were dead, when her fields had gone to weeds, when her cities had been burned, when her factories had been destroyed, when men who had possessed large fortunes were reduced to absolute poverty, the South, though she needed everything the North had, could not purchase. She had to wait until she had created wealth with which to purchase.

When we ask for the great basic causes of our inability to market goods in Europe we are confronted by the fact that Europe has been impoverished and that a pauper—and I do not use the term offensively—can not buy as does a prince.

Mr. OVERMAN. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

Mr. PENROSE. Mr. President, I was on the point of making the suggestion because——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Missouri yield?

Mr. PENROSE. For a considerable period the Senator from Missouri has been addressing a Chamber which is practically empty.

Mr. REED. That is very true. I am glad the Senator from Pennsylvania put the fact in the record. Every time a Senator begins discussing one of these questions in a way that does not exactly suit, Senators console themselves by leaving. They do not offend me at all by doing so; I do not blame anybody for not staying here to listen to me.

Mr. PENROSE. Neither do I. [Laughter.]

Mr. REED. Certainly not.

Mr. PENROSE. And I should like to say at this point, if there is no objection, that after to-day there will be ample opportunity during the evening sessions for the Senator from Missouri to indulge in such performances.

Mr. OVERMAN. I rise to a point of order. I suggested the absence of a quorum.

Mr. REED. Before the roll is called, let me merely say to the distinguished Senator, who is the chairman of the Finance Committee, that he may not like my remarks——

Mr. PENROSE. I have not heard them.

Mr. REED. I thought he had not.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair supposes the only thing which is in order is the calling of the roll to ascertain the presence of a quorum.

Mr. REED. It is, Mr. President.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Missouri will have ample opportunity to continue his remarks after the calling of the roll shall have been concluded.

Mr. REED. I do not object. Let the roll call proceed. I shall not be at all perturbed by the call of the roll.

The roll was called and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst	Edge	Harreld	King
Borah	Ernst	Harris	La Follette
Broussard	Fernald	Harrison	Lenroot

Overman	Reed	Underwood	Willis
Owen	Sheppard	Walsh, Mass.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Sixty-two Senators have answered to their names. There is a quorum present.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I do not intend to pursue the colloquy with the distinguished and polite Senator who asserted that I was saying nothing. I did not intend to undertake to convince him, and I did not expect that any argument I had to make or anything I might say would appeal to him in any way. I am content to remark that whenever the Senator from Pennsylvania is ready to hold his night sessions, I will try to be here and sit up with him the while he holds wake on a bill that, since it has already been dismembered, ought to be dead.

We are chastised for venturing to criticize this bill. Yet criticism has already resulted in compelling the committee to back away from its infamous and indefensible proposition that the surtax should cease advancing at 32 per cent; that all incomes above $68,000 should be taxed no higher than the tax levied at $68,000. It makes a difference to the Public Treasury, as I estimate it, of about sixty to seventy million dollars, and it was worth taking even the valuable time of the distinguished chairman of this committee in order to save that outrage to the American people and that much money to the Treasury.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Missouri yield to the Senator from Florida?

Mr. REED. I do.

Mr. FLETCHER. May I interrupt the Senator long enough to suggest further that the result of the criticism has been that the committee itself now proposes 77 amendments to its own bill?

Mr. REED. Mr. President, a little further along we are going to confront the question that I have been discussing, because it is akin to this question, and that is a proposition to relieve the profiteers of $450,000,000, and we intend to make you back up on that; and if we do not do it here, if I may adopt a slang phrase, we will back you off the boards in the next congressional election.

Whenever I become trained to speak in this body only by the kindly permission of the Senator from Pennsylvania I will gladly retire, for that would be a position too ignominious for any gentleman to want to occupy very long.

Mr. President, when interrupted I was stating the fact that we must recognize that the market of the United States, either in its bonds or in its stocks or in its produce, is affected not by the ipse dixit of a few men who control capital in this country but by great world conditions; that the impoverished people of Germany have not the money with which to buy as they would have had if there never had been any war; that you can not destroy the accumulated wealth of the world and still have it. What is true of the people of Germany is true to a greater extent of the people of Austria, and it is true to practically the same extent of the people of France and the people of England. These countries simply have burned up their resources. Consequently, they must deal on a hand-to-mouth basis, and sometimes the hand does not reach the mouth.

What is true of them is, in a measure, true of ourselves. Just put the touch of actual experience to these questions. Why have we a housing shortage in this country, which the Senator from New York [Mr. CALDER] discussed at length this morning? Every year in the United States our population increases, and every year we built a certain percentage of houses; but when this war began, by orders of the Government itself, the material for building houses was diverted to the great business of war, and properly diverted; the result is that we lost four or five years of building.

Over and above all the waste of the war we have piled up a world debt so stupendous that it takes a large percentage of the production of the people every year to pay its interest. My colleague [Mr. SPENCER] some time ago placed in the RECORD tables showing the cost of the war. According to these tables, the war in gross cost the allied powers $177,000,000,000. If we assume an equal amount as the cost to the Central Powers, we have a gross total of $354,000,000,000, largely represented in debts to-day. In the face of that condition, when we find that we can not sell what we produce and get good prices for it in Europe, the reason is plain. Europe is impoverished and almost bankrupt. She must work herself out of that condition by the slow and painful process of economy coupled with production.

Mr. President, our own country is feeling this. The farmer is feeling it. The laborer is feeling it. All classes of people are feeling it. The proposition to which we are asked to subscribe to-day is to take the taxes off the gentlemen who have great incomes and who in many instances made a large part of their money because of the war; moreover, to forgive taxes to the gentleman who is still profiteering, and relieve them instead of relieving the great host that is staggering under its burdens.

What a mockery it is! Here comes a boy back from the war. He has served over there for $30 a month. He had a job that paid him $1,800 or $2,000 a year, perhaps. Possibly it only paid him $500 or $600 a year. He comes back here. He has to take off his uniform and buy civilian clothes, and when he does so they ask him $125 for a tailor-made suit that he could have bought when he went away for $50 or $55; or, if he buys ready-made clothing, they ask him $50 or $75 for a suit that he could have bought for $25 or $30. You propose by this bill to take the tax off the man who makes the profit on those clothes. You propose by this bill to relieve from a tax upon his excess profits the man who is still making the profit on those clothes; you propose that this lad shall continue to pay those prices, and that the extortioner shall not contribute anything additional to the Government. Pass it, if you will; drive on, gentlemen; but when you meet your people on the hustings you will have to answer.

The condition is that wealth is still wealthy. Prosperity is still rife among these people. The bill as it is framed relieves no one but the man with the high income and the man who makes the excess profits. You propose to turn to the crowd that you picture here as hungry and as in want and as walking the streets, and tell them: "We benefited you, gentlemen. Behold what we did for you! We took the tax off the men that had incomes of over a million dollars," or over $68,000, if you please, "and we took the tax off the profiteers. What are you kicking about? Why are you not content? Go back to your beds hungry. We have legislated for your benefit."

That is the proposition you have. My elucidation of it may be a "performance," in the opinion of the Senator from Pennsylvania, but it is a performance that will be repeated on many a platform of this country by men who think as I think.

Mr. President, the amendment of the Senator from Nebraska ought to be agreed to. There is no reason why these enormous incomes should not pay heavily. Let us look at the equity of it for a moment. Here is a man with no property. He pays no tax, but still there is something he does do. The Government has a lien on his body every minute, and at any moment can call on him to put his body between the bullets of an enemy and the heart of his country. That service can be exacted alike from the millionaire and from the pauper. But what does this individual get? He gets protection by the Government of his person, and nothing else. The millionaire gets that, and thus far they are equal.

But now, sir, if my friend the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE] will allow me to put him in the position of the man with no money, and myself in the position of a great millionaire. I would like to assume that rôle for a few moments in this hypothetical case. We will say that I acquire ten or twenty million dollars' worth of property; that it is in farms, that it is in mines, that it is in banks, that it is in manufactories, that it is scattered over the United States, in 10 or 20 States. What is the protection the Senator from Wisconsin gets? He gets protection of his body. I get protection of my body, and both of us are alike subject to military service, and such civil duties as jury service, and so forth.

When we proceed beyond that point, I get protection on all this vast property. The courts of all the States are open to me. The constabulary of all the States is there to protect my property. Nearly all the civil expenses of the Government are taken up in the protection of property. The Army is there to protect it, and the Navy is there to protect it, potentially, at least. If my friend from Wisconsin had a little modest fortune of eight or ten thousand dollars, the proportion of his individual service would be large as to that property; but if I have a fortune of $10,000,000, the proportion of my individual service is very small, and, as the fortune grows, the individual equation ceases to have any importance. The result of it is that it is just and equitable that the man with an enormous fortune, rendering but slight personal service to his country, ought to pay a tax that gradually increases, because the fortune after a while becomes so large that individual service ceases to be of account in the general equation.

That is the principle upon which a surtax is levied, and it is a just principle. The man with his ten or twelve million dollars, and with an income of a million dollars a year, can not protect that property; the Government has to protect it for him. You can largely protect the house in which you live; you can largely protect your personal business and police your own office. When I have property scattered over 25 or 30 States, the Government has to police it and protect it for me. This should appeal to the sense of justice of every man who will properly consider it.

I am in favor of allowing these surtaxes to remain just as they are under the present law. If they were to be reduced anywhere, they ought to be reduced on the very small incomes, because the small individual must spend his entire income, and when he spends it, he must pay the very high prices which everybody has to pay, and hence his income is reduced greatly; but, as was well said by the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. HITCHCOCK], a man who enjoys one of these very large incomes can not spend it, it goes into his capital account; it is in fact, capital, for it has gone beyond the point of being in the true sense of the word an income which is to be enjoyed by an individual.

Mr. President, as far as I am concerned, I do not care to discuss this amendment at the present time any further. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will call the roll.

The reading clerk called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst	Gooding	McKellar	Sheppard
Broussard	Hale	McKinley	Shortridge
Calder	Harreld	McLean	Simmons
Cameron	Harris	McNary	Smoot
Capper	Harrison	Myers	Spencer
Caraway	Heflin	New	Townsend

Cummins	Jones, N. Mex.	Norbeck	Underwood
Curtis	Kellogg	Oddie	Walsh, Mass.
Dial	Kendrick	Overman	Watson, Ga.
Dillingham	Keyes	Page	Watson, Ind.
Edge	La Follette	Penrose	Weller

Fletcher	Lodge	Pomerene	Willis
France	McCormick	Ransdell
Gerry	McCumber	Reed

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Sixty-two Senators have answered to their names. There is a quorum present.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. President, I shall briefly discuss the pending amendment, but before doing so I want to spend a few minutes upon the question of blocs, concerning which we have heard so much recently in the Senate. The Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. MOSES], my very good friend, whose seat is next to mine, who I am sorry is not in the Chamber at the present time, made a speech the other day in which he took exception to what he charged was the existence of blocs in the Senate, and in that speech stated that—

> The reaction to these declarations, these demands, these promises—

Speaking of the Republican platform—> is now before us in a multiplex form. First, that of the revenue bill as it came from the House; second, that of the bill as it came from the Finance Committee here; and, third—

And this is the point I wish to emphasize—> that of the amendments forced upon committee recognition by that division of the invisible empire, which now seems to be ruling us and which may be styled, I hope without irreverence, as the Ken-Cap Klan.

Referring to the Senator from Iowa [Mr. KENYON] and the Senator from Kansas [Mr. CAPPER], neither of whom needs any defense from me.

Mr. President, I know of but two blocs in the Senate, and I do not have the honor to belong to either of them. One of them is what is known as the agricultural bloc, consisting of many Senators from agricultural States from both sides of the aisle. The other bloc, of more ancient origin, and still existing to some degree, may be termed the old-guard bloc, of which my friend from New Hampshire has recently become a member, and apparently one of its innner circle.

In years past, Mr. President, this old-guard bloc absolutely controlled this side of the aisle, and it controlled the body at the other end of the Capitol. When I first came to Congress that bloc controlled all legislation. They gave their orders. Their orders were obeyed. As to Senators who did not belong to that inner circle it was a case of—

> Theirs not to reason why,
> Theirs but to do or die.

And they usually did. It was that system that took the Republican Party out of power for eight years, and if that system had been continued it would drive the Republican Party out of power again. But that system does not longer prevail. The Senator from New Hampshire may grieve that it does not. The Senator from New Hampshire may be disappointed because a little group that would like to control legislation here if it could can not longer give orders and have those orders obeyed.

Mr. President, the old guard may propose, but to-day the Senate disposes. Senators upon this side of the aisle, as it is their constitutional duty to do, are doing their own thinking and following their own convictions for the welfare of the country and the welfare of the party. So Senators upon this side have independent opinions. They do consult together occasionally, and that consultation on one question may be one group and upon another question another group. But they do exercise the right to confer together concerning matters of legislation. While the members of the old-guard bloc senior to the Senator from New Hampshire have recognized the situation and no longer follow the old saying of the old guard, from which the name comes, that they die, but never surrender, realizing that Republicans all have rights upon this side of the aisle, they have properly taken the position that it is their duty to compromise differences, and that sometimes it is better to surrender than fight.

But the Senator from New Hampshire grieves over this and would rather fight. I admire his courage, but I am afraid that he is going to have many other disappointments as time goes on. I would not be surprised, Mr. President, if before long we may think of the Senator from New Hampshire as being the only one left who insists upon the old-guard bloc controlling legislation in this body. We may think of him in the lines—

> The boy stood on the burning deck,
> Whence all but him had fled.

I wish to congratulate the majority members of the Finance Committee for being willing to compose differences upon this side of the aisle and willing to agree upon a program that does meet the views of the majority upon this side. I wish to say to our friends upon the other side of the aisle that it is true that in this so-called compromise we have robbed you of an issue in the next campaign that you would dearly liked to have had, but, as in this matter, I hope and believe that in other matters as well there will be no bloc that will control legislation in this body, but that every Senator will have a right to have his opinion, have it considered, and that he will not jump at the crack of the whip for anybody against his own convictions, as was the case with some many years ago.

Having said that much about blocs, Mr. President, I wish to come to the pending amendment.

The amendment is bitterly attacked by some Senators on this side of the aisle who are just as honest in their conviction as those of us who favor the amendment. I do not question that in the least, but doubt whether there are many Senators who realize just what it is that these men are really fighting for, perhaps without knowing it. It has been assumed that this compromise amendment entailed a very large increase in taxes upon all men of wealth. As a matter of fact, upon incomes under $86,000 the pending amendment imposes a less amount of tax than the committee amendment or the House bill provision. No one can question that.

I put into the RECORD the other day a table prepared by the actuary of the Treasury, Mr. McCoy, showing that the total number of individuals in the United States reporting incomes of $100,000 a year and over is 3,400, so that practically it is 3,400 people and their investments that these Senators are fighting for when they attack the pending amendment.

I have this to say about that proposition: Granting, if you please, for the moment that these 3,400 individuals would place their investments in business and in industry if their tax were greatly lowered, when the statement is made that the depression from which we are now suffering is due to the fact that those 3,400 individuals are refraining from putting their money into business, it must at the same time be admitted that the prosperity of the United States rests in the hollow of the hands of 3,400 people in the United States. I can not concede that, and if I did I would still be in favor of the pending amendment, because if it is true that 3,400 men in the United States can bring on a business depression, that we can not have prosperity without them, then I say the United States had better suffer a little longer the conditions which now exist and say to those 3,400 men, "Rather than that you shall control industry in the United States, you had better put your money in tax-exempt securities where you can not control industry here." So that from either standpoint I can not admit the contention that is made by these Senators.

Now, what does the bill do? Under the present law there is a substantial reduction upon incomes under $86,000 and an increase, it is true, upon incomes over $86,000 amounting, in all, it is estimated, to $73,000,000. It is said that unless we yield to the demands of those 3,400 individuals we can not have prosperity, because, it is said, capital has gone on a strike. Granted that is true, we have not heard any Senator attacking this amendment condemn capital for going upon that strike. Rather they excuse capital. They take the position that capital equitably is entitled, irrespective of conditions in the country, to get all it can out of the employment of its capital.

But when it comes to labor, where a strike is threatened, what do most of these Senators do?

Do they say that labor is entitled to force its demands upon the public? Do they say that labor is entitled to the highest wage it can get? Do they say that labor is entitled to come to Congress and say to Congress, "Unless you do thus and so we shall strike"? I have not heard any of these gentlemen make any such assertion as that. I say that neither labor nor capital has any right to any such demand. Both labor and capital ought to take into consideration the condition of the country and men who own the capital have a duty to their country just as much as the men who labor upon the railroads. I do not like the idea of excusing the one and condemning the other.

Now, Mr. President, it is said that this capital will go into tax-exempt securities. In so far as they control industry, as I said a moment ago, rather than increase their control or increase the concentration of control, I would let them go into tax-exempt securities, because these great fortunes will do the country no harm if they are invested in tax-exempt securities.

Then comparison has been made, or attempted to be made, concerning the proposed tax, between the tax imposed under the present law and the English tax. My good friend from New Jersey [Mr. EDGE], in a very able speech the other day, used this language:

> Great Britain repealed the so-called excess-profits tax months ago. I am informed the maximum surtax on incomes in Great Britain is 40-odd per cent. Has it occurred to you that the employment situation there as compared to our own may have had something to do with a more favorable British tax system?

Let us see whether the British tax system is more favorable than our present tax law. I put into the RECORD yesterday a table showing the amount of taxes paid in Great Britain to-day upon given incomes, and I would like to call attention to what they are.

Upon an income of $50,000, under the British tax, there is paid $22,945. Under the present law in the United States that income pays a tax of $9,190, less than one-half of what the taxpayer in Great Britain pays upon the same income.

Mr. EDGE. Mr. President——

Mr. LENROOT. I yield to the Senator from New Jersey.

Mr. EDGE. The Senator from Wisconsin in his very able manner has pointed out that in an address I delivered to the Senate a few days ago I stated that I had been informed, or words to that effect, that the British surtax was 40-odd per cent. The Senator now goes on to demonstrate that on certain types of income the tax paid is greater in Great Britain than in the United States. He is entirely correct.

In my contention that the surtax in Great Britain was 40-odd per cent I was entirely too liberal. As a matter of fact, as I am sure the Senator from Wisconsin will admit, the maximum surtax in Great Britain is only 30 per cent, not 40-odd per cent, as I stated. At the same time, the normal tax in Great Britain, it is quite true, ranges from 15 to 30 per cent, so that the total maximum tax on the largest incomes in Great Britain would necessarily be 30 plus 30, or 60 per cent. In other words, the maximum tax on the largest incomes in Great Britain could not exceed 60 per cent, while in this country under the existing law, as is well known, the maximum tax can equal 73 per cent; that is, 65 per cent surtax plus 8 per cent normal tax.

Mr. LENROOT. The Senator I know wishes to be correct. It would not be quite that much, because there could be no taxes imposed under our law which combined would amount to 73 per cent.

Mr. EDGE. The surtax under the existing law is 65 per cent, is it not?

Mr. McCORMICK. Will the Senator allow me to suggest——

Mr. EDGE. Just one moment, until I finish the statement. Therefore, I think the Senator will admit that, while it is true with a normal tax in Great Britain of from 15 to 30 per cent and a surtax ranging up to 30 per cent, on incomes of a certain size, no doubt the British tax is much heavier than the tax of the United States, but on the larger incomes in Great Britain a less tax will be paid than will be paid on the larger incomes in the United States under the amendment upon which the Senator is now speaking.

Mr. LENROOT. Does the Senator refer to the amendment now pending?

Mr. EDGE. I refer to the amendment now pending, according to the tables.

Mr. LENROOT. Upon the amendment now pending, if it should become the law, there is no income of any size, running to any amount, that will pay as large an income tax as is imposed by the British law.

Mr. SMOOT. Will the Senator from Wisconsin yield to me?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. LENROOT. I do.

Mr. SMOOT. There is no tax to-day in the United States, taking the 8 per cent normal tax and the high bracket of 65 per cent, that reaches 73 per cent, and there is no tax of England that reaches 60 per cent. In the English law the steps or brackets are not quite so many; but the principle is exactly the same. There is no surtax under the law of the United States which reaches 65 per cent upon any amount of income, and there is no surtax in England which reaches 30 per cent.

Mr. LENROOT. That is correct, referring of course to total income.

Mr. SMOOT. Yes; total income is what I had in mind.

Mr. EDGE. Mr. President——

Mr. LENROOT. I wish to make a correction if the Senator will allow me. The Senator asked me about "the pending amendment." I forgot that the pending amendment was the amendment of the Senator from Nebraska. I referred to the committee amendment.

Mr. EDGE. I did not refer to the amendment of the Senator from Nebraska; I had reference to the so-called committee amendment which has been suggested. I have not had an opportunity to go carefully over the tables which I hold in my hand, but from a cursory glance at those tables, which were published in the RECORD by the Senator from Wisconsin last evening, I still feel that, figured out on incomes of over $1,000,000 or over $500,000, the American tax is somewhat in excess of the British tax, although, as I have stated, I have not had an opportunity to carefully examine the figures.

Mr. McCORMICK. May I suggest that such incomes are not very numerous in this country?

Mr. LENROOT. I think if the Senator will calculate the whole matter he will find that under the committee amendment there is no income in the United States that will pay as high a tax as would the same income in Great Britain. If I find that I am mistaken in that statement I shall be very glad to correct it.

Mr. EDGE. It is a matter of calculation.

Mr. LENROOT. It is a matter of calculation.

Mr. EDGE. While on the subject—and I do not want to delay the Senator longer, because I am very much interested in his presentation of the pending amendment—I wish to ask, Is it not true that the so-called committee amendment, the amendment which the Senator is now discussing, will provide for a very much larger tax on incomes in America?

Mr. LENROOT. I am ready to make the correction now. On an income of $1,000,000 the proposed committee amendment will impose a less tax than the British tax upon a similar income, but in excess of that sum, at about $1,100,000, the tax proposed by the committee amendment will be greater. I wish to make that correction.

Mr. EDGE. I thank the Senator. I was just in the middle of propounding another query. Is it not true that the so-called compromise amendment, leaving the "bloc" entirely out of it, provides for larger tax payments upon all large incomes? I think the Senator has already stated that on incomes in excess of $86,000 a greater tax will be imposed than is sought to be imposed either by the bill as it came from the other House or by the original Finance Committee bill as reported to the Senate.

Mr. LENROOT. Yes; it is at incomes of $86,000 where the lines cross; that is true.

Mr. KELLOGG. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield to the Senator from Minnesota?

Mr. LENROOT. I yield.

Mr. KELLOGG. I think the Senator from Wisconsin overlooked the fact that in England they have only one tax, which is imposed by Parliament, but here the States impose in addition to the Federal tax a local income tax.

Mr. LENROOT. Is the Senator from Minnesota prepared to state that no form of income tax is imposed by municipalities in England?

Mr. KELLOGG. Yes. So far as I know there is no such tax.

Mr. SMOOT. They have no such tax in England.

Mr. LENROOT. I am going to come to that in a moment; but I will say right now that that is one of the reasons why I shall vote for a reduction of the present 65 per cent surtax to a minimum of 50 per cent.

Mr. President, I desire to spend a moment upon the question of whether exacting as high a surtax as 50 per cent upon the highest bracket, plus a normal tax of 8 per cent, is any injustice to the taxpayer. We have repeatedly heard it stated by all of the Senators who have spoken in favor of the 32 per cent rate that men possessing very large incomes have already put their investments in tax-exempt securities to a very large degree.

Given a man with an income of $1,000,000, $500,000 of it coming from tax-exempt securities and $500,000 from business or taxable bonds, that man has an income of $1,000,000, yet, on half of his income, he is not paying one penny for the support of the Federal Government. With a maximum of 50 per cent surtax upon his income, the highest tax that he would pay is less than 29 per cent of his entire income, and the greater the extent to which the investments of such a man are placed in tax-exempt securities to an increasing degree will the statement which I have just made hold true. No one, I think, has had the temerity to urge, although I have had many letters making the claim, that there is anything unjust to the taxpayer in exacting as the highest surtax 50 per cent; yet the plea is made that we shall violate a principle of taxation that has been the very foundation of the tax systems in this country and in England that men should bear the burdens of Government according to their ability to pay.

With reference to taxes now men say, "The war is over." So it is; but what makes the taxes burdensome? It is the war; and shall men be exempted from paying their fair share of the cost of the war upon the plea that they will not engage their capital in business unless they are taxed less than their fair share? And mind you, Mr. President, a very considerable percentage of the incomes of more than $500,000 a year were acquired because of profit made in the war, and if it had not been for those exorbitant profits the debts of the United States, and consequently the taxes that must be imposed, would not be as large as they are.

Mr. President, there is an angle to this controversy which seems to have entirely escaped some gentlemen. They say that the high surtax prevents money from being invested in corporations and hence retards business development. I want to ask if the same rule does not apply in another way? Does not the high surtax prevent from being taken out of corporations and insure its being kept in business money that would otherwise be taken out by way of distribution of dividends? Mr. President, I am confident that one at least may balance the other, for the higher the surtax the less in amount will be the dividends paid out of accumulated earnings; the earnings will be kept in the business for the extension of the business, which will not be true if we reduce the surtax so greatly that men would rather withdraw their money from business and engage in speculation and manipulation, which will not further the productive capacity of the United States in any degree.

Mr. President, I said that I was willing to vote for a reduction of the highest bracket of the surtax from 65 per cent to 50 per cent. One of the reasons that impels me to do that is this: Since this high bracket was first adopted many States which at that time had no income tax laws at all have passed income tax laws. It is also true that many States that had income tax laws when this high bracket was first adopted have increased their State income taxes since that time. So as a matter of fact the aggregate income tax that is required to be paid to-day, combining both Federal and State taxes, is very much higher in many States, at least, upon the same income to-day than it was when the bracket was first adopted. It seems to me that presents a very cogent reason why we should take into consideration the income tax imposed by States upon incomes and is a very good reason why we should make the reduction that is proposed by the pending amendment.

Mr. President, again referring to the very able speech of the Senator from New Jersey day before yesterday, I am very sure that the Senator is the last man in the Senate intentionally to mislead either his colleagues or the country; and yet in the speech which he delivered, unintentionally upon his part, he made statements based upon figures furnished to him that will mislead the country and would naturally mislead the Senate if the errors were not called to their attention. He puts into the RECORD a table prepared, he states, by Henry R. Fernald, a certified public accountant of New Jersey, purporting to show what income would be required upon taxable bonds on given incomes to equal the return of a 5 per cent tax-exempt bond. Senators will find the table on page 6536 of the RECORD. The table is erroneous; and the unfortunate part of it is that this speech goes to the country, and will be read by men having incomes of $50,000 up to $100,000, and they will most naturally accept the figures given in the Senator's speech as being correct, and, accepting those figures, they would naturally refrain from continuing their investments in taxable securities when, if they knew what the fact was, they would do so.

Calling attention to that table, Mr. President, we find this heading:

Rate of interest on taxable bonds necessary to yield 5 per cent net.

The heading of one column is:

Annual income.

The next column:

Maximum tax rate (normal and surtax).

The next column:

Rate of interest on taxable bonds necessary to yield 5 per cent net.

The first income is given as $50,000. The percentage is given as 30. The rate of interest on taxable bonds required to yield 5 per cent net is given as 7.14. As a matter of fact, there is no 30 per cent tax upon any $50,000 income under the present law or under any proposed amendment of it.

Mr. EDGE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. LENROOT. Yes.

Mr. EDGE. These seem to be days when experts and accountants who furnish statistics for the benefit of either the Finance Committee or individual Senators are more or less under pressure, but referring to the figures as presented, headed as they are "Maximum tax rate—normal and surtax"—taking the two together on an income of $50,000 under the existing law, is it not true that it does provide for a total tax of 30 per cent?

I thoroughly appreciate that that might be and probably is misleading, upon having it drawn to my attention and giving it some further consideration; but, still, the actual statement as made by the accountant I believe to be a true one. It is true that any man with a $50,000 income or a higher income would get certain credits on his income which would, of course, apply; and as a matter of final net payment to the Government in the case of a $50,000 income, I believe, it figures up somewhere in the neighborhood of 18 per cent.

Mr. LENROOT. Surely, when the Senator said "$50,000 income," he meant taxable income and not the net income plus credits, did he not?

Mr. EDGE. I can well conceive that that interpretation could be made; but, simply in explanation or defense of the table as furnished, I think that a man who was figuring out whether he would make an investment in a tax-exempt bond or in a tax-bearing bond in the ordinary way would figure on the percentage he paid on what you might call the top of his income and it would be natural to so compute in making further investments. Is it not true that under the present law he would pay 30 per cent on $2,000 and above on a $50,000 income?

Mr. LENROOT. Yes. Would the Senator figure his investments that way?

Mr. EDGE. Just a moment. I am simply attempting to demonstrate that while perhaps the figures could be misinterpreted or misleading, they are not entirely incorrect. As you go from $50,000 up and get to the higher brackets, including those men who would be more inclined to buy tax-exempt securities, for instance, if you go up to the bracket of $300,000, according to the figures put in the RECORD by the Senator, that would call for a total payment, surtax and normal-tax payment, of $161,190. Anyone can see that that is over 50 per cent of an income of $300,000. Fifty per cent of the income would be $150,000; and the same table I read into the RECORD presents an income of $300,000 as having a total normal and surtax of 58 per cent. So I really believe that an investor would naturally be more or less influenced by considering the tax levied at the top of his income, rather than giving so much consideration to the credits that he would have, and would undoubtedly invest accordingly.

I am not entirely in accord with the way in which this table has been made up, but I can see the possible reason for the accountant presenting it in this way.

Mr. LENROOT. Let me ask the Senator a very frank question. In preparing and delivering this speech, did not the Senator himself assume that there would be a tax of 30 per cent on a $50,000 income?

Mr. EDGE. I must very frankly answer the Senator from Wisconsin that I did.

Mr. LENROOT. Then, if the Senator himself was misled by his own expert, will not the Senator concede that every other man in the United States would be likewise misled?

Mr. EDGE. That is probably true, Mr. President; but, as I think I have very clearly explained, the man does pay the sum specified here for the top of his income, and that is the figure that is naturally in his mind. He is then in the 30 per cent class.

Mr. LENROOT. Let us see about that. The expert who furnished these figures to the Senator did not stop with merely giving the income and the purported amount of tax, but he undertook to figure for the Senator on given incomes what rate a taxable bond would have to pay to equal a 5 per cent tax-exempt bond; did he not?

Mr. EDGE. It appears there.

Mr. LENROOT. And in the next column we find that figure. As a matter of fact, on a $50,000 income, instead of a taxable bond bearing a rate of interest of 7.14 per cent being required to equal a 5 per cent income, it would only require a taxable bond bearing a rate of interest of 6.12 per cent under the original committee bill, and under the pending amendment a rate of 6.08 per cent.

Mr. EDGE. As a matter of fact—while this does not particularly apply to the actual figures as presented—we must give the accountant credit for having been fairly modest in making up the table in his basis of figuring on a 5 per cent tax-exempt bond. I think the Senator from Wisconsin appreciates that to-day, through the advertisements in the public press, you can buy tax-exempt bonds bearing a rate of 6 per cent.

Mr. LENROOT. I am glad we can find something to give this expert credit for.

Mr. McCORMICK. You can buy excellent taxable bonds bearing 8 per cent. Nobody decries the modesty of the expert. It is his accuracy which troubles us.

I sincerely hope that the Senator will correct this table for the permanent RECORD, and before the speech goes out to the country.

Mr. President, this becomes of the greatest importance. Let me follow it a trifle further.

On an income of $100,000 this expert states that a taxable bond bearing 11 per cent interest would be necessary to equal a 5 per cent tax-exempt bond. What are the facts? The fact is that upon a $100,000 income a taxable bond bearing 7.27 per cent interest will equal a 5 per cent tax-exempt bond. So that, Mr. President, upon incomes going up to $100,000, the Senator by this misleading table is discouraging hundreds and thousands of people from continuing their investments in business where they would find, if they knew the truth, that there would be more money for them by continuing that investment than by investing it in tax-exempt bonds.

I want to put in the RECORD an illustration showing how misleading this table is. The figures of the Senator's expert on a $50,000 income, instead of a rate of interest of 7.14 per cent on taxable bonds to equal a 5 per cent tax-exempt bond, should be 6.12 per cent. The total tax on a $50,000 income under present law is $9,190, or 18.38 per cent, instead of 30 per cent, as shown in the table, leaving a net income after the tax is paid of $40,810. This is 5 per cent on $816,200; and to produce an income of $50,000 upon that amount will require a return of 6.12 per cent instead of 7.14 per cent, as stated in the table.

Mr. EDGE. Will the Senator put in the RECORD the figures on the higher brackets?

Mr. LENROOT. I have not figured them all.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Mr. President, will the Senator state for the RECORD who is the author of his table?

Mr. LENROOT. I am presenting my own computation of the table presented by the Senator from New Jersey. The Senator from New Jersey, of course, was not responsible for the table. He employed a registered accountant to make a table for him, and he relied upon it.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Have the Treasury actuaries examined the Senator's table?

Mr. LENROOT. I have not presented any table. I have simply worked it out, as the Senator can do. It is a very simple proposition to work out.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. I thought the Senator had had a table worked out by some expert.

Mr. LENROOT. No; I did not. If the Senator will take the table put into the RECORD yesterday and see what the total tax is on $50,000 and the percentage that that is to the whole, he will find the first error in the Senator's table. He gives it as 30 per cent, when it should be 18.38. Then, if he will likewise work out the result, capitalizing what is left after the tax is paid at 5 per cent, he will then find easily what per cent of return would be required on a taxable bond to equal the return upon a 5 per cent tax-exempt bond.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. I am not disputing the Senator's conclusions. I simply wanted the authenticity of the figures vouched for.

Mr. EDGE. Mr. President, inasmuch as the Senator has not attempted to figure out the proportions above the $50,000 income, and in order that it may be clearly shown that as the incomes increase the difference becomes very much less between the maximum, which has been the basis of the table furnished by the accountant, and the actual income as paid after credits have been given, I think in fairness that the entire table should be figured both ways. In other words, the highest income that the accountant has figured on is $300,000, with a maximum tax rate, normal and surtax, of 58 per cent. As I remarked a few moments ago, according to the Senator's table the actual tax on this particular income under the existing law or under the committee amendment, I do not recall which, would be $161,190, which, it is plainly evident without figuring it, is in the neighborhood of 53 per cent instead of 58—a difference of 53 as to 58, as compared with a difference of 18 as to 30 as to the lower incomes. This may furnish some defense if the computation is inaccurate, as with larger investors the difference is less misleading.

Mr. LENROOT. I do not think the Senator will defend that table in any respect.

Mr. McCORMICK. Mr. President, I wonder if the Senator would not ask the actuary to prepare a correct table, in order that it may be inserted in the RECORD.

Mr. EDGE. You may be quite sure that the actuary will hear of this colloquy on the floor of the Senate, and undoubtedly he will have his own defense.

Mr. LENROOT. Of course, Mr. President, what he did he probably did innocently. He may have assumed that the highest brackets carried the total tax all the way through.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Will the Senator from Wisconsin state for the RECORD what the revenues of the Government will be from these different propositions, the revenue which will be yielded from the operation of the provisions of the amendment originally suggested by the Finance Committee, the revenue which would be yielded to the Government under the compromise amendment, so called, and the revenue which the Government would receive under the present law, or the amendment which the Senator from Nebraska suggests?

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. President, I have only had the computation made comparing the present law with the committee's proposition, and I think the majority report shows the differences between the committee proposition and both the present law and the bill as it passed the House. The table I put in the RECORD yesterday shows the total amount of taxes which will be collected under each bracket, under the bill as it passed the House, the original committee amendment and the pending amendment, which will give the Senator the information which he desires, except that the increase in this bill over the committee bill, in brackets over $68,000, amounts to $73,600,000, but our reductions below offset that, so that there would be a net increase of revenue under the operation of the pending proposition, over the original committee proposition, of approximately $50,000,000.

Mr. President, I have talked longer than I intended to. I hope this substitute proposed by the Senator from North Dakota will be adopted. I do not believe it is unjust to any whose incomes it may affect, and I want to say, in conclusion, just this: That we hear it constantly said that this is a violation of party platform and party pledge. It is not, Mr. President. There was no promise by the Republican Party that they would reduce the taxes of the rich and increase the taxes of those who are in moderate circumstances. If we take the $50,000,000 off of the higher incomes, we have to put that $50,000,000 somewhere else. These gentlemen can not blow hot and cold in the same breath. Half of the time we hear it said that these taxes are all passed on to the consumer, and that the consumer pays, anyway. If that is true, then the men of large incomes have nothing to complain of. If they get it back from the consumer, they have nothing to complain of, have they? They are still getting their fair profit. If it is not passed on to the consumer, then this $50,000,000 has to be put on somebody else if it is taken off these very large fortunes.

You can figure as you will, you can not take $50,000,000 off the incomes in excess of $68,000 without putting that $50,000,000 on a class of people who are less able to pay.

So that from either angle, Mr. President, there is nothing unjust in the amendment proposed by the Senator from North Dakota, and I sincerely hope it will be adopted by the Senate.

Mr. EDGE. Mr. President, I have no intention of delaying the Senate more than a moment, because I have already expressed my views as to the policy of the pending legislation and endeavored to make them perfectly clear; and so far as the general viewpoint then expressed and the result of this type of legislation are concerned, I have no qualification whatever to make of what I have already presented to the Senate.

But the closing remarks of the Senator from Wisconsin, in which he expressed the sentiment that he did not understand what those men who were under the higher brackets had to complain about, leads me to observe that I do not believe they are the class who are complaining particularly. They buy tax-exempt securities and do not pay large sums to the Government.

In my attitude toward the present policy, that of continuing the high surtaxes, I am not in the slightest degree, and I want it clearly understood, in sympathy with any objection those men of large fortunes might have to the high surtaxes.

I claim, however, we are now facing a condition and not a theory; that those men who are receiving high incomes, not necessarily alone the possessors of very huge fortunes, but those in active business all along the line having incomes from $20,000 up to $70,000 are apparently making little effort to help start again the wheels of industry in this country.

I consider it a bad policy to continue a system where it is admitted that the actual income to the Government from the high surtaxes is comparatively small. We thus only deceive ourselves and continue retarding development. The testimony develops that we only collect approximately $80,000,000 from surtaxes above 32 per cent; then above 50 per cent, as contemplated by the pending amendment, we will, of course, collect so much less.

Mr. McCORMICK rose.

Mr. EDGE. I think I can anticipate what the Senator from Illinois is going to ask me. If I do not, I will be glad to answer his question.

I appreciate that the pending amendment does provide for lower tax payments for that range of brackets between, I will say, $10,000 and $86,000; but, in my judgment, Mr. President, it does not go far enough. That is the entire objection I have. I am opposed to the idea of extreme surtaxes in any event, whether they are on high incomes or in between, because I consider it an unscientific and a destructive type of taxation. My conviction in connection with this, Mr. President, is not founded at all on a desire for protection of those men who have incomes of hundreds of thousands of dollars, or millions of dollars; far from it. If any man can devise a method through which we can really secure payments from that type of men beyond what they are actually paying now, those fortunes which are not used in industry, I will be glad to support such a measure.

It is my understanding that even in Great Britain, which system has been cited several times, they have two types of taxation—one for earned income and one for those incomes which have been passed down by inheritance. I think that is a very wise system, because they usually represent two types of citizens and two types of activity.

I repeat that my real fundamental objection is not so much to the high surtaxes as it is to all surtaxes. Even in Great Britain, again citing that country, the maximum surtax is only 30 per cent. True, their normal tax is very much higher than ours, and they believe in the system of taxing every income, where we do not. We do not tax any income under $2,000, whereas in Great Britain they tax every income. They tax the most humble laborer with the smallest income. I question, however, whether that is wise.

The fact exists, however, that they do not believe in large surtaxes, nor do I, because I think it is a false method and a false theory of trying to get at huge fortunes. Their unemployed is proportionately less than ours. Perhaps that is one of the reasons.

We must raise revenue. No one, of course, can dispute that. The question then reverts as to which is the better method and less disturbing to business. My feeling is that we will show a very much more careful analysis and study of the entire subject, and provide a solution that will be real and lasting in this country, if we still further cut down the surtaxes all along the line and, in order to raise the necessary revenue, impose in their place a general sales tax similar to that we have discussed on the floor so frequently; a tax that is a tax on expenditure rather than a tax on energy and thrift; a tax a man pays only when he wants to pay it, by purchasing goods; a tax that taxes the wealthy man just the same, in proportion, as it does the poor man, because the wealthy man, of course, spends a great deal more money in the ordinary course of his life. It is a scientific tax, and will permit us to abolish all these numerous so-called nuisance and excise and special discriminatory business taxes, and will encourage industry again in this great country, encourage men to go back to work, and will do the very thing my good friend from Minnesota [Mr. NELSON] spoke of yesterday—help develop markets.

How can it be done? We have proportionately the same population we had before the war, when we apparently had markets. The purchasing power has not greatly changed in this country, but we have not markets because we have not confidence. When there is a market it simply means that employers and employees alike, being fairly prosperous, are purchasing things, are developing, living better than under present conditions enable them to live. You create markets, you make markets, only by developing a confidence and cooperation between all classes of citizens.

In conclusion, Mr. President, certainly the present system is not a correct one, or we would not have five or six million men unemployed. Yet we are facing a situation where we are contemplating passing a new revenue bill, continuing practically the same system, with very little change. There is some change in the surtaxes—yes, and may I say the changes, as far as they go, are very good, and I approve of them heartily; but no general change in the system of levying taxes in the country is provided, and I can not see how we can expect the country to respond, the wheels of industry to restart, and we reach anywhere near a maximum productivity in this country, if we are going to give to the country only a slightly amended tax system, which does not in any way, in my judgment, offer a solution of the great problem 105,000,000 people are waiting on us to solve.

Mr. McCORMICK. Mr. President, will the Senator answer a question?

Mr. EDGE. Certainly; if I can.

Mr. McCORMICK. If we adopted such a system of taxation as the Senator himself might propose, does he think that would cure the industrial situation without regard to conditions in Europe or in Asia?

Mr. EDGE. Mr. President, I am very glad the Senator from Illinois has asked me that. Of course, we all recognize the general upset conditions of the world; but we recognize with that that this country, of all countries, is a country prepared, with its abundance of raw material and with its citizenship, the enterprise and the will and the determination and the energy of the American people, to take advantage of the gradually recovering markets and the necessity of supplying the world, and that America could do a great deal more if it were at work, and America could do a great deal more toward solving this problem and radiating happiness throughout the world if Americans had confidence among themselves that would encourage them to take advantage of these possibilities.

I am sure the Senator does not mean to infer for one moment that there are not to-day just as many possibilities as there were 10 years ago for men with capital and initiative and determination to develop industries and employ men and to make successful enterprises out of such activities. The trouble is simply that men apparently are not encouraged to do it. I would regret very much to think that the world had practically come to an end, so far as possible industrial development was concerned. It is waiting on energy and initiative and a feeling of confidence, the feeling that a fair remuneration will come from the risk business men are compelled to take. Then you will have plenty of markets.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. HITCHCOCK] to the amendment proposed by the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. McCUMBER].

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. Presient, I have taken the privilege again of perfecting my amendment in order to meet the objections stated by the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LENROOT]. I doubt whether the phraseology he complains of is subject to the interpretation he places upon it, but in order to make the matter absolutely clear I put my amendment now in the form in which I send it to the desk and ask the Secretary to read it.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will report the amendment as modified.

The READING CLERK. Amend the amendment proposed by the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. McCUMBER] to the surtax provisions on page 28 by striking out all after the bracket reading "47 per cent of the amount by which the net income exceeds $98,000 and does not exceed $100,000" and insert in lieu of the part stricken out the following:

52 per cent of the amount by which the net income exceeds $100,000 and does not exceed $150,000;
56 per cent of the amount by which the net income exceeds $150,000 and does not exceed $200,000;
60 per cent of the amount by which the net income exceeds $200,000 and does not exceed $300,000;
63 per cent of the amount by which the net income exceeds $300,000 and does not exceed $500,000;
64 per cent of the amount by which the net income exceeds $500,000 and does not exceed $1,000,000;
65 per cent of the amount by which the net income exceeds $1,000,000.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President, I will say that simply reenacts the present law on those large incomes and fixes the maximum at 65 per cent instead of as is proposed in the McCumber amendment at 50 per cent. On my amendment to the amendment I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were not ordered.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I would like to have a rising vote to see if the demand is not sustained.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will call the roll.

The reading clerk called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst	Gooding	McKellar	Shortridge

The VICE PRESIDENT. Seventy Senators having answered to their names, a quorum is present. The question is on the amendment to the amendment, offered by the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. HITCHCOCK].

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President, a number of Senators seconded my demand for the yeas and nays, and the Presiding Officer stated that the demand had not been sustained. It is a constitutional right to have a yea-and-nay vote. I ask for a rising vote to decide that question.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair was about to ask that those who are in favor of a yea-and-nay vote shall rise.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the reading clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. DIAL (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Colorado [Mr. PHIPPS]. In his absence I withhold my vote.

Mr. FLETCHER (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Delaware [Mr. BALL], who is absent. I am unable to obtain a transfer and therefore must withhold my vote.

Mr. HARRISON (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the junior Senator from West Virginia [Mr. ELKINS]. I am unable to obtain a transfer and therefore withhold my vote. If permitted to vote I would vote "yea."

Mr. TRAMMELL (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. COLT]. In his absence I transfer that pair to the senior Senator from Nevada [Mr. PITTMAN] and vote "yea."

Mr. CALDER (when Mr. WADSWORTH's name was called). My colleague [Mr. WADSWORTH] is unavoidably detained from the Chamber to-day. If present he would vote "nay."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. DILLINGHAM. I have a general pair with the junior Senator from Virginia [Mr. GLASS]. In his absence I transfer that pair to the Senator from New York [Mr. WADSWORTH] and vote "nay."

Mr. HALE (after having voted in the negative). I transfer my pair with the senior Senator from Tennessee [Mr. SHIELDS] to the senior Senator from Connecticut [Mr. BRANDEGEE] and allow my vote to stand.

Mr. McCUMBER (after having voted in the negative). I notice that my pair, the junior Senator from Utah [Mr. KING], has not voted. I transfer my pair with that Senator to the junior Senator from Colorado [Mr. NICHOLSON] and allow my vote to stand.

I also desire to announce that the senior Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. PENROSE] is necessarily absent. He has a pair with the senior Senator from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS].

Mr. WILLIAMS. Bound by the pair to which the Senator from North Dakota has just referred, and having no transfer of the pair, I must abstain from voting.

Mr. EDGE (after having voted in the negative). I transfer my pair with the senior Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. OWEN] to the junior Senator from Oregon [Mr. STANFIELD] and allow my vote to stand.

Mr. CURTIS. I wish to announce the following pairs:

The Senator from South Dakota [Mr. STERLING] with the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. SMITH];

The Senator from West Virginia [Mr. SUTHERLAND] with the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON]; and

The Senator from Washington [Mr. JONES] with the Senator from Virginia [Mr. SWANSON].

The result was announced—yeas 23, nays 43, as follows:

YEAS—23.

Ashurst	Hitchcock	McKellar	Stanley
Borah	Johnson	Norbeck	Trammell
Caraway	Jones, N. Mex.	Overman	Walsh, Mass.

Gerry	Owen	Stanfield

So Mr. HITCHCOCK's amendment to Mr. McCUMBER's amendment was rejected.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, I desire to give notice that I shall ask for another vote upon this amendment in the Senate.

Mr. CALDER. Mr. President, I wish to offer an amendment to the substitute by striking out all after "31 per cent of the amount by which the net income exceeds $66,000 and does not exceed $68,000" and to insert "32 per cent of the amount by which the net income exceeds $68,000." That will make 32 per cent the highest rate.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from New York to the amendment of the Senator from North Dakota.

Mr. WATSON of Indiana. May we have the amendment to the amendment stated from the desk, Mr. President?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment to the amendment will be stated.

The ASSISTANT SECRETARY. In the amendment proposed by the Senator from New York [Mr. CALDER] it is proposed to strike out all after the bracket, which reads, "31 per cent of the amount by which the net income exceeds $66,000 and does not exceed $68,000" and to insert "32 per cent of the amount by which the net income exceeds $68,000."

Mr. TRAMMELL and Mr. HEFLIN asked for the yeas and nays, and they were ordered.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I should like to have the amendment again stated, in order that we may be sure we understand it.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I wish simply to make an inquiry. As I heard the amendment of the Senator from North Dakota read I understood it not to leave the rate at 50 per cent but to make it 32 per cent.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the motion of the Senator from New York to amend the amendment of the Senator from North Dakota.

Mr. LODGE. I understand, but I desire to ascertain what was the final figure fixed by the amendment offered by the Senator from North Dakota on behalf of the committee. Was it 50 per cent or 32 per cent?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. It was 50 per cent.

Mr. CALDER. My proposition is to fix it at 32 per cent.

Mr. LODGE. The Senator from New York has moved to make it 32 per cent?

Mr. CALDER. I have moved to make it 32 per cent.

Mr. SIMMONS. The vote is upon the amendment to limit the maximum surtax rate to 32 per cent, as I understand?

Mr. CALDER. Yes.

Mr. REED. Which is substantially the way the bill was when it was brought into the Senate by the committee?

Mr. SIMMONS. The bill as originally reported by the committee?

Mr. LODGE. That is what I understand, and that is what I desired to bring out.

Mr. REED. And the amendment would reduce the surtax on incomes above $68,000 from a graduated scale running from 32 per cent to 65 per cent to a flat 32 per cent rate.

SEVERAL SENATORS. Vote!

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will call the roll.

The reading clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. DIAL (when his name was called). I again announce my pair and withhold my vote.

Mr. DILLINGHAM (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the Senator from Virginia [Mr. GLASS], which I transfer to the Senator from New York [Mr. WADSWORTH] and vote. I vote "yea."

Mr. FLETCHER (when his name was called). Making the same announcement as to my pair as previously, I withhold my vote. If privileged to vote, I should vote "nay."

Mr. HALE (when his name was called). Making the same announcement as to my pair and its transfer as previously, I vote "yea."

Mr. McCUMBER (when his name was called). I transfer my general pair with the junior Senator from Utah [Mr. KING] to the junior Senator from Colorado [Mr. NICHOLSON] and vote "nay."

Mr. TRAMMELL (when his name was called). Making the same announcement in regard to my pair and its transfer as heretofore, I vote "nay."

Mr. CALDER (when Mr. WADSWORTH's name was called). My colleague [Mr. WADSWORTH] is unavoidably detained from the Senate to-day. If present, he would vote "yea."

Mr. WILLIAMS (when his name was called). I am not at liberty to vote because I have a pair with the senior Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. PENROSE]. If I were at liberty to vote, I should vote "nay."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. WILLIS. I desire to announce the absence of the senior Senator from North Dakota [Mr. STERLING] on account of illness.

Mr. HARRISON. I have a general pair with the junior Senator from West Virginia [Mr. ELKINS]. Being unable to secure a transfer of that pair, I am unable to vote. If permitted to vote, I should vote "nay."

Mr. EDGE (after having voted in the affirmative). I transfer my pair with the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. OWEN] to the Senator from Delaware [Mr. DU PONT] and allow my vote to stand.

The result was announced—yeas 15; nays 51, as follows:

YEAS—15.

Bursum	Edge	Hale	New
Calder	Ernst	Keyes	Page
Cameron	Fernald	McLean	Smoot
Dillingham	Frelinghuysen	Moses

NAYS—51.

Ashurst	Heflin	McNary	Spencer

Capper	Kellogg	Newberry	Trammell
Caraway	Kendrick	Oddie	Underwood
Culberson	Kenyon	Overman	Walsh, Mass.
Cummins	La Follette	Poindexter	Walsh, Mont.
Curtis	Lenroot	Pomerene	Warren
France	Lodge	Ransdell	Watson, Ga.
Gerry	McCormick	Reed	Watson, Ind.
Gooding	McCumber	Sheppard	Weller
Harreld	McKellar	Shortridge	Willis
Harris	McKinley	Simmons

NOT VOTING—29.

Ball	Harrison	Owen	Sterling
Brandegee	Johnson	Penrose	Sutherland

So Mr. CALDER's amendment to the amendment of Mr. McCUMBER was rejected.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President, I desire to say to the Vice President and to the Senate that in making a momentary protest a short time ago against what I thought had been a decision of the Chair that I should be denied a yea-and-nay vote, I labored under a misapprehension. I understand now it was the intention of the Chair to put the question again to the Senate; so my protest was really not necessary.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from North Dakota to the amendment reported by the committee.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I desire to have the amendment to the amendment stated, so that we may know just what it is we are voting upon.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment to the amendment will be stated.

The ASSISTANT SECRETARY. It is proposed to strike out so much of the committee amendment as begins on page 28 with the numeral "(2)," down to and including line 20, on page 30, and in lieu thereof to insert——

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, let me say to the Senator from Missouri that the amendment is simply a revision of the entire surtax according to what has been called the "bloc" amendment.

Mr. REED. And it is printed in the little document which has been placed before us?

Mr. McCUMBER. It has been printed and has been read in full.

Mr. REED. I have no desire to have it read again. I understand that what we are voting on is the substitution of the proposition submitted by the Senator from North Dakota for the committee amendment?

Mr. McCUMBER. On the amendment submitted by me for the committee amendment.

Mr. REED. It is certainly preferable to the committee amendment.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, I ask for the yeas and nays.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Before the yeas and nays are called, let me say that, as I understand, the amendment upon which we are about to vote raises the maximum surtax from 32 per cent, as provided in the House bill, to 50 per cent.

Mr. McCUMBER. That is correct.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment submitted by the Senator from North Dakota to the amendment reported by the committee, on which the yeas and nays are demanded.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I wish to ask the Senator from North Dakota a question. If the amendment upon which we are about to vote is defeated, the bill will stand as it came over from the House, will it not? In other words, the maximum rate would remain 32 per cent?

Mr. McCUMBER. If the amendment to the committee amendment should be defeated, then the question would be on agreeing to the committee amendment. In case the pending amendment should be defeated, the committee amendment if adopted would make the higher surtax rate 32 per cent, although the committee amendment is not the same as the House provision in several of the brackets.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. McCUMBER] to the amendment of the committee, on which the yeas and nays have been requested and ordered. The Secretary will call the roll.

The reading clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. DIAL (when his name was called). I announce my pair as on the previous vote, and withhold my vote.

Mr. DILLINGHAM (when his name was called). Making the same announcement as to pairs as on the last vote, I vote "nay."

Mr. FLETCHER (when his name was called). I make the same announcement as before as to my pair, and withhold my vote. If at liberty to vote, I should vote "yea."

Mr. HALE (when his name was called). Making the same announcement as before, I vote "nay."

Mr. McCUMBER (when his name was called). Making the same announcement as to pairs as on the previous vote, I vote "yea."

Mr. TRAMMELL (when his name was called). Making the same announcement as on the previous vote regarding my pair, I vote "yea."

Mr. CALDER (when Mr. WADSWORTH's name was called). My colleague [Mr. WADSWORTH] is unavoidably detained from the Chamber. If he were present, he would vote "nay."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. WILLIS. I desire to repeat the announcement heretofore made concerning the absence of the senior Senator from South Dakota [Mr. STERLING], and to state that I am advised that if he were present he would vote "yea."

Mr. WILLIAMS. I have a general pair with the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. PENROSE], who is absent. I therefore withhold my vote. If at liberty to vote, I should vote "yea."

Mr. HARRISON. I have a general pair with the junior Senator from West Virginia [Mr. ELKINS]. As he is not present, and I am unable to get a transfer, I can not vote. If at liberty to vote, I should vote "yea."

Mr. CURTIS. I have been requested to announce the following pairs:

The Senator from West Virginia [Mr. SUTHERLAND] with the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON];

The Senator from Washington [Mr. JONES] with the Senator from Virginia [Mr. SWANSON]; and

The Senator from South Dakota [Mr. STERLING] with the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. SMITH].

The result was announced—yeas 54, nays 13, as follows:

YEAS—54.

Ashurst	Bursum	Culberson	Ernst
Borah	Capper	Cummins	France
Broussard	Caraway	Curtis	Gerry

So Mr. McCUMBER's amendment to the amendment of the committee was agreed to.

The ASSISTANT SECRETARY. The committee also proposes, on page 30, beginning on line 21, to insert a new subdivision, as follows:

(b) In the case of a bona fide sale of mines, oil or gas wells, or any interest therein, where the principal value of the property has been demonstrated by prospecting or exploration and discovery work done by the taxpayer, the portion of the tax imposed by this section attributable to such sale shall not exceed, for the calendar year 1921, 20 per cent, and for each calendar year thereafter 16 per cent, of the selling price of such property or interest.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the committee.

The amendment was agreed to.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question now is on agreeing to the section as amended.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator will state his inquiry.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Is this the amendment providing for a maximum of 50 per cent which we have just agreed to?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the section as amended, which includes the matter to which the Senator refers.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were not ordered.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, unanimous consent was given the other day that the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. GERRY] might revert to the normal tax and offer an amendment. I think it would facilitate the consideration of the business before the Senate if we could dispose entirely of the normal as well as the surtax at this time, and I simply ask the Senator from Rhode Island if he is not willing to present his amendment at this time, with a view of cleaning up the matter of income taxes.

Mr. GERRY. Very well, Mr. President. In view of the request of the Senator from North Dakota, I offer the amendment which I send to the desk and ask that it be read, and then I shall make some remarks upon it.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the vote whereby the amendment was agreed to will be considered as not having been taken. The Chair hears no objection. The amendment offered by the Senator from Rhode Island will be stated.

The ASSISTANT SECRETARY. It is proposed to amend section 210 by inserting in the proviso on page 23, line 1, after the words "United States," the words:

For each taxable year up to and including the calendar year 1921—

Provided further, That for the calendar year 1922 and each calendar year thereafter, in the case of a citizen or resident of the United States, the rate upon the first $5,000 of such excess amount shall be 2 per cent; the rate upon the second additional $5,000 of such excess amount shall be 4 per cent; the rate upon the third additional $5,000 of such excess amount shall be 6 per cent.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is upon agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Rhode Island to the amendment of the committee.

Mr. GERRY. Mr. President, the purpose of this amendment is to grade and lower the normal tax. The present normal tax is 4 per cent on the first $4,000 and 8 per cent on all above that amount. My amendment puts the normal tax at 2 per cent on the first $5,000, 4 per cent on the amount between five and ten thousand dollars, 6 per cent on the amount between ten and fifteen thousand dollars, and 8 per cent on all above that amount.

The original bill as reported by the committee reduced the higher surtaxes on all amounts above $66,000. It looked after the man or woman with a very large income. It did very little, however, for the vast majority of the American citizens who have the smaller incomes. In fact, it did very little, practically nothing, for the great middle class of American citizens who furnish so much of the wealth and the brains and the industry of the country, and upon whom taxation was bearing most heavily. It did not seem to Senators on the minority side that this was a correct principle of taxation, and I am glad that it is proven by the vote just taken that it also did not appeal to the sense of justice of the majority of the Senators on the other side of the Chamber. The result is that the revenue bill has been amended and the surtaxes have not been reduced to such a great extent; but, on the other hand, as I have said before, practically nothing has been done to redeem campaign pledges and lower the taxes of the man of smaller income except in a slight degree in the grading of the surtax and certain exemptions.

When the bill came into the Senate the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH] and I introduced certain amendments which we thought dealt with the most important features of the bill, namely, the income tax and the corporation tax. Both the Senator and I worked on those amendments, studied them, and were entirely in accord on them. As a matter of convenience I introduced the income-tax amendment and the Senator from Massachusetts introduced the amendment in regard to corporations which he will call up at the appropriate time. Not only that, but we gave out a statement dealing with our views on this subject, which was signed by the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. SIMMONS], the Senator from Massachusetts, and myself.

Mr. President, the change in the normal tax that is proposed in this amendment will cut in half the tax on the man who has an income of $5,000. It will cut in half the tax on the man who has an income of $6,000. Under the committee amendment which has just been agreed to, the man who has an income of $6,000 will pay $160. If the amendment now before the Senate is agreed to, that tax will be cut to $80.

Under the amendment just adopted and the section just adopted a man with an income of $10,000 would pay a tax of $520, and under my amendment he would pay $260.

Under the committee amendment just adopted the man with an income of $12,000 would pay $720, as compared with $380 under this proposal.

Under the committee amendment a man with an income of $16,000 would pay a tax of $1,180, and under my plan would pay $760.

Mr. FLETCHER. May I ask the Senator what change he makes by the proposed amendment, if any, in regard to exemptions?

Mr. GERRY. I make no change in regard to exemptions. I simply accept the exemptions which the committee has put in the bill. Where husband and wife are living together, the exemption is $2,500, provided their income does not exceed $5,000, and the exemption for each child is $400, if the children are dependent.

Mr. FLETCHER. Instead of $200?

Mr. GERRY. Instead of $200.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator yield to the Senator from New Jersey?

Mr. GERRY. I yield.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I simply want to ask the Senator if he has made any estimate as to how much the cutting of the normal tax as he has cut it will reduce the revenue?

Mr. GERRY. Yes; I have, and I was coming to that. I ask unanimous consent to insert certain tables in the RECORD. I think that may be helpful to Senators.

There being no objection, the tables referred to were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Will the Senator permit an inquiry?

Mr. GERRY. Certainly.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Do the comparative figures which the Senator has given of what the taxpayer would pay under the bill as it is drawn up to date and under the amendment which he proposes include only the normal tax?

Mr. GERRY. No, Mr. President; in the tables I prepared I included the surtax rate, the normal tax rate, the surtax installment, and then have given the total.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. They certainly were not included in the figures the Senator has already given.

Mr. GERRY. The tables I have put in the RECORD I think are fairly clear. I included in those tables the tax under the committee amendment as amended, and under my amendment, and under the present law.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator yield to the Senator from North Dakota?

Mr. GERRY. I yield.

Mr. McCUMBER. I desire to ask the Senator whether his tables included what the tax would be upon a given income under the present law, which is 4 and 8, and also what it would be upon the same income if it were 2, 4, 6, and 8?

Mr. GERRY. Yes; that is included; and my tables are computed on a flat exemption of $2,000, which is that of the ordinary married couple. I did not want to go into the complicated exemptions, where there are children involved and where they have a special exemption. In fact, on looking at the table I find I have allowed the $2,500 exemption up to $5,000 and $2,000 above that. I did not take into account the amendment the Senator offered last night, and which was agreed to.

Mr. McCUMBER. Has the Senator any tables showing what the loss will be in revenue under his proposed amendment?

Mr. GERRY. I have figures, I will say to the Senator from North Dakota.

Mr. McCUMBER. Can the Senator give it to us in round numbers?

Mr. GERRY. As originally estimated, from the best information I could get, the loss would be about $105,000,000. On further consideration, and on examining the matter more closely, I have come to the conclusion that probably the more accurate figure would be something like $135,000,000.

Mr. President, I submit that the loss could very much better be made up by other forms of taxation than by placing the tax on the people of smaller incomes. The class I am trying to relieve consists of something like 3,000,000 taxpayers, and under the conditions under which we are suffering now, the conditions of unemployment, of hard times, of difficulties from lack of employment and otherwise, from which these classes of people are suffering, it seemed to me that it was only fair that remedial legislation should be given to them, and certainly no bill such as that reported by the committee, which sought only to take the burden off those paying very high surtaxes and do nothing for the man with a small income, could be considered for a moment on the grounds of economics or of fair play.

Mr. President, when the committee considered this bill and reported it to the Senate, I think it would have lived up to the campaign promises of the Republican Party much better, and would really have accomplished something, if they had given more time to the consideration of the bill in committee, had studied it more carefully before they reported it, and they would have passed it much more quickly through this body. I think the events of the last few days have proven that, and I think the more we study this bill the more we realize what a hodgepodge piece of legislation it is.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator a question?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Rhode Island yield to the Senator from Massachusetts?

Mr. GERRY. Certainly.

Mr. LODGE. I understand from what the Senator has said that his amendment, if adopted, would reduce the revenues $135,000,000. How does he propose to make that up? By retaining what are called the nuisance taxes?

Mr. GERRY. No. I was coming to that in a moment, when the Senator interrupted me. My idea is that if the committee had given a little more time and a little more careful consideration to the bill in the committee, they would have found it very easy to make up this loss and would have done justice by so doing.

For example, the Senate has already put back capital stock tax on corporations, which will raise $75,000,000. That the committee struck out. If it was thought wise to place that tax at 2 per cent, it would raise $150,000,000. I am only throwing this out as a suggestion. The amendment suggested by the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH] of a tax on gasoline at the refinery of 1 cent a gallon would raise $50,000,000.

Mr. LODGE. Then the Senator proposes to cover the reduction in the income taxes by putting a tax on gasoline and doubling the capital-stock tax?

Mr. GERRY. No; I did not say that.

Mr. LODGE. The Senator just said that.

Mr. GERRY. No; I said it could be done by that method.

Mr. LODGE. I asked the Senator to suggest how he was going to do it, and he suggested two taxes.

Mr. GERRY. I suggested methods of doing it, and I think probably they would be very good methods.

Mr. LODGE. What other method is there to get rid of the nuisance taxes at the same time?

Mr. GERRY. Mr. President, I do not think it is necessary for me to try to rewrite the bill here on the floor. It has already been done half a dozen times, and it probably will be done again.

Mr. LODGE. We are not going to rewrite the bill.

Mr. GERRY. I am simply showing how it could have been done in the committee. For example, the committee brought in a bill with a capital-stock tax in it.

Mr. LODGE. The committee had the benefit of the Senator's advice.

Mr. GERRY. Mr. President, the bill was reported as a party measure. The Democratic Senators were present during the hearings on the bill, and then the majority met and decided what they would put through.

Mr. LODGE. That did not prevent the Senator from making suggestions?

Mr. GERRY. I made suggestions, and I am making some now. The committee has taken its own course.

Mr. LODGE. The Senator is proposing to take off $135,000,000 of revenue, and he proposes to substitute for that a gasoline tax and a double tax on capital stock.

Mr. GERRY. I am suggesting that those methods could be adopted.

Mr. LODGE. Many methods could be adopted. I asked the Senator what means he proposed to take to supply this tax.

Mr. GERRY. I have told the Senator that I suggest those methods of doing it.

Mr. LODGE. It can be done in that way, no doubt.

Mr. GERRY. Undoubtedly it can be done. Undoubtedly many amendments could be put in this bill that would greatly improve it.

Mr. LODGE. Is the Senator in favor of the two amendments he suggested?

Mr. GERRY. Yes; I am in favor of the amendments I have suggested.

Mr. LODGE. I mean, is the Senator in favor of those two taxes?

Mr. GERRY. I am in favor of putting a 1 per cent tax on the capital stock of corporations, which has already been provided for by an amendment which has been adopted.

Mr. LODGE. That has been done already.

Mr. GERRY. That has been done already, and I do not see any reason why it possibly could not be 2 per cent.

Mr. LODGE. Precisely, and keep the nuisance taxes, of course.

Mr. GERRY. Oh, no; I have not said anything about them.

Mr. LODGE. The Senator will need them if he is going to reduce the total revenue $135,000,000.

Mr. GERRY. Probably I will need them, if I agree to the Senator's bill as it is now before the Senate. However, the bill has not yet been passed through the Senate.

Mr. LODGE. I am aware of that. I know the stage of the bill.

Mr. GERRY. Does anybody know, I might ask the Senator from Massachusetts? It seems a little doubtful when it comes to a vote.

Mr. LODGE. I know what the stage of the bill is, and I know the Senator proposes a new tax that can be offered at this stage of the bill. The bill is still in Committee of the Whole and open to amendment.

Mr. GERRY. Certainly. I think if my amendment is adopted, then we can see in what form the bill can be further amended so as to make it an efficient bill. We are trying now to perfect the bill. The bill came out of the committee in frightful shape. It came out without squaring at all with campaign promises. The trouble is, and what really happened was, the revenue bill did not come over to the Senate until September, and then it was rushed through the committee without proper consideration.

Mr. LODGE. The bill came over to the Senate on the 24th of August. I dislike to question the Senator's dates.

Mr. GERRY. I think the committee commenced consideration of the bill about the 1st of September. The bill was then rushed through the committee very hurriedly, as I believe the facts prove, and a very bad bill came out.

Mr. LODGE. It was a month in the committee.

Mr. GERRY. And a very bad bill it was.

Mr. LODGE. No doubt the Senator thinks that.

Mr. GERRY. I believe that very many others think so.

Mr. LODGE. No doubt the Senator thinks that it was a hodgepodge. I have heard it so stated many times. I know what the Senator thinks.

Mr. GERRY. The Senator from Massachusetts must have also heard that stated by others.

Mr. LODGE. What I am anxious to know is where we can make up the revenue which the Senator so generously gives away.

Mr. GERRY. I have already suggested two means.

Mr. LODGE. Gasoline?

Mr. GERRY. If they agree to my amendment——

Mr. LODGE. Double the corporation tax and put a tax on gasoline?

Mr. GERRY. That could very well be done, and probably other methods could be devised if my amendment is agreed to.

Mr. LODGE. And it will be necessary to keep the nuisance taxes?

Mr. GERRY. I think many of the so-called nuisance taxes could be eliminated.

Mr. LODGE. They must be retained?

Mr. GERRY. No; not all of them.

Mr. LODGE. I only desired to get the Senator's views.

Mr. GERRY. Oh, no; the Senator misunderstands me.

Mr. LODGE. I wished to get the Senator's idea of what he thought was a really good bill.

Mr. GERRY. No; the Senator misunderstood me. I did not say to keep the nuisance taxes. I said to keep some of the so-called nuisance taxes on great luxuries.

Mr. LODGE. I merely wanted to find out what the Senator thought a really good bill.

Mr. GERRY. It could not be worse than this one.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Rhode Island yield to the Senator from Tennessee?

Mr. GERRY. I yield.

Mr. McKELLAR. As I understand it, the Senator from Rhode Island agrees with public opinion in general that this is the worst possible tax bill that could be presented to the Senate.

Mr. GERRY. I will say to the Senator from Tennessee that I think I am with the vast majority in my position on the bill.

Mr. McKELLAR. I think the Senator is, too.

Mr. GERRY. The bill was prepared hastily without proper consideration, and the result was that since it came before the Senate it has been revised, and will continue to be revised.

The sole purpose of the bill as originally introduced was to take the taxes off of the very wealthy and off of the large corporations. Those were the two main features of the bill. Since the bill has come into the Senate it has been amended in regard to the individual income taxes, and I do not know what is going to be done in regard to the corporation taxes. We can only tell that as the debate develops.

They have also struck out the nuisance taxes, many of them very wisely. I think many of those taxes were indefensible and should have been stricken out, but I think some of them, on some of the great luxuries, might possibly be left in.

My attitude in presenting the amendment is that I believe it does justice to a majority of our people. It does something that ought to be done. I simply suggested two methods that could very well be worked out, and I am sure there are many others which would not do an injustice to the community and would enable it to bear the burden of taxation very much better than as it is being distributed by the pending bill.

Mr. TRAMMELL. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Rhode Island yield to the Senator from Florida?

Mr. GERRY. With pleasure.

Mr. TRAMMELL. I wish to state, in the first place, that I am heartily in sympathy with the object which the Senator seeks to accomplish. I should like to know with regard to the amendment whether or not it is intended that this reduced rate shall apply to the taxable year 1921.

Mr. GERRY. No. I have made it conform to the rest of the bill, to apply to the year 1922. It will be so late in the year before the bill will be passed that it would be impracticable to make it apply to the year 1921, although I do think it would have been much better if we had reduced the taxes for this year. That is probably another one of the results of the delay of our friends on the other side of the Chamber. However, in addition to that, there was a practical reason. I felt that if I had any chance of having my amendment agreed to, it was better to make it applicable to the year 1922.

Mr. TRAMMELL. As I said, I am heartily in sympathy with the general purpose and object of the Senator from Rhode Island, but I do not quite sympathize with that provision of his amendment which seeks to give this reduction beginning only with the taxable year 1922.

Mr. GERRY. It is the calendar year 1922, not the taxable year 1922.

Mr. TRAMMELL. I call the Senator's attention to the way his amendment reads: On page 23, line 1, after the words "United States," to insert the words: "for each taxable year up to and including the calendar year 1921."

Mr. GERRY. It is the calendar year 1921 there, and then the Senator will see that it is provided further for the calendar year 1922, and so forth.

Mr. TRAMMELL. As I construe the proposed amendment it means that as amended the section would read as follows:

Provided, That in the case of a citizen or resident of the United States for each taxable year up to and including the calendar year 1921 the rate upon the first $4,000 in excess of such amount shall be 4 per centum.

That means that the tax which is assessable for the year 1921, the returns upon which will be made during the calendar year 1922, shall not participate in this reduction. Very largely it is the policy throughout the bill, where a reduction is made, for that reduction to be made applicable to the taxable year 1921 which is returnable during the calendar year 1922. I would very much prefer having the reduction made applicable for the year 1921, just the same as is true in regard to certain other reductions proposed relative to the surtax and such rearrangement and modification as proposed by the bill in regard to many other features of taxation.

Mr. GERRY. I entirely concur in the desire of the Senator from Florida, but as I said I did not think it was practicable, and as the revenues estimated to be raised for the later year were a less amount, I thought that it was probably wiser to make it 1922, especially if I had any hope of having my amendment agreed to.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Rhode Island yield to the Senator from Ohio?

Mr. GERRY. Certainly.

Mr. POMERENE. It was contended during the debate when the effort was made, and successfully, to reduce the surtax from 68 per cent to 50 per cent above certain brackets that if that were done it would encourage investment and industry. If that argument is true as applied to those who were taxable under the higher brackets, would it not be true likewise as to the three million or more business men who would be affected by the proposed amendment of the Senator?

Mr. GERRY. The Senator from Ohio is entirely correct in that. That is one of the objects of my amendment. It would undoubtedly encourage prosperity and the turning of more money into business channels, the building of small houses, and so forth. As the number of people in the brackets affected is so large, it would undoubtedly have a very beneficial effect.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, the Senator from Rhode Island stated a short time ago that the bill had not received proper consideration in the Finance Committee; that if it had received that proper consideration, of course, it would have been modified, as the Senator thinks, in accordance with his wishes. I do not understand that the Senator from Rhode Island offered this amendment at all in the committee, but he can correct me if I am in error on that.

Mr. GERRY. The Senator is correct in that. After the committee completed its labors I studied the entire bill, and then introduced the amendment in the Senate when the bill was reported. When the bill was reported to the Senate I think the transcript of the evidence of the experts was just then completed, or perhaps was not completed until after the bill was reported.

Mr. McCUMBER. One of the difficulties under which the committee labored was the continued absence of the Senator from Rhode Island. I am not criticizing the Senator; he undoubtedly was so busy in the other senatorial duties that it was impossible to attend the Committee on Finance very often. Nevertheless, the committee was without his advice on these matters at a time in which it would have been valuable.

I wish to say that the junior Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH] was seldom absent a moment from the committee meetings, and he assisted the committee greatly in the matter of perfecting the bill and making it, as I thought, better. The suggestions and amendments offered by him were very often adopted by the committee. If we had had that constant attendance from those others who now criticize the efficiency of the committee, probably we would have had a bill that would have suited us all the better.

Mr. GERRY. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from North Dakota yield to the Senator from Rhode Island?

Mr. McCUMBER. Certainly.

Mr. GERRY. The Senator from North Dakota has just stated that the Senator from Rhode Island was continually absent from the committee.

Mr. McCUMBER. He was absent from most of our meetings.

Mr. GERRY. I am quite willing to let the record show whether that is true or not. The Senator from Rhode Island was not absent, he is very sure, more than a day or two at the time when the bill was under consideration. As a matter of fact, the Senator from Rhode Island was in attendance a good deal more than the Republican members of the committee, not even excluding the chairman.

Mr. McCUMBER. I do not remember the Senator assisting us a great deal in suggestions or otherwise in the committee. I was present at all the committee meetings, and I do not think the committee is subject to the criticism of inattention that has been made of it by the Senator from Rhode Island, because I know that Democratic Senators were present at our meetings. The Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH] was there continuously. The Senator from North Carolina [Mr. SIMMONS] was present most of the time. Those Senators had considerable to do in the matter of discussing every point, and I think everything was pretty fairly well considered.

Mr. GERRY. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from North Dakota yield to the Senator from Rhode Island?

Mr. McCUMBER. I yield.

Mr. GERRY. The Senator has made a statement which I do not think is borne out by the facts. If the Senator will get the record of the committee, I think he will find that the attendance of the Senator from Rhode Island compares very favorably with that of any other member of the committee.

Mr. PENROSE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from North Dakota yield to the Senator from Pennsylvania?

Mr. McCUMBER. I yield.

Mr. PENROSE. I do not want to get into a discussion of this trivial character, but the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. GERRY] has gone out of his way to reflect on the efficiency of the Finance Committee. I want to say to him and to the Senate, since he brings the subject up, that his presence and participation with the committee was negligible. I do not believe 1 per cent of the meetings of the committee were attended by him. A complete record was kept by my direction of those Senators who attended the committee meetings and answered the various roll calls. If the Senator from Rhode Island wants to be confronted with that record, I will produce it next week.

So far as his giving any advice or lending any assistance or expressing any willingness to serve on any subcommittee are concerned, absence and indifference were the predominating notes. For him now to have the effrontery to refer in the way he has to the actions of the committee after his own course ill becomes him.

Mr. GERRY. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from North Dakota again yield to the Senator from Rhode Island?

Mr. McCUMBER. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. GERRY. Mr. President, the Senator from Pennsylvania I know can not well judge whether I was at the committee meetings or not. His statement that I was there only 1 per cent of the time is absolutely unfounded in fact. The Senator from Pennsylvania himself was rarely at the committee meetings at any time in the afternoon, and probably was absent more than nearly any other Senator. The Senator from North Dakota [Mr. MCCUMBER] had charge of the bill. Of course, if Senators on the other side wish simply to make assertions which are not in conformity with the facts of the case, the Senator from Rhode Island can say nothing but deny them.

Mr. PENROSE. Mr. President——

Mr. McCUMBER. I yield to the Senator from Pennsylvania.

Mr. PENROSE. In that connection I desire to say that since the Committee on Finance was organized, after the 4th of March, not a single meeting, in good or bad weather, has been missed by me. Not only have I been there promptly, not a moment late, but I have attended sessions, so far as it was reasonable to expect me to attend them or as was necessary for me to attend them. When not actually in the committee room, although I do not need or care to speak in my own defense, for I do not need one, I was in the committee suite, frequently seeing constituents of the Senator from Rhode Island who were unable to find him or to secure information as to the progress of the bill.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, I want first to call the Senator's attention to the amount that is involved in his amendment. The Senator places the figures, after a reconsideration, at $135,000,000, but Dr. Adams, of the Treasury Department, estimates that, in his opinion, the amount would be nearer $150,000,000. Of course, as suggested by the Senator from Massachusetts, if we deduct that amount from the lower brackets of the income tax, we have got to make it up somewhere else; and I do not know of any way of making it up anywhere else unless we increase some of the other taxes instead of reducing them.

However, I wanted to give to the Senator and to the Senate what the taxes would be under the present law. I have not the complete figures as to what they would be under the amendment which has been adopted to-day; but take a person who now receives an income of $2,000 per annum, if he be a married man, even though he has no children, he pays no tax whatever. If he has an income of $2,500, he pays eight-tenths of 1 per cent; if he has an income of $3,000, his income tax is 1.33 per cent; if he has a net income of $3,500, his tax is 1.71 per cent; if he has an income of $4,000, his tax is 2 per cent; if he has an income of $4,500, it is 2.22 per cent; if he has an income of $5,000, his tax is 2.40 per cent; and on an income of $5,500 the tax is 2.64 per cent.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from North Dakota yield to the Senator from Ohio?

Mr. McCUMBER. I yield.

Mr. POMERENE. I am not sure that I understand the figures which are now being stated by the Senator from North Dakota. Is he giving the percentage of the tax to the total income?

Mr. McCUMBER. Yes; I have stated the amounts which the taxpayer would pay on his total income.

Under the amendment which has been adopted to-day I have a few figures applying to incomes above the amount last named, but I have not the figures for incomes below that amount. If a man had an income of $6,000 he would pay an income tax of 2.7 per cent; if he had an income of $7,000, as the bill now stands, he would pay 3.6 per cent; if he had an income of $8,000 he would pay 4.3 per cent; if he had an income of $10,000 he would say 5.2 per cent; if he had an income of $12,000 he would pay 6 per cent.

Now, reducing the figures to dollars and cents, a person who had an income of $2,500 would pay $20; if he had an income of $3,000 he would pay $40; if he had an income of $3,500 he would pay an income tax of $60; and if he had an income of $4,000 he would pay an income tax of $80. These are not really heavy income taxes, and no allowance is made for children. If there were any children the tax would be considerably reduced.

As I say, I have not all the figures under the revised proposition, but probably the taxes would be 10, 15, or 20 per cent lower than the sums I have stated. So the tax in the lower brackets is not a heavy one after the deductions of $2,000 and $2,500 have been made; and inasmuch as there is no way, so far as I can see, of conveniently making up the deficiency somewhere else, it seems to me that it is inadvisable, to say the least, to make a reduction that would affect $150,000,000 of revenue.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, will the Senator permit me to ask him a question?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from North Dakota yield to the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. McCUMBER. Certainly.

Mr. REED. If a very moderate excess-profits tax was retained in the bill, it would take care of the reduction brought about in the revenues by the amendment proposed by the Senator from Rhode Island, would it not?

Mr. McCUMBER. It might, Mr. President; I can conceive of many ways, of course, by which we could make up the deficiency, if the Senate wants to adopt such means, although it is generally understood that for the benefit of the business of the country, present and future, the excess-profits tax had better be eliminated. However, there is no necessity of going into that question again; we have argued that here over and over again on both sides, perhaps for months, and it seems to me that as to those questions the time has now arrived to vote rather than further to discuss them.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, the Senator from Massachusetts asked the Senator from Rhode Island where we were to get revenue to replace the revenue which would be taken away? The Senator from Rhode Island suggested one or two sources, and I ventured to suggest that a very moderate excess-profits tax would realize a sufficient sum so that the amendment offered by the Senator from Rhode Island could be adopted and the so-called nuisance taxes taken off.

In that connection I wish to say that the very popular phrase "nuisance taxes," like a good many other catch phrases, sounds better than it is. My own judgment about the matter is that there are a very large number of such so-called taxes that ought to be retained because the burden falls very lightly upon the people. They are largely luxury taxes; they are a nuisance only to the people who have to pay them.

Mr. LODGE rose.

Mr. REED. I wish to inquire now if it is the purpose to have an executive session or to go on with this bill?

Mr. LODGE. I did not hear the Senator's question.

Mr. REED. The Senator from Massachusetts was on his feet, and I thought perhaps he intended to move an executive session.

Mr. LODGE. What I intended to do, Mr. President, was to ask that the amendment proposed by the Senator from Rhode Island may go over, because I desire to secure some official figures in regard to what it will cost and also, if I can, to secure some official figures as to what revenue is likely to be raised by a tax on gasoline and other taxes proposed to take the place of the tax which it is suggested be eliminated. We have not those figures here to-night, and I should like to get them from the Treasury before we go further with the matter.

Mr. REED. I think the request is a very reasonable one.

Mr. LODGE. If it is agreeable, however, I should be very glad to move a short executive session.

Mr. PENROSE. Mr. President, I recognize that there is a widespread desire for an executive session at the week end. I had hoped to continue somewhat longer the consideration of the pending bill, but I will not oppose a motion to have the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business. I wish to say, however, to the Senate—and in making the statement I hope and believe I will have the support of the majority party—that after Monday next I shall ask the Senate to hold evening sessions and meet, perhaps, very soon thereafter at 10 o'clock in the morning in order to secure the early disposition of the bill. The delays have frequently been frivolous and unprofitable, and I shall not any longer sit idly by and permit, so far as I am concerned, the Senate to continue to tolerate such practices as have been indulged in without going distinctly on record before the American people as to whether the purpose is to pass this bill or not.

Mr. LODGE and Mr. REED addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Massachusetts.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Mr. President——

Mr. LODGE. I will yield to the Senator from New Jersey, if he desires.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I merely wish to remark that of all the frivolous and useless things that have occurred during this debate, it seems to me that the constant lecturing of the Senate by the chairman of the committee stands preeminent.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I thought I had the floor.

Mr. SIMMONS. And the chairman of the committee has frequently lectured the Senate when there was no occasion for such lectures.

Mr. WATSON of Indiana. Mr. President——

Mr. LODGE. I have been recognized.

Mr. WATSON of Indiana. I was merely about to ask the Senator to yield to me for a moment.

Mr. LODGE. I will yield to the Senator from Indiana if some Senator on the other side does not intervene and prevent my doing so.

Mr. WATSON of Indiana. I merely wish to make a statement as to the necessity for early action on the pending measure.

Mr. President, at the last session Congress passed a budget law, which provides:

> The President shall transmit to Congress on the first day of each regular session—

That is the first Monday in December—> the budget, which shall set forth in summary and in detail:

> (a) Estimates of the expenditures and appropriations necessary, in his judgment, for the support of the Government for the ensuing fiscal year.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. President, I ask for order in the Chamber. The Senator from Indiana, I presume, desires to secure unanimous consent. We can not understand what he desires unanimous consent for until we hear his request.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Indiana will suspend until Senators take their seats and there is order in the Chamber.

Mr. WATSON of Indiana. Mr. President, I merely wish to make a brief statement occupying about a minute.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I wanted to hear the Senator, and I could not do so.

Mr. WATSON of Indiana. The law provides further that the budget transmitted by the President shall also set forth—

> (b) His estimates of the receipts of the Government during the ensuing fiscal year, under (1) laws existing at the time the budget is transmitted and also (2) under the revenue proposals, if any, contained in the budget.

In order that the provisions of the budget law may be fulfilled it is almost imperative that we should have just as early action on the bill now pending as is possible without rushing it through with too great haste.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Mr. President, will my colleague yield?

Mr. LODGE. I yield to my colleague; certainly.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Before the Senate adjourns I wish to say a brief word about the reference that has been made by the chairman of the Finance Committee concerning the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. GERRY].

I do not want any impression to go forth, from what has been said here, that the Senator from Rhode Island has not been diligent and painstaking in attending to his duties as a member of the Committee on Finance. I have reason to know that at one time his own personal illness and later illness in his own family prevented him from attending some meetings of the Committee on Finance, not only while this revenue bill was before the committee but also while the tariff question was before the committee; but my recollection is that upon the whole his attendance has been very good and compares favorably with that of the other members of the committee. I want to say further that I know that he has given a great deal of thought and study and a great deal of time to this matter which he has presented to the Senate to-day. He has discussed it with the experts of the department, and at his own expense, out of his own pocket, has paid money to employ experts to assist him in obtaining complete information on questions involved in his amendment and this revenue bill.

I thank my colleague for giving me this opportunity by yielding the floor to say what I have in behalf of the Senator from Rhode Island. I repeat, the services of the junior Senator from Rhode Island have been valuable and useful, and he has been a capable and able member of the committee and one whom the minority members of that committee esteem, and whose special knowledge of certain features of the revenue laws, such as the estate tax laws, for instance, is unexcelled.

Mr. STANLEY. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Massachusetts yield to the Senator from Kentucky?

Mr. LODGE. I yield.

Mr. STANLEY. Not as a member of the Finance Committee but as a member of this body and a member of this side of the Senate, I desire to say that assertions as to a lack of diligence on the part of the Senator from Rhode Island are preposterous and amusing. We upon this side know the grave responsibilities that are placed upon his shoulders. We understand his disinterestedness, his exalted devotion to duty, and his constant attendance upon those duties in this body whenever it has been physically possible.

REPORTS OF BOARD OF VISITORS TO NAVAL ACADEMY.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of the Navy, transmitting, in partial response to Senate resolution 132, agreed to August 15, 1921, the reports of the Board of Visitors to the United States Naval Academy for the years 1917, 1918, 1919, and 1920, which, with the accompanying reports, was referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. TOWNSEND presented a petition of a select committee representing the St. Stephen African Methodist Episcopal Church, of Detroit, Mich., praying for the enactment of House bill 13, to assure to persons within the jurisdiction of every State the equal protection of the laws, and to punish the crime of lynching, which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

He also presented a petition of sundry citizens of Greenville, Mich., praying for the enactment of legislation repealing the present stamp tax on medicine, and opposing any other kind of tax on medicine, which was ordered to lie on the table.

He also presented a resolution adopted by the Grand Rapids (Mich.) Circle of the Child Conservation League of America, favoring the holding of such a conference on limitation of armaments as will be open to public knowledge and criticism and reflect a consciousness of the public mind, which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. WILLIS presented a resolution of the city council of Cleveland, Ohio, protesting against the enactment of legislation making building and loan associations subject to income tax, etc., which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. CAPPER presented a resolution adopted October 6, 1921, by Joabert Lodge of Perfection No. 6, Ancient and Accepted Scottish Rite, of Fort Scott, Kans., favoring the enactment of legislation providing adequate relief for disabled ex-service men, which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

REPORT OF COMMITTEE ON PUBLIC BUILDINGS AND GROUNDS.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN, from the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, to which was referred the bill (S. 2425) granting permission to the city of Plainfield, N. J., to widen Watchung Avenue in front of the Federal post office building, and for other purposes, reported it without amendment.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Bills were introduced, read the first time, and, by unanimous consent, the second time, and referred as follows:

MISSOURI RIVER BRIDGE.

Mr. CALDER. Mr. President, will the Senator from Massachusetts yield to me?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Massachusetts yield to the Senator from New York?

Mr. LODGE. I yield.

Mr. CALDER. The Senator from Minnesota [Mr. NELSON] is very anxious to have an important bridge bill reported from the Committee on Commerce and passed this evening. The bill is unanimously reported, and there is no objection to it. I also submit a report (No. 302) thereon.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, the bill will be received.

The READING CLERK. From the Committee on Commerce, the Senator from New York reports back favorably the bill (S. 2588) extending the time for the construction of a bridge by the Chicago, Milwaukee & St. Paul Railway Co. across the Missouri River at Chamberlain, S. Dak.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from New York asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill, which was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the time for completing the construction of the bridge authorized by section 1 of the act of Congress approved April 28, 1916, is hereby extended three years from April 28, 1922.

SEC. 2. That the right to alter, amend, or repeal this act is hereby expressly reserved.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. LODGE. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to, and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After 10 minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened.

RECESS.

Mr. LODGE. I move that the Senate take a recess until Monday at 11 o'clock.

JOURNAL, HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, HAWAIIAN LEGISLATURE.

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a communication from the secretary of the Territory of Hawaii, transmitting, pursuant to law, copy of the journal of the House of Representatives of the Eleventh Legislature of the Territory of Hawaii, regular session, 1921, which was referred to the Committee on Territories and Insular Possessions.

PETITION.

Mr. HARRIS presented a resolution adopted by the Bainbridge (Ga.) Board of Trade, favoring the proposed objects contemplated in holding the conference on limitation of armaments, particularly a drastic reduction of naval and military expenditures so as to decrease taxation, which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Bills were introduced, read the first time, and, by unanimous consent, the second time, and referred as follows:

By Mr. SMOOT:

A bill (S. 2618) to authorize the exchange of certain lands within the Wasatch National Forest, Utah; to the Committee on Public Lands and Surveys.

By Mr. POINDEXTER:

A bill (S. 2619) granting an increase of pension to Annie King; to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. FRANCE:

A bill (S. 2620) to create a board of adjustment, which shall constitute a wage board and board of appeals for employees of navy yards and arsenals, and to define its powers and duties; to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

By Mr. WADSWORTH:

A bill (S. 2621) authorizing the President to dispose of certain arms and ammunition seized in pursuance of the act approved June 15, 1917, along the Mexican border; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

By Mr. LODGE:

A bill (S. 2622) to incorporate the American Mathematical Society; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

AMENDMENT OF TAX REVISION BILL.

Mr. KING submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to House bill 8245, the tax revision bill, which was ordered to lie on the table and to be printed.

TAX REVISION.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 8245) to reduce and equalize taxation, to amend and simplify the revenue act of 1918, and for other purposes.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is upon agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Rhode Island to the amendment of the committee, proposing to insert section 210. The amendment to the amendment will be stated.

The READING CLERK. It is proposed to amend section 210 by inserting in the proviso on page 23, line 1, after the words "United States," the words:

And by adding the following proviso at the end of line 2, page 23:

Provided further, That for the calendar year 1922 and each calendar year thereafter, in the case of a citizen or resident of the United States, the rate upon the first $5,000 of such excess amount shall be 2 per cent; the rate upon the second additional $5,000 of such excess amount shall be 4 per cent; the rate upon the third additional $5,000 of such excess amount shall be 6 per cent.

Mr. PENROSE. On that I ask for a vote, Mr. President.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Mr. President, I wish to make a few observations about the pending amendment. A very general and serious criticism that has been made of this revenue bill is that it is discriminatory. In relieving our people of the war burdens of taxation the bill as reported has sought to relieve only two classes of our citizenship, the highly successful corporate interests of the country and the extremely wealthy class. Every Senator in the Chamber who has spoken against the measure has referred to this fatal weakness—its favoritism to certain classes.

Personally, I think that there is a good deal to be said in favor of the removal of some of the war-time tax burdens from the corporations of this country; I think there is something to be said in favor of lessening somewhat the high surtaxes upon the extremely wealthy class of this country; but there is nothing that can be said in favor of removing the burdens of taxation from those two classes without relieving also the great middle class of American people—those of moderate incomes. The same arguments for relief apply to all alike. All classes should at once have their taxes lowered.

Upon what theory was the tax law framed during the World War? I was not in the Senate; but I have been told again and again that great care and consideration were given in the measure with the end in view of making the corporation interests, the wealthy class, and the great middle class of individuals, equally bear the financial burdens of the war. All were to pay in equal proportion the taxes which were necessary to be levied and thereby provide revenue which had to be raised in order successfully to wage the war. If it is true that all were burdened alike, on the theory of ability to pay, then the pending bill is subject to very serious criticism, in that it has not sought in distributing relief to extend it equally to all classes.

Three classes were to be heavily taxed when we sought to raise taxes in order to meet the expenses of the war. Every individual was required to pay an income tax, those possessing wealth or receiving excessively large incomes were to pay surtaxes, and the corporations of the country were to pay corporation taxes of various kinds. The war is over, but the burdens of the war remain and will continue for years to come; the necessity of raising money to pay for the expenses of the war will exist for years to come; yet in the very first effort to relieve the people of the country, to readjust our burdensome taxes, what has been suggested by the majority party of this Senate?

Mr. PENROSE. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Massachusetts yield to the Senator from Pennsylvania?

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. I yield.

Mr. PENROSE. Will the Senator permit an inquiry at that point?

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Certainly.

Mr. PENROSE. Has the Senator from Massachusetts any idea as to how much revenue the Treasury would be deprived of under the amendment he is discussing?

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Yes, sir.

Mr. PENROSE. What is the Senator's estimate of that amount?

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. I am informed that it would be about $135,000,000.

Mr. PENROSE. I am informed that it would be nearer $150,000,000.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. I must say to the chairman of the Committee on Finance, with all due respect to the experts, that I never yet have obtained the same answer from the experts on a second or third inquiry when attempts have been made to ascertain what the losses or gains were to be from certain forms of taxation. I do not say that in any criticism of the experts, because I think it is very often impossible to obtain a uniform answer.

Mr. PENROSE. I agree with the Senator from Massachusetts, and I know that it is difficult to get more than an approximate estimate in reference to these matters. The difference between $135,000,000 and $150,000,000 is considerable, but it is evident, whichever figure may be correct, that there would be a great loss of revenue involved. I should like to ask the Senator from Massachusetts what substitute he has in mind for this loss of revenue?

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. I shall be very glad to discuss that matter when I develop my argument.

Mr. PENROSE. Of course, it would be a wonderfully desirable thing if the amendment could be adopted and the revenue could be made up from some other convenient source.

Mr. POMERENE. May I have the attention of the chairman of the Committee on Finance?

Mr. PENROSE. Yes.

Mr. POMERENE. The figures which the Senator from Pennsylvania has just given were the same as the estimates given on Saturday afternoon last?

Mr. PENROSE. Yes.

Mr. POMERENE. At that time the senior Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] suggested that he desired an adjournment so that more definite information on the subject might be obtained. Has the Senator from Pennsylvania obtained that information or are the figures which he now has given simply confirmatory of the statement which was made on Saturday last?

Mr. PENROSE. I think that the Senate is in possession of figures which are approximately near enough to show a very substantial loss of revenue and to justify the query as to the source from which the deficiency shall be made up.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President——

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. I want to resume my argument, and I shall be glad to answer the question asked by the Senator from Pennsylvania later. However, I will yield now to the Senator from North Carolina.

Mr. SIMMONS. I think the figures which were given by the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. GERRY] on Saturday last are correct—at least, those were the figures which I understand were furnished by Mr. McCoy—that $135,000,000 would be lost by the adoption of the amendment proposed by the Senator from Rhode Island.

Mr. GERRY. The Senator from North Carolina is correct The figures were around $135,000,000, which estimate was agreed to by Mr. McCoy.

Mr. SIMMONS. That is my understanding. Will the Senator from Massachusetts pardon a further interruption?

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Certainly.

Mr. SIMMONS. While I recognize the fact that if any of the taxes proposed to be imposed by the pending bill are reduced it will be necessary to make up the loss of revenue in some other way, it does not seem to me that that is a conclusive answer and even a good answer to make why an unjust tax should not be eliminated.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Exactly. If there is an unjust tax in the law, it should be eliminated and some other method found to raise the revenue that is necessary.

Now, Mr. President, I wish to resume my argument in reference to the bill generally. There are two defects in this bill that must certainly condemn it before the country. Although a great deal has been done to improve the bill as reported out by the majority of the committee by amendments which have been suggested on the floor—and, no doubt, the bill will be improved further by other amendments which will be suggested later—yet there are still left in the bill errors or discrepancies which make it absolutely indefensible.

The first is that this bill reduces the taxes of profit-making corporations and increases the taxes of all nonprofit-making corporations. That can not be denied. Every corporation which has been making more than 14 per cent will have its taxes reduced, while every corporation which has been making from 1 to 14 per cent will have its taxes increased. That is what it means to take off the excess-profits tax and to increase the income corporation tax from 10 to 15 per cent. That is how this change is going to work out.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, will the Senator point out how that is brought about?

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. At the present time all corporations are taxed 10 per cent on their net income, and those that make a profit of over 8 per cent on their invested capital have, in addition, to pay an excess-profits tax. The excess-profits tax is to be eliminated, but a flat increase from 10 to 15 per cent is to be made on the net income of all corporations regardless of whether or not they make excess profits. What will be the result? The result will be that all corporations earning less than 8 per cent on their capital stock and now only paying 10 per cent on their net income will after the enactment of this bill have to pay 15 per cent, so that the poor, struggling, limited profit-making corporations will have their burdens of taxation increased under this bill, notwithstanding the fact that it is a peace time, not a war tax, bill which seeks to lessen the burdens of taxation rather than to increase them. To cover this injustice I have an amendment to propose, which I shall discuss later. Now, recurring to the other proposition——

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, are all excess-profits taxes eliminated?

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. All excess-profits taxes of every kind and description have been eliminated in this bill, and in their place an increase from 10 to 15 per cent has been made in the corporation net income tax. That will apply to every corporation, whether it makes excess profits or not.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, what is the argument which is used in favor of increasing the corporation tax on those corporations earning the lesser percentage of profits and advancing it on those with the higher percentage of profits?

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. The only argument that I know is that $450,000,000 has been taken away from the Treasury of the United States by the elimination of the excess-profits tax, and some means—some way—has got to be found to make up that loss. The only means, so far as I have been able to see, that have been suggested in this bill are to increase from 10 to 15 per cent the net income tax upon all corporations.

Mr. POMERENE. So, Mr. President, it must follow then that, instead of decreasing the taxes of the corporations which were occasioned by the war, we are increasing them if they have a low earning power?

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. That is absolutely the fact.

Mr. PENROSE. Mr. President, did I understand the Senator from Massachusetts to make the statement that he could possibly see his way clear to support a proposition to reduce the surtax adjustment very considerably in case the excess-profits taxes are retained?

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. I do not think that I quite catch the purport of the question of the Senator from Pennsylvania. I have been trying to say that I can see something in the argument for the reduction or the elimination of the excess-profits tax; I can see force in the argument for the reduction of the surtaxes; but I can not see any force whatever in the removal or the reduction of those taxes while not one single cent is taken off the normal tax which the average moderate-income citizen must pay. That is one of the fatal weaknesses of the bill.

If the Senator from Pennsylvania and those who stand sponsor for this bill desire to confound their enemies and to prevent any opposition whatever from any political party to this bill, they have it in their power to do so by going before the country and saying: "Yes; we have reduced the excess-profit taxes of corporations, we have reduced the surtaxes of the rich, but we have also reduced the taxes of the three millions or more of people who pay only a normal tax or a very slight surtax." I repeat, they can confound their enemies, they can stifle the opposition to this bill in the country and in this Chamber with a proposition of reducing the taxes on all classes and not merely on two classes. Why the majority fail to see their opportunity to stifle opposition is incomprehensible. Who are these people that the Senator from Rhode Island suggests in his amendment should be given some relief?

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, let me ask a further question. I am asking these questions because I am obliged to go to a committee meeting. As we were only relieving those who pay the surtaxes and the excess-profits taxes, what reason is there to differentiate them from the others which prompted the pending measure?

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Mr. President, the Senator from Ohio has suggested a very pertinent question. The reason is this: The corporations are organized. The wealthy class are organized. They have political influence. They are prominent in the leadership of political parties. They have mantained a propaganda that has been tremendous in favor of the reduction of their taxes. On the other hand, the normal tax class are unorganized, they have no propaganda agencies, they have no political influence in shaping legislation. There has been no propaganda whatever in favor of the reduction of the taxes of the average citizen of America, the great middle class. Those taxpayers are busy earning an honest and comfortable livelihood; they have no time to lobby. I repeat, who are they? The very backbone of America. They are the men of limited incomes; the men who have incomes of from $1,000 to $15,000, whom somebody has described as the "bone and sinew" of America.

A great deal has been said here about the excess-profits tax and the high surtaxes taking money of the capitalistic class away from production enterprises. It is claimed the productive forces and the financial investment class have limited and restricted their business ventures because of these high surtaxes and the excess-profits tax. Let us see. Who are the citizens who do not invest their money in tax-exempt securities, but who build homes and who buy stocks in the industrial enterprises of this country? Who are the group that do more for production than any other class in this country? Who are those who take chances by investing in uncertain and new business undertakings? It is the man who, with a capital of $50,000 or $100,000, has an income of $5,000 to $15,000 per year. It is the man who has a salary of $5,000 or $10,000 a year. That is the great investing class. That is the class that buy the industrial bonds. That is the class that buy the industrial stocks. That is the class that invest in real estate. The other class put their money into the most conservative investments. More than half the Members of this body are lawyers, and we have all had to deal with estates; and what have been the securities that you have found in the estates of the very wealthy class? Tax-exempt securities almost invariably; but you will find that the men who have a capital of $100,000, yielding an income of $5,000 a year, invariably invest in those investment securities that pertain to the industrial life of the country and are included in what we call the productive class of investments. Not one word has been spoken for this class. There is not one sentence in this bill to give after-war relief to this great class of American citizens. They are still to bear the same tax burdens as during this war. Scarcely one penny will come off their tax bills; but the great profit-making corporations and the wealthy surtax payers are to receive the first relief that this Government gives at the end of a war which was won by the sacrifices of all, the poor as well as the rich.

How can you face the voters of America? You can go before a public audience in America and ask those who pay the excess-profits tax to stand up and tell them that the Republican Party is entitled to their support because you have eliminated their taxes. You can ask the taxpayers who have incomes of over $100,000 to stand up in any public audience and ask them to be grateful to you. But what of those who have incomes of $5,000 or $10,000? What shall you say to them? You must say to them: "The Republican Party has forgotten you, has refused in any substantial manner to lessen your tax burden, notwithstanding the fact that the war is over, and notwithstanding the fact that there has been a general revision of our war taxation laws."

Of course if during the war you had let the individual off free, or with very little taxes, and you had unitedly—for I understand it was a practically unanimous vote, Democrats and Republicans—agreed that the war should be paid for by the rich alone, then you would be justified at this stage in relieving only the rich; but, my friends, the utmost care, the utmost study and thought was given to the principle of making those best able to pay carry their proportion of the tax burden imposed upon the American people during the war, and the figures were worked out so admirably well, increasing the burdens step by step as incomes and profits accumulated.

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Massachusetts yield to the Senator from Georgia?

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. Just at that point, to illustrate what the Senator is saying, I call his attention to the fact that the administration published their program in August, and put the whole country on notice that their intention was to take $450,000,000 off the excess-profits taxpayers, $262,000,000 from the railroad companies or those who bought the tickets of the railroad companies, $90,000,000 from the surtaxes of the extremely rich, and $15,000,000 from those who can buy expensive furs and sporting goods. They said so in August, and the Democratic Party had a fine opportunity to go before the country on that issue, and did not do so.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. The Democratic Party has always lost the confidence of the American people when it has abandoned domestic issues, and made the international issues paramount.

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. I agree with the Senator.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. The Democratic Party's strength in this country is its program upon domestic issues, its position on economic questions, with instilling the masses of the American people with confidence in its ability to champion their cause, and to hold back and to check the selfishness and the greed of that class of extremely rich who look to the Government to relieve them of burdens of taxation and to extend special privileges to them.

Do you want to make this measure nonpartisan? Do you want to stifle Democratic opposition Do you want to remove this issue from the next campaign? There is one way of doing it. Say to the country that all, every class, rich and poor, those of limited income and those of excess-profit incomes, shall be equally relieved in part of the burdens of war taxation.

I can not understand why the Senators upon the other side of the Chamber have allowed this bill to be reported and are about to enact it into law, leaving this weapon in the hands of the minority, and, as the Senator from Ohio [Mr. POMERENE] says, without even discussing its merits.

Mr. PENROSE. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Massachusetts yield to the Senator from Pennsylvania?

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Certainly.

Mr. PENROSE. Will the Senator permit me to call his attention to a matter which he seems to have overlooked, or not to have reached?

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Yes.

Mr. PENROSE. The Senator does not mention the additional exemption of $500 to married persons in the case of incomes not in excess of $5,000, and the additional exemption of $200 each for dependent children, causing a loss in revenue, I am informed—and I only speak approximately; I do not think it is seriously disputed—of $70,000,000 to relieve the particular class that the Senator now maintains is being oppressed, not to mention the relief to the extent of what I am informed is roughly $55,000,000 from the taxation under the present law on incomes not over $68,000. The Senator has that in mind, has he?

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Yes, Mr. President; I have in mind the relief to which the Senator refers which is given to the heads of families, which, in the most extreme cases, amounts to only about $20 to each individual, and the relief to which the Senator refers extends only to that class of taxpayers whose income is between $2,000, or $2,500 under the new amendment, and $5,000. It is a mere trifle. It does not begin to give any substantial relief to the class under $5,000 income and no benefit to the class with over $5,000 incomes.

There is nothing whatever in this bill, I know the chairman of the committee will agree, which lessens the normal tax upon individuals. Is not that a fact?

Mr. PENROSE. It is a relief to the extent of $70,000,000.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. A relief through exemptions, not through a rate reduction. Heads of families numbering millions are relieved $70,000,000 under this bill. Corporations, only a few thousand of them, are relieved $450,000,000, by the elimination of the excess-profits tax. It is very easy to give figures. I have seen figures given one day and denied the next. It is all a guess. I do not mean to say these men do not mean and intend to give us their very best judgment, but the conditions in this country to-day are such that no man can tell what the yield in taxes will be from any class or any tax in the coming year, and I think the chairman of the committee will agree with me about that.

Mr. PENROSE. The Senator from Massachusetts has been very courteous in permitting interruptions. I want to make only one more statement, and then I shall cease to interfere with the trend of his very able argument. He talks lightly of an income of $400,000,000 from corporations. He loses sight entirely of the additional 5 per cent tax imposed in the bill as it stands on corporations, which will reduce the loss to the Treasury to some $310,000,000.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. What does the Senator say will be the increase in the net income corporation tax if we increase the tax from 10 to 15 per cent?

Mr. PENROSE. Two hundred and sixty-seven million dollars. It is hardly fair to proclaim to the Senate and to the country that $400,000,000 is being given up and entirely overlook the little item of $267,000,000.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. I say to the Senator from Pennsylvania that that is an outrageous tax. To compel the nonprofit-making corporations to pay $267,000,000 in order to relieve the profit-making corporations of paying $450,000,000 is worse than the failure to reduce the normal tax.

Mr. PENROSE. Mr. President, that statement is hardly worthy of the Senator. The tax is on net income and can not be collected from a nonprofit-making corporation.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Does the Senator from Pennsylvania say that the change of net-income tax from 10 to 15 per cent does not mean an increase in the tax on corporations that have not been making excess profits?

Mr. PENROSE. On the net income.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Exactly. I say it does.

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Massachusetts yield to the Senator from Georgia?

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. I yield.

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. I can say, in answer to my good friend the Senator from Pennsylvania, that the official reports of the Internal Revenue Bureau show that there are 10,000 corporations out of thirty thousand-odd which have made net profits of $38,000,000,000 in the last five years, and most of those are in the Senator's own State, I may say.

Mr. WATSON of Indiana. For what year was that?

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. I said for the last five years.

Mr. WATSON of Indiana. During the war period. Does the Senator know what the profits are now?

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. We were not in the war five years.

Mr. WATSON of Indiana. No; but the last five years include the war period. Does the Senator know what were the incomes of those corporations for the last year or two years?

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. I could tell the Senator by a reference to the reports, but it would take me some few minutes to look up that information.

Mr. WATSON of Indiana. That is quite true, but I thought perhaps the Senator had it in mind.

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. Not just at this moment; but I can easily refer to it, and will do so if the Senator from Indiana wants the information.

Mr. WATSON of Indiana. Of course, the increase of 5 per cent in the corporation-income tax, as my friend from Massachusetts well knows, is an increase of 50 per cent in the tax on the net incomes of corporations, and, of course, net income means profits of the corporations.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Exactly; but the dividing line, I think the Senator from Indiana will agree with me, is said to be 14 per cent; in other words, the taking off of the excess-profits tax and the increasing of the net corporation income tax from 10 to 15 per cent results in increasing the taxes of all corporations that have made heretofore from 1 to 14 per cent, while it relieves and lessens the tax of those who have made in excess of 14 per cent.

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. Mr. President, with the permission of the Senator from Massachusetts, I will say to my friend the Senator from Indiana that the reports of the United States Steel Corporation show that, after all deductions made for taxes and the enormous salaries drawn by such men as Elbert Gary, that one corporation has made more net profits every year during its existence than all the millions of men, women, and children, white and black, engaged in agriculture.

Mr. WATSON of Indiana. In the first place, I dispute the Senator's figures.

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. The Senator is disputing those of the Steel Corporation, if he does.

Mr. WATSON of Indiana. In the next place, the Senator forgets the great number of people who are engaged in working for that institution; and, again, the Senator does not state what rate of interest that represents on the money originally invested or at present invested in the Steel Corporation. However, we are wandering away from the argument.

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. Yes; and the Senator will wander away a little further if the Senator from Massachusetts will allow me to make him wander.

Mr. WATSON of Indiana. I am not a bit alarmed about that proposition, I will say to my namesake from Georgia. When we come to discuss the question of aggregate wealth, the returns upon investment, and all that sort of thing, I shall be very glad to go into that with the Senator.

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. I will say to the Senator from Indiana that I have studied that question very closely, and that the Steel Trust, as we commonly call it, takes out, as a part of its expenses, all the wages it pays its men, whom it works day and night, Sunday and Monday, whereas the agricultural class do not allow anything at all for the labor of the man, the wife, and the children.

Mr. WATSON of Indiana. I shall be very glad to go into all that at the proper time. I would be delighted to do it, but this is not the proper time. I want now to ask the Senator from Massachusetts a question.

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. Why should we not discuss it right now?

Mr. WATSON of Indiana. Because it is wide apart from the purpose of the discussion we now have before us. We might as well talk about the doctrine of the transmigration of the soul.

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. If the Senator from Indiana wishes to lower his flag and salute it as he does so, that is his privilege.

Mr. WATSON of Indiana. I want to ask the Senator from Massachusetts a question. Of course, it is the primary business of the Committee on Finance to in some way obtain revenue to run the Government. If the amendment proposed by the Senator from Rhode Island were adopted it would mean a loss in revenue of a hundred and thirty-five million dollars. Will the Senator kindly tell us where the Government would get that much revenue to make up that loss?

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. There are many ways in which we could get the revenue; but I will say right off, without very much reflection, that I would get the revenue, first of all, by not eliminating all excess-profits taxes—eliminating only a part of the excess-profits taxes. Let me repeat—Senators on the other side of the Chamber know that I have not been very much of a partisan in my attitude on this bill—what I said before: You have two serious weaknesses or defects in this bill which make an issue between the Democratic Party and the Republican Party. One is your treatment in this bill of over 150,000 corporations whose taxes are increased, the poorer corporations, so called, by increasing the tax from 10 per cent to 15 per cent of their incomes; secondly, while reducing the taxes of the profit-making corporations and of the extremely wealthy, you have failed to give any relief to the millions who are not wealthy and do not belong to the corporation-profit class or surtax class.

Mr. McLEAN. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Massachusetts yield to the Senator from Connecticut?

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. I yield.

Mr. McLEAN. Does the Senator from Massachusetts know whether the United States Steel Corporation pays an excess-profits tax or not?

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. I understand it will not this year, and has not the past year.

Mr. McLEAN. Then, as far as that corporation, which has been mentioned with so much vigor by the Senator from Georgia, is concerned, it would not be affected by the provision relating to excess-profits taxes.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. I think, if the Senator will permit me a moment, one of the fatal defects of this bill also is that we are abandoning forever the principle of taxing profits.

Mr. McLEAN. If the Steel Corporation does not pay an excess-profits tax this year, we are increasing their taxes by this bill, according to the view of the Senator from Massachusetts.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Yes; that is true.

Mr. McLEAN. Adding 50 per cent to it.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. We are increasing the tax on their net income; that is very true.

Mr. McLEAN. So that the favoritism for corporations complained of by the Senator from Georgia is not carried out by the Senator from Massachusetts.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. That is true; but, while a corporation like the United States Steel Corporation, which does not pay excess profits because of its watered stock, has to pay an increase upon its net income, the United States Steel Corporation is only one of the 99 other corporations which have been making less than 14 per cent, and will have to pay a higher tax than they have in the past.

What are we going to do about it? What can be done about it? A tax bill which relieves the excess-profits tax class, which relieves the surtax class—and there are arguments for relief to both those classes—and a tax bill which relieves the normal tax of the individual is almost immune from any political attack or any attack from an economic tax standpoint.

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. I would like to ask the Senator from Massachusetts and my good friend the Senator from Connecticut, why a Government pretending to administer equal and exact justice to all men should allow any corporation to make excessive profits?

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. I will answer the Senator by stating that, in my opinion, the only way to stop profiteering in this country, and the only way it will ever be stopped, is through a tax upon excess profits beyond a certain amount.

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. That necessarily follows, Mr. President.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. That is the only way to stop it. Confiscate excess profits and profiteering will stop.

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. If any body, corporate or otherwise, makes excessive profits, there must be those who make no profits at all.

Mr. PENROSE. Mr. President, will the Senator from Georgia permit an inquiry on that point?

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. Certainly.

Mr. PENROSE. I am curious to know, Mr. President, what would be the idea of the Senator from Georgia about this case: Suppose a corporation—the United States Steel Corporation or any other—went through a period of five years, for instance, without making a penny, when there were hard times or a period of depression from any cause. Does he contemplate making up the losses? Do not the good years have to be added to the lean years to make a general average over 20 years?

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. I would like to ask the Senator what corporations there were which made losses during the war? We had the dollar-a-year men. Did they lose any money, the men who worked for us at a dollar a year?

Mr. PENROSE. I think they all came here prompted solely by patriotism, and at great sacrifice.

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. And they made a lot of money out of it, too. They bought and sold to and from themselves.

Mr. PENROSE. I do not know about that. They were here regardless of party, and I never suspected the motives of any of them. Mr. Baruch, one of the leading Democrats of the country, Mr. Ryan, and others, were here performing gallant service, together with men like Mr. Vauclain, Mr. Schwab, and others. Whether they made or lost, I do not know. I do not think the incentive of profit ever entered into the thought of any of them. But that was an extraordinary time. I refer to times of peace. Suppose there are extraordinary profits during one year, and five years of lean profits, or no profits showing during a period of 10 years, an even standoff, is it the theory of the Senator from Georgia that the bad years ought to be made good by taking away from the good years?

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. Mr. President, I will answer the Senator with all the candor of my nature and with what knowledge I have of economic questions. I think that every corporation and every individual has a perfect right to make a fair profit on his investment, replacement in the way of repairs, and then a reasonable amount for his personal services in managing his business. I called attention to the fact that the high courts of New York passed on that very question two or three years ago and fixed the limit of net profit, absolutely net profit, of one of these trusts at 8 per cent. I will say that there is not a corporation or an individual in all the world who is subject to competition and the law of supply and demand who can make excessive profits unless he steals from somebody.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Mr. President, let me put in another way what I have been saying.

Mr. REED. Mr. President——

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. I yield to the Senator from Missouri.

Mr. REED. By courtesy of the Senator from Massachusetts, I wish to say this: The Senator from Pennsylvania makes the point that there should be no excess-profits taxes, because a corporation making a profit this year and being subject to a tax upon it might not make any profit next year, and that because the corporation might make no profit next year it should not be taxed upon its profits this year.

If that principle applies to the question of excess profits it ought to apply everywhere. If a man enjoys an income this year of $10,000 he must pay upon that income, although next year he may not make a single penny. If we are to let the gentleman off who makes excess profits this year because he may have a loss next year, we ought to let the individual off this year who has made a profit because next year he may make nothing. That principle applied would wipe out all taxes, for all of us are liable to make losses in a year or at any time.

The fallacy has been advanced in behalf of the profiteer, but not in behalf of the common people of the land. If it is true, I repeat, with reference to the excess profits a man may make this year that he is entitled to employ them to recoup his possible losses next year, then out of my income, if I had one, of $20,000 this year I ought to be allowed to recoup, or not to pay taxes, because next year I may make no money at all. So the argument advanced hardly rises to the dignity of a fallacy. It is not logic; it is mere slobber.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Mr. President, what I have been trying to say amounts to this: In undertaking to revise a war-tax measure we, the Senate of the United States, have undertaken to relieve the burdens of the war from only two classes. How much do those classes deserve consideration? I have on my desk, but shall not take the time to read it, a statement of the Secretary of the Treasury, Mr. Mellon, in which he said that every conceivable device that the most ingenious lawyers in America could invent has been resorted to by the rich class to avoid taxation, and yet that is the class that is given first consideration at our hands.

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. I would remind the Senator from Massachusetts that the Supreme Court of the United States recently said the same thing in a decision.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. You have listened only to the loud voices of protest of the excess-profits taxpayers and the excess-surtax payers. The murmurs and whisperings of discontent of the millions who are unorganized, who belong to your own political party and my political party, who control and own no press propagandists, who can hire no able lawyers, evidently have not reached you. Practically no relief whatever has been extended to them under the provisions of the pending bill. Change the corporation tax from 15 per cent to 10 per cent, and reduce the normal tax, and the opposition to this measure will melt like snow in the spring sun. Your forgetfulness of this class spells defeat for this measure with the American people when it is submitted to them. You can not afford to do it. The normal tax class needs relief to-day. They are among the unemployed class. Their incomes, too, have been reduced. Not only the great manufacturing interests of the country, but the farmer and the cotton planter and the professional man, with an income of a few thousand dollars, have had to curtail living expenses and have had to bear a great many hardships as the result of the business depression throughout the country.

So I ask you Republican Senators before the bill is finally put in shape for enactment to be able to say to your enemies, "Yes; we have reduced the war-tax burdens from every class, from the unorganized and the organized, from the rich, from the middle class, from the poor, from the man with a family, and from the man with an income of substantially from $5,000 to $10,000."

If the amendment proposed by the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. GERRY] fails, I am going to move an amendment which I have, which will give the Senate an opportunity to decide whether it is willing to go halfway. The amendment of the Senator from Rhode Island seeks to reduce the normal tax on incomes of less than $5,000 from 4 per cent to 2 per cent, on incomes from $5,000 to $10,000 from 8 per cent to 4 per cent, and on incomes between $10,000 and $15,000 from 8 per cent to 6 per cent.

The amendment which I shall offer seeks only to reduce the normal tax on incomes of less than $5,000 from 4 per cent to 3 per cent and on incomes between $5,000 and $10,000 from 8 per cent, which the law provides now, to 6 per cent. So we will have an opportunity to see if even that small reduction is going to be given to the normal taxpayer.

Mr. President, while I am on my feet I wish to refer to two other amendments which I think should be made. The chairman of the committee I know is very anxious to have a vote on the amendment and anxious to have the bill disposed of. However, I wish to refer to two other parts of the bill which I think can be improved.

Mr. PENROSE. Mr. President, on that point permit me to say that I have listened with very great interest to the Senator's able remarks, and I do not wish to have him feel that I am in a bit of a hurry about his concluding. I am waiting anxiously to know whether he has any thought in his mind as to how the loss of revenue which would be brought about by the adoption of the amendment he is discussing is to be made up.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. I am very glad the Senator from Pennsylvania has renewed his suggestion as to how this loss of revenue can be made up. First of all, if it is unfair not to treat all these classes alike we ought not to consider how we can make up the revenue until after we have removed any unfairness in the measure. But let us assume that this is a fair normal tax upon the individual and that we are in a desperate plight for revenue.

There are innumerable ways in which this can be made up. One is suggested in an amendment by me, a tax upon gasoline. That tax was suggested by the best expert in America as probably a proper tax, a tax upon luxury, so that every gallon of gasoline used in pleasure riding by those who use automobiles would pay a tax of 1 cent or 2 cents. Let me say that the refiners of gasoline are only about six or eight in number and the whole tax would be paid by six or eight people in the country. The estimated revenues, depending on whether the tax is 1 cent or 2 cents, would vary from $50,000,000 to $200,000,000.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Mr. President, does the Senator believe that a tax of 1 cent or 2 cents a gallon would be paid out of the profits of the refiners, or would it be paid by the users of the gasoline?

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. I think it would be paid largely by the users of gasoline, and I think they are one class that could afford to pay a tax. The class that have traveled upon the steam railways for the last few years have had to pay a tax, and I do not see any objection to the class which can afford to ride in motor cars paying a tax upon the gasoline that propels them.

Further, the corporation capital-stock tax could be doubled and practically a sufficient revenue obtained from that source to meet this obligation.

Thirdly, the surtax reduction and the excess-profits tax reduction could be so scheduled as to permit this reduction in the normal tax of the individual.

You may ask the question, How are you going to get the necessary revenue? But the individual normal taxpayer will not ask that question when he reads this bill. He will say, "Who have had their taxes reduced? What has been done for me? How much consideration have I been given? Where is my relief? Am I still to go on with practically the same burdens that I paid in the midst of this terrible war?" That is the situation that exists in the bill as at present framed. It is easy to find sources of revenue. I heard it suggested that a meter ought to be put in every automobile, and that the Government ought to fix a mileage charge, a rate per mile, which would yield a very large revenue. The opportunities for getting revenue are innumerable. We could increase the estate tax, if necessary.

I repeat that I recognize the force of your argument for a reduction in the excess-profits tax. I recognize the force of your argument for a reduction in the surtaxes. I am not taking issue with you on that, but these arguments amount to nil unless you also recognize the right of the great middle class, the bone and sinew of American life, to be relieved a little of the burdens of war taxation.

While I am on my feet I wish to refer to two other amendments which I have to offer to the bill. A terrible leakage that has come to the revenue of this country has been from the making of gifts and the creation of trusts.

The able Secretary of the Treasury especially refers to this means which is resorted to by the payers of heavy surtaxes in order to escape taxation. I repeat, I have sympathy with the argument that the surtaxes have been excessive, and that the class upon which those taxes are imposed are entitled to some reduction; but gifts have been made by the possessors of large incomes in order to reduce their taxes and to avoid the payment of the high surtax brackets and to bring their incomes within the lower brackets. Are we powerless to prevent such evasion of our tax laws? Certainly not. That evil can be very easily eliminated by an excise tax upon every gift; and I have an amendment which at the proper time I shall offer to provide for a tax upon every gift which is made. Every gift which is made at death is now taxed. Why should not a gift which is made by a man who is living be taxed? Why may I make a gift to another to-day and have it pass untaxed, and if I die and in my will make a gift to another such a gift have to bear a tax? There is, of course, no answer to that question.

Mr. McKELLAR. Has the Senator from Massachusetts any figures as to how much such a tax would produce?

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. I have not; and I do not wish to discuss that matter now, but merely to refer to it while I am on my feet. When I move my amendment I shall go into the matter in detail.

Mr. President, a great deal has been said about tax-exempt securities. Are we powerless to prevent the possessors of great incomes escaping the taxes which we impose upon them in good faith? Shall we make no effort to prevent their escaping taxation? Can we do nothing but fold our arms and say, "Go on, go on; there is no law against it, and we do not propose to devise any means of checking and restraining you"? I have now on my desk a letter which I clipped last week from the New York Times, which was written by a citizen of New York, in which he made this bold assertion:

> I have just completed the transfer of my entire fortune of $500,000 into tax-exempt securities, and the politicians at Washington can do what they damn please.

That is the attitude of some of these men. I do not propose to let them escape, and I am going to ask the Senate to support an amendment which I shall offer which provides that on the death of a man whose estate is made up in any degree of tax-exempt securities those securities shall be segregated and a special tax be imposed upon them in addition to the estate tax; in other words, I propose that we shall say to such a man, "If through the limitations of our constitutional power you can escape during your life, when you die, and propose to bequeath and devise tax-exempt securities to relatives and friends, we propose to impose a tax upon them which will, in part at least, bring back to the Government some of the revenue the payment of which you have escaped." I merely refer to these proposed amendments now, but I believe we should give a great deal of consideration to them, for, if adopted, I think they will be helpful.

I wish now to say a closing word. Senators on the other side of the Chamber have it in their power to remove this question from all political discussion; they may take away from this side of the Chamber every argument which we may urge against the pending bill. Originally we drafted the law; its present form is ours, for it was drafted as a war measure; but if the majority shall do as well by the poor, struggling corporations as they have done by the large corporations, and if they shall do as well and act as favorably and as kindly toward the individuals with small incomes as they have toward the individuals with surtax incomes, then, I repeat, opposition from this side of the Chamber must disappear; it must pass away; because no man can object to the rich having their taxes reduced if the poor have their taxes reduced; no one can object to a corporation having its taxes reduced if the individual business man has his taxes reduced; but if Senators on the other side pick out only certain classes to be relieved and leave the others resting under their present burdens, they will find the American people very resentful of a measure which purports to be a tax-relief bill but which gives substantially no relief to the great army of American taxpayers.

Mr. McLEAN. Mr. President, I desire to ask the Senator from Massachusetts whether or not his proposal to impose an additional succession tax on tax-exempt securities embraced in large estates would be constitutional?

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. I think so, if we segregate the securities which are proposed to be taxed. We already tax tax-exempt securities when they pass into an estate. I merely propose to increase those taxes.

Mr. McLEAN. Are such securities now taxed?

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Absolutely. Tax-exempt securities do not go untaxed in an estate. I merely propose to place a higher tax upon them; in other words, such securities will be segregated in the estate, and a higher tax will be placed upon that class of securities on the theory that they have escaped taxation during the lifetime of the holder. I do not think there is any doubt about the constitutionality of such a tax, because it is practically a tax upon a gift.

Mr. McLEAN. The Senator knows that taxation must be equal.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Absolutely.

Mr. McLEAN. That is the point. It is not an equal tax on a certain class of securities; it is an additional tax on such securities.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Yes; but I am quite certain that there is not any constitutional objection to gifts of a certain kind of securities being taxed differently from other securities.

Mr. McLEAN. The Senator may be right, but the constitutional question occurred to me.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, the classification of property does not constitute inequality under the law, provided property of the same class is all treated alike.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Of course, tax-exempt securities are a classification of securities distinct from other kinds of securities, just as gasoline is different from tobacco; and in the tax law there could be one rate upon gasoline and another rate upon tobacco. So there would be one rate upon tax-exempt securities and a different rate upon other kinds of intangible securities.

Mr. McLEAN. There might be no distinction whatever in the securities. A community might issue a million dollars of taxable securities and another million dollars of nontaxable securities. In both instances the nature of the security would be the same. That is a point which I think would have to be considered.

Mr. SIMMONS. The Senator does not mean to say that the Constitution would be violated if the Government issues tax-free securities and at the same time issues securities that are not tax free?

Mr. McLEAN. Oh, no.

Mr. SIMMONS. We do not violate the Constitution in that case. Neither would we violate the Constitution if after a man dies we segregate his estate in two classes and impose one rate upon one class of property and a different rate upon another class of property.

Mr. McLEAN. My point is that the tax-exempt security might not be considered as another class, because it is secured by precisely the same property; it is precisely the same nature of security and belongs to the same class, except that in one instance it is not taxed by the community and in the other instance it is. I do not know, however, but that the Senator may be right about it.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. After considerable study and thought, I will say to the Senator from Connecticut, as to how we could reach these securities, I have arrived at the opinion that the method proposed by me is a perfectly legal method of doing it.

Mr. McLEAN. I am frank to say that if it can be done, I think it is worthy of consideration.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. I know the Senator from Connecticut feels that some effort should be made in some way to reach tax-exempt securities.

I yield the floor, Mr. President.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Rhode Island to the amendment of the committee.

Mr. PITTMAN. I ask for the yeas and nays.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will call the roll.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Seventy-four Senators have answered to their names. There is a quorum present.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, as a number of Senators have come into the Chamber since the argument of the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH] was concluded, I desire to take sufficient time merely to state the import of the pending amendment in order that those Senators who did not have the benefit of the argument referred to may have full grasp of the import of the amendment upon which we are about to vote.

Under existing law a surtax upon incomes begins at $5,000, and by gradual raises is increased until the tax remains at 65 per cent upon all incomes in excess of $1,000,000. This graduated scale imposes a tax of 32 per cent on incomes of $68,000. The proposed bill at that point continues to levy a 32 per cent rate without any increases, no matter how large the income may be.

The result is that some 12,000 millionaires, enjoying incomes in excess of $68,000, are relieved of $90,000,000, as estimated.

The bill also proposes to wipe out entirely the excess-profits tax, which amounts to $450,000,000. In a word, the standpatter organization proposes to reduce the taxes upon the very rich and upon the profiteers in the aggregate sum of $540,000,000.

At this point a bloc was formed to prevent the passage of the iniquitous measure. The bloc threatened to join with the Democrats and thus produce enough votes to overthrow the measure. Thereupon a secret conference was held and a compromise worked out. The result of that compromise is that surtaxes are to be levied as high as 50 per cent.

This would produce about $20,000,000 more of surtaxes than would be paid under the standpatters' bill, but will still reduce the revenues from surtaxes by the amount of $70,000,000. At the same time the bloc has agreed to stand with the standpatters to remove the excess-profits tax. The result of the trade, therefore, is that the bloc agrees with the standpatters to help them take from the public revenues $520,000,000 in consideration of the concession to them of $20,000,000; that is to say, where the standpatters wanted to deprive the Government of $540,000,000 from the profiteers and the very rich, the bloc has agreed to aid them in their scheme, provided they will reduce the amount they propose to save the profiteer and the very rich from $540,000,000 to $520,000,000.

Let me say to my friends of the bloc that I venture to predict that even this small concession will be taken away from them; that when the bill gets into conference the leader of the standpatters will see to it that the highest surtaxes are again reduced to 32 per cent. When the bill gets back from conference it will be rammed down the throats of the members of the bloc and they will have to take it, no matter how much they may gag.

The bloc having agreed to help the standpatters reduce the taxes upon very large incomes, we are now asking them to assist us in a very moderate reduction upon moderate incomes. That is the effect of the pending amendment. In a word, we are asking the bloc which is assisting the standpatters to reduce the tax upon very large incomes to help the Democrats reduce the tax upon small incomes. We appeal to them to broaden the mantle of their sympathy, which now covers the very rich, so that it may spread its protecting folds over folk of moderate means.

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. Mr. President, with the permission of my friend from Missouri, who has the floor, I will say to him for the information of the other members of the agricultural bloc that my colleague and myself represent an agricultural State, producing under normal conditions the second largest crop of cotton in the Union, and we are no party to any agreement of that sort. We are members of the agricultural bloc, but we are not going to vote in any such way as the Senator has stated.

Mr. REED. I thank the Senator. My understanding is that there was an agricultural bloc which may be said to have represented in a certain sense the farming communities; that this bloc appeared to be powerful enough by uniting its votes with the Democrats to write this bill; that when this situation developed, some shrewd gentlemen closely allied with the standpatters got hold of a part of the bloc and persuaded it that the right thing to do was to compromise with the majority leaders. Accordingly the majority leaders conceded to the bloc, as I have said, an increase of surtaxes on incomes of $68,000 and more, from a flat rate of 32 per cent to a graduated rate running as high as 50 per cent; but that the bloc paid the fearful price of agreeing to support the standpatters in reducing the taxes upon excess profits and upon very high incomes.

I exonerate the agricultural bloc as a bloc, but some of its members were reached. The standpatters "plowed with some of the agricultural heifers." I repeat that these gentlemen of the bloc, by whatever name they are known, have voted to reduce the surtaxes upon very high incomes and they have agreed to vote to wipe out the excess-profits tax.

It is said, in excuse for taking the tax off of excess profits, that a corporation may make a very large profit this year and it ought to be allowed to go tax free because next year it may make no profit at all. Will you not please apply that to the man with the income? The man with an income of $5,000 this year may not have a job next year. He may not make a cent. The man who makes $2,000 this year may be walking the streets hunting a job next year. The man who makes $10,000 this year may be impoverished next year; yet you propose to tax him on his income this year, and to make no allowance for his loss next year. When, however, you come to the profiteer, to the man against whose action criminal statutes were sought to be framed in this Chamber, you propose to take the tax off of him when he has made his profit; off of his earnings, which sometimes amounts to nothing but robbery, scoundrelism, and to do it on the pretext that next year he may not make any profit at all.

Let us feed all the people of the United States with the same spoon. If you are going to adopt that doctrine with reference to the profiteer, why not adopt it with reference to everybody?

But, coming back to the immediate question I am discussing, the tax burden rests most heavily upon the man who has to spend all that he makes, and we are asking some relief for that man. You have helped to take the tax off the man who does not spend all he makes, who makes so much that he can not spend it. Will you not help give a little relief to the man of moderate income and moderate means who has to spend all that he makes buying goods from profiteers whom you propose to relieve from the excess-profits tax?

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. President, I am in hearty sympathy with what the Senator from Massachusetts and the Senator from Missouri have said upon this question. I know that there is a desire upon the part of the chairman of the Finance Committee, who has this bill in charge, to obtain a vote on it, probably the latter part of this week. I suppose that arrangements have been made to pass this bill, which was characterized the other day by my colleague, the minority leader [Mr. UNDERWOOD], as the worst tax bill ever presented to Congress, and the able leader of the minority has had service in the two Houses of more than 20 years.

I do not want to delay unnecessarily action by the Senate upon this measure. The responsibility is upon the majority, and the majority will be held accountable for whatever measure passes this body; but the country will suffer, as the Senator from Missouri says, and I feel, as one of the Members of this body charged with the responsibility of doing what I can to perfect legislation and to obtain the very best legislation possible, that we ought to take the time to condemn before it is everlastingly too late some of the obnoxious, oppressive, and tyrannical provisions contained in this bill.

Certain Senators on the other side talk to us about "soaking the rich." Mr. President, there are more loopholes and avenues of escape in this bill for the mighty rich than any bill ever presented to Congress.

Enough votes will be obtained on the other side, it seems, to arrange for bringing down the taxes of those most able to bear this burden and to unload the taxes upon the men and women least able to pay them.

Mr. President, it was never intended by those of us who favored an income tax—and I am one of the men who supported it originally in the House—to reach out and get the small man struggling to get upon his feet. We never intended that the income tax should reach that class of people. We intended that the income tax should reach a class of people who had been escaping all taxation, and they did escape Federal taxation.

The common man has a tax burden on him in the locality in which he lives. He has a county tax, he has a State tax, and on top of that a tariff tax when the Republican Party is in power. So that is enough for him to have to pay; but in order to make the income tax law unpopular, you have reached out and spread it over a larger class of people, men and women with little capital struggling to get a start in the world.

If I had my way about it, I would not put an income tax on any man or woman whose income was less than $6,000 a year. If I had my way about it, I would arrange to collect all the taxes under the head of income tax without calling any of it a surtax. I would put it in the income tax straight, so that the taxpayer would know when he had finished paying his taxes. You have so drawn this bill that it will take a Philadelphia lawyer to tell the common taxpayer when he is through paying his taxes. There will be thousands of instances under this patchwork bill that you have drawn where the taxpayer will be called upon to send in more taxes, although he holds a receipt and thinks he has paid his taxes. That is going to happen under the hidden provisions referred to by the minority leader in his speech the other day.

Why should you not simplify this bill so that the ordinary man or woman will know, when you send him a notice about his taxes, just how much his taxes are? They will not know that under the bill that you are writing. What is your purpose, Senators? The minority leader suggested that you were trying to deceive both yourselves and the public. It is unfair for you to do that. We ought to be very frank and open and above-board in this legislation. This legislation affects very vitally the people of this country. You are pulling at the purse strings of every man and woman in the country, and certainly they have a right to be heard.

I know that you want to speed up and get quick action on this bill, but I intend to enter my solemn protest before such legislation gets through this body. Mr. President, has the time come when we will have no debate at all in this Chamber?

An editorial in the Washington Post this morning threatens those who stand here demanding light upon these tax provisions which you are jamming into this bill. That editorial suggests that you are going to meet earlier, and that you are going to sit at night also, which is all right with me, and that the time has come to do away with speeches and have a vote. That is always the way with a man who has a bad case. He does not want it talked about. He wants to close the issue; he wants to get it out of the sight of the people as soon as possible. He wants to get it into that conference committee; and, Mr. President, when it is delivered over to that conference committee you may say farewell to it, for you will not know it when you see it again. What they will do to that bill in conference will be a plenty. Then they are going to expect western Republicans to vote for it. I think I know some of you who will not vote for it, but I am afraid that the tactics of the old guard are having a very dangerous effect upon some.

Mr. President, what sense is there in a man paying a certain per cent on a certain amount of income up to $10,000, then a different per cent on an income up to $20,000, then 1 per cent of surtax up to $10,000 and 2 per cent up to $20,000, and so on? Why not simplify it and put it all under one head? I suppose that it is done to confuse the people, and you are not going to get away with it.

We had a remarkable situation here the other day. The brilliant and genial Senator from Indiana [Mr. WATSON] called upon the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. HITCHCOCK] to write a certain provision. The Senator from Nebraska called upon the Senator from Indiana to explain the provision.

The Senator from Indiana said, "I understand it, but I am not going to explain it." What was the purpose of keeping secret a tax provision which affects the purse of the American people? Why should a Senator be permitted to carry a secret like that around in his mind and not tell it to a Senator who is seeking light, so that he may know how to vote intelligently? The Washington Post, the mouthpiece of the administration, has an editorial demanding that Senators sit with sealed lips while this tax-gouging business goes on, and they unload this big tax burden upon the small man, the man with but little capital, the man with moderate means, and upon the common necessities of life.

That is what you are going to do. You are going finally to settle upon a sales tax. You are going to decide upon that and unload this burden upon the consuming mass of the American people. You are going to call it a manufacturers' tax. That is what the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT] wants.

Here is the retailer, here is the wholesaler, and there is the manufacturer. They say, "Let us put it on the manufacturer. He is three times removed from the consumer." Let me show you how quickly it will get to the consumer. You lay that tax on the manufacturer. The wholesaler walks up and says, "I want $100,000 worth of goods." The manufacturer says, "All right," and makes him a price. The wholesaler says, "Your price has advanced. What's the trouble?" The manufacturer says, "That advance is to cover the tax imposed by Congress." The wholesaler says, "Have I got to pay that?" The manufacturer answers, "Oh, yes." And he pays it.

The retailer comes up to the wholesaler. He says, "I want $10,000 worth of goods to carry out yonder with which to supply the people where I live. He says "All right." The retailer says, "Give me your figures." The wholesaler gives them to him, and he says, "The price has gone up." The wholesaler says, "Yes; that is to take care of the tax imposed by Congress." The retailer says, "Have I got to pay that?" The answer is, "Oh, yes."

Then the retailer goes to his store at home, and the consumer comes in, a farmer out in the West, maybe, selling his corn and hogs below the cost of production; he leads his bare-footed children up to the counter, and he says, "Winter is here and I want some shoes for my children. What is the price of shoes?" The merchant gives him the price, and he says, "The price has gone up, hasn't it?" The merchant says, "Yes; that is because of the tax imposed by Congress." So they unload upon the bare-foot children, upon the little boys and girls, upon the farmer who is now selling his produce below the cost of production. You are going to unload upon him.

Then what will happen? He has to mortgage his little farm, and he has to sell it a little later on, and you turn him loose in the road, without a dollar in the world, without a roof under which to place himself and his family, and you have done it by your burdensome taxation, while the Wall Street brigade, escaping taxes, rides in pompous fashion to the music of a brass band, while they exclaim, "Hurrah for the Republican Party!" That is what you are doing.

I do not blame you for wanting to cut off debate. Senators, you have a serious situation confronting you. This day you are holding in power the Federal Reserve Board, your board, which is using the money made out of the people at high rates of interest to build marble banking establishments with bronze doors costing $25,000 apiece. What do you think of that? No wonder you want to shut off debate. Why do you not take this money away from them and compel that board to put it out here in the West to help the poor farmer who is selling his corn to-day at about 20 cents a bushel? Why not put some of it in the South to aid the farmer in obtaining at least the cost of production for his cotton.

I told you the other day, Senators, that you could buy one of these little saucers full of cornflakes for 15 cents. That does not represent 50 grains of corn. Yet it costs within 5 cents of what the farmer can get for a whole bushel of corn. That is what is going on under your Republican administration.

We passed a resolution here the other day, offered by the able and distinguished Senator from North Carolina [Mr. OVERMAN], calling on the Federal Reserve Board to give us the facts about the salaries in the New York Federal Reserve Bank, where they increased the salary of the governor of that bank from thirty to fifty thousand dollars, and increased clerks' salaries from twelve hundred to twelve thousand, from sixteen hundred to sixteen thousand, from twenty-two hundred to twenty-two thousand, and the like of that. We called on them to give us the amounts paid at other reserve banks and how the salaries had been increased in all of them. That board is located within a mile of where we are sitting to-day, and we have been sitting every day since that resolution was passed, except Sunday, but we have not received the information sought. You Republicans are just smiling. They are doing exactly what you want done. You have the authority to turn that board out. I repeat what I said to you before, that board has lost the confidence of the honest business men of the South and West, and why will you persist in holding that board in power?

I would not permit the farmer of the West to sell his corn and hogs below the cost of production. I would not permit the cotton producer to sell his cotton below the cost of production.

I have had a considerable number of letters from the West, just as I have from the South, where by that deadly deflation policy you denied the South and West money to hold their crops off the market until the price would yield a profit. Those letters told of distressing conditions that that policy produced.

I repeat that the corn man, the cattleman, and the cotton man were all sacrificed under that ruthless policy.

Do you know what that board did? They commenced talking about the Bank of England raising interest rates to 7 per cent. Watch the trail. The next thing it said the Bank of New York raised the rate to 7 per cent, of course—Wall Street. The next thing they put it into effect in the country. So it started in England, leaped over to Wall Street, and then the Federal Reserve Board took it up and passed it around through the South and the West—7 per cent—and made it impossible for a man to obtain money.

Your board created a condition that made the people bring their Liberty bonds up and sacrifice them for $85 on the $100. Your board created a condition that caused them to come to the bank counter and stand there with these Government securities in their hands—4 per cent bonds, gilt edged, as good as gold, you told them when you sold them. That board turned them away from the bank and said you could not loan money on them. What do you think of that?

The poor fellow who did everything in his power to lay by a little money went to the bank and said, "I want to help the boys over yonder." I have seen them; I have spoken to them, urging them to buy Liberty bonds. I have seen them take out their handkerchiefs and wipe their eyes and say, "I will subscribe for so much; I have a boy over there." They went down to the bank and the bank said, "That is all right; if you can not pay for it now, you can pay for it month by month." He said, "Good; give me $200 more or $250 more." That was a good deal for him. Then the time came when his cotton price fell down 18 cents a pound under the cost of production, and his obligation at the bank was due on the bonds. The bonds fell in price, too.

The bonds were depreciating in value. His cotton went down below the cost of production, and he appeared at the bank and said, "What am I going to do about it?" The banker said, "I do not know. I will tell you what I will do. If you will put your cotton in the warehouse, I will take your bonds and take your cotton and O. K. your paper and send it up to the Federal reserve bank, and I will help you to hold your cotton. I will carry that bond obligation if the Federal reserve bank will permit me to do it."

They sent the papers up to the Federal reserve bank, and your Federal Reserve Board would not let them discount those papers, so they went back, and the banker said to him, "The Federal reserve bank would not discount your paper, so you will have to dispose of your cotton and pay for your bonds." He said, "There is no market for my cotton. That cotton cost me 18 cents a pound more than the present price to produce it. I ought not to have to sell it." The banker said, "I agree with you, but the Federal reserve bank will not let us have the money needed."

That is what you are doing. That is what you did in the West. That is what you did in the South. What happened to those bonds? They went trooping over to New York and the bond sharks bought them up, bought them for $80 and $85 on the $100, and they are in the hands of the money kings over there and now you are going to let them escape taxation. What happened after they got them? The bonds went up 6 points after they got them out of the hands of the poor fellow, who put his very heart's blood in the money that he bought them with to help win the war.

Still you have this thing going on down here by a discredited Federal Reserve Board. Many bankers in the country have discredited it and condemned it. Some newspapers have condemned and discredited it. Senators and Congressmen have condemned and discredited it, and I am one of them, and still the board sits, accounting to nobody for its conduct in charging high interest rates and making out of the distress of the people from $70,000,000 to $100,000,000 a year.

One of the Senators on the other side said the other day, "You are going to 'soak the rich' so much that capital will get mad and retire." Mr. President, there is no place for the farmer to go, no place for the laboring man, no place for the small merchant, no place for the doctor, the lawyer, the preacher, and the teacher to go but to work. They have to keep on in this ceaseless warfare in the struggle for existence, but as to the big capitalist you tell us if you tax him he will withdraw his capital, retire in scorn, and defy the Government and escape his fair share of the burden of government.

Will you permit that? What did you do to the American boy who sought to keep out of the war in Europe? You put the uniform on him and sent him to the front. Is the capital of the money lords more precious than the blood and life of one of these boys? Yet that is your position. You said capital would retire. I would not permit it to retire and escape taxation. If I were at the head of the Government and these men undertook to shirk their duty at a time like this I would not permit it. I would make that capital help to pay the war debt.

Withdraw and retire. You did not let the soldier withdraw with his blood and life. Thousands and millions of them went willingly. Some did not go willingly, but they went. So with the taxpayers. Thousands of them had to help bear the burdens of government, especially to pay the war debt following a war like this, where we were fighting for humanity, civilization, and all that is dear to the race. Are you now going to permit capital to withdraw? Do you think you are going to frighten the people's representatives away by saying that they are trying to soak the rich? What you will soak them in will be a gold solution. That will be very pleasing to the big bugs of Wall Street. They will like it. Like one of your Republican Presidents when he dissolved a trust, they got up a little hymn that they used to sing:

Hallelujah, Thine the glory,
Hallelujah. Amen.
Hallelujah, Thine the glory,
Dissolve us again.

So history is about to repeat itself.

Talk about soaking the rich! The soaking that you are going to give to the mighty rich will cause them to ask you to repeat it very frequently.

Mr. President, there are 6,000,000 men out of employment. That is a sad and solemn scene. If we had extended credit to the South and West and credit to certain foreign countries, that would not have happened. You sat here and would not revive the War Finance Corporation until December, 1920, when we formed a combination between southern Democrats and western Republicans and with the aid of a few northern Democrats passed that measure. You had had control of the House and the Senate for two years, lacking about three months. You permitted them to tear down that War Finance Corporation and put it out of commission, and you would not revive it until this bloc that you hear so much about got in action and had a few meetings, and then we revived the War Finance Corporation.

But what did you do then? We had section number 2 in that resolution which required the Federal reserve banks to go to the aid of the farmers of the country, and we put it through here, but you put it to sleep over yonder in your Republican House, and it is dead at the feet of the Republican Party now in power. That shows where you stand. The Federal Reserve Board did not want that resolution to pass and it died. The Federal Reserve Board sits there to-day discredited, as I have said, by honest business men in the South and West, and yet you are not saying anything against them because they are doing what you want done. Mr. President, whither are we drifting? An enormously wealthy favored few seem to be in control. Senators, when Rome fell 2 per cent of her population owned 98 per cent of her wealth. Countries can not live under conditions like that. If your tax bill prevails, if your leaders are permitted to write in this bill what you want to put in it, it will not be long until a very small per cent of our population will own 90 per cent of the wealth of the United States.

Six millions of men out of employment because industries are not running, and yet they threaten us over there that if we make these mighty rich pay their share of the taxes they will retire and withdraw their capital and put more people out of employment and make the burden heavier and still heavier for the common masses of the people.

Mr. President, who is it that is going to be benefited under this bill? There is not a small taxpayer in the country that will be benefited one cent; there is not a small taxpaying woman in the United States who will be benefited one cent; but those who contributed to the campaign fund of the Republican Party last fall are the favored few; they are going to be helped; they are going to have their taxes cut down.

Something was said here the other day about Mr. Wrigley, the Chewing Gum Trust man. He was a shining light in the last campaign, directing people down to Marion to hear the candidate for the Presidency speak from the front porch. Mr. Wrigley said, "Come this way, ladies and gentlemen; go right over and take your stand in the yard; the candidate for President will appear in a few moments and will make a speech; I am Mr. Wrigley." Then Mr. Wrigley comes here and we hear from him again when the tax bill comes up and it is proposed by Senators on the other side to take the tax off the Chewing Gum Trust. Does the majority intend to make of this measure a vehicle to carry out their preelection pledges to those who contributed to their campaign fund? It looks like it, because we are told ever and anon, "You are about to soak the rich."

Mr. President, I am reminded of a story which was told by Representative HUMPHREYS, of Mississippi, about a Negro down in that State, which illustrates just the result to the masses of the taxes which are to be imposed by this bill. A northern man went down to Mississippi and bought a farm. He went over to talk to a Negro who lived on a part of the plantation about the soil and its productivity. He said, "Uncle, I understand you make fine crops here." The Negro said, "Yes, sir; I do, but de ducks get it." The northern man said, "The what?" The Negro repeated, "De ducks get it all." "Why," the northern man said, "the gentleman from whom I bought this land never told me anything about any ducks eating up the crop." But the Negro repeated, "De ducks get it." The northern man said, "I will go back to see the man of whom I purchased the farm." He went back, and he asked, "What about that place you sold me? The Negro says that the ducks eat the crops." "Why," the man said, "I never heard of any ducks being there. I will go with you over and see about it." The former owner of the place asked the Negro, "What about the ducks eating the crops? I never saw a duck here." The Negro said, "Well, yes, sah; you know when I go up there to settle my accounts you say, 'the cotton has come to so much, but you bought $125 worth of sugar,' and you say, 'I de duck that'; you say, 'You bought $500 worth of meat and I de duck that; you bought coffee; you bought flour; you bought clothes, shoes, hats, and all,' and each time you says 'I de duck that.' So when we get through with it it just about evens up, and I just tell them 'de ducks' got it." [Laughter.]

That is exactly what Republican Senators are doing in the pending bill—"de ducks" are going to get what the little fellow has got. The man with but little working capital, the man of moderate means, the common man, who requires necessities upon which to live, is going to pay the tax; and when he gets through with it under the Republican administration "de ducks will have got it all." [Laughter.]

Mr. President, I can not refrain from reading a little poem at this point. It fits the situation precisely:

The people regret and Rue the hour
When the Republican Party went into power.
Everything is out of joint.
That party does nothing but disappoint.
The money lords are in control,
They own that party, body and soul.
The people can only wait and say,
"God speed the next election day."
Listen to this mournful tale:
The common masses have no kale—
There's the empty pocket and the empty pail—
And unemployed are put up for sale.
The farmers' business is on the bum,
The wheels of industry do not hum,
And the people are sore because of the hour
The Republican Party went into power!

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. Mr. President, it is very edifying to hear one of the pots get after some of the kettles and call them black. I beg to remind the Senator from Alabama [Mr. HEFLIN] that President Woodrow Wilson threatened to fix the price of cotton, and the price went down 15 cents in 48 hours. I beg to remind him, also, that delegations representing all the farmers' organizations came to Washington and sent representatives to the White House who saw President Wilson, but President Wilson told them in so many words that the farmers of this country need not expect any relief from his administration. I believe in being perfectly fair. I myself am a fighter from the ground up, but I believe in fighting fair, and if we can not get anything better than to swap off the devil for the witch, I am willing to just rock along for a while and see if we can not split up the Republicans and thereby obtain a bill which will produce revenue and yet not ruin the country.

Something has been said here about the general condition of the people. Let us look the facts in the face. Who is responsible for that situation? The great common people loaned the Government $25,000,000,000. Where is that money? The New York Herald of June 24 last contains a list of the loans that were made to foreign countries by the former administration. It will not do any harm, and it may do some good, to have the figures go into the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD and become official. We loaned to Great Britain more than $4,000,000,000—I am going to use round numbers for convenience sake—we loaned to France more than three and a quarter billion dollars; we loaned to Italy more than a billion and a half dollars; we loaned to Belgium $375,000,000; we loaned to Russia $192,000,000—and Russia is the only country that has offered to pay us, and to pay us in gold. That payment was rejected by the Wilson administration, and, up to this present moment, is being rejected by the Harding administration. We loaned to Poland $135,000,000; to Czechoslovakia, $91,000,000; to Serbia, $51,000,000; to Rumania, $36,000,000; to Austria, $24,000,000; to Greece, $15,000,000; to Esthonia, nearly $14,000,000; to Armenia, nearly $12,000,000; to Cuba, $9,000,000; to Lithuania, $5,000,000; to Finland, $8,000,000; to Latvia, $5,000,000; to Hungary, nearly $5,000,000; to Siberia, $26,000.

With our money Poland waged aggressive war upon Russia. With our money the King of Greece was brought back to his throne and is making war upon Turkey, against which nation we never declared war. Our money has thus been taken out of the pockets of the common people and sent to the other side of the ocean, where it remains; and it was presumably J. P. Morgan, in the New York World on May 28 last, who is reported as saying that it would be a great blow to the United States if we collected this past due debt. Why did he say that? Because he wanted to collect his own first. According to the New York World he had, before we entered the war, floated one loan for Great Britain in connection with which his commission was $12,000,000. Of course, he floated many others; and he now wants to be treated as preferred creditor.

Mr. President, $25,000,000,000 has been taken out of the pockets of our common people by all sorts of propaganda, speeches, pamphlets, circulars, patriotic parades and appeals, and that money has not been returned. Is it any wonder that business lags and that people are unemployed? If, in addition to that, we have a governmental agency representing the money power which is robbing our people of incredible sums of money, how can our people resist their own Government and its powerful agencies?

I am not going to rely entirely upon the statements of Mr. John Skelton Williams. He was a trusted officer of the last administration. He holds the rank of a gentleman. His business associations are respectable. He once had a railroad stolen from him by the elder J. P. Morgan, who also stole the Central Railroad of Georgia, and watered its stock up from seven and a half million dollars to fifty-four millions. Mr. John Skelton Williams came here and was put under oath, and the rule is that the testimony of a witness under oath is to be taken, unless he is impeached in one of the ways known to the law.

My friend from Indiana [Mr. WATSON] asked me if I could tell him what were the profits of the manufacturers in any one year. I did not at that time have the Treasury report before me, nor a memorandum carefully made from it. I have it now, and I will give him that information.

In the year 1916 the net incomes of the corporations were $8,765,000,000.

In the year 1918 they were slightly less.

In 1917 the corporations of three States—Illinois, New York, and Pennsylvania—earned incomes amounting to four and a half billions; and this increase, as shown by the Government report, is equal to 25 per cent of the total increase in farm values throughout the United States for a period of 10 years. That is a staggering statement, based upon an official report very courteously furnished me last week.

Mr. WATSON of Indiana. Mr. President, I could not quite catch what the Senator said. He was not speaking very loud. The last year for which he gave the statistics was 1918?

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. Yes.

Mr. WATSON of Indiana. Has the Senator given them for 1919 and 1920 and up to June of this year, the close of the fiscal year?

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. I have not. They are probably here in the abstract, but they were not taken out by my clerk.

Mr. WATSON of Indiana. Now, I want to ask the Senator whether he has the amount that was invested in all of those manufacturing plants, so as to show what per cent of returns they made on the investment?

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. Mr. President, it is a very peculiar fact, that this official report of the estimated valuation of national wealth does not disclose corporation wealth at all. It discloses the income only, but I will remind the Senator of a fact which must be familiar to him, that the capital invested in railroads is, in round numbers, $20,000,000,000, half of which has been shown to be water. They are earning an income upon that half which represented money, as well as upon the other half which represented no investment whatever.

Mr. President, the other day there was some question as to a Supreme Court decision which exempted profits declared in stock dividends. A Senator on the other side said the Supreme Court reasoned that the shares of stock had not been apportioned, and a Senator on this side corroborated that statement. It did not conform to my recollection of the case. I therefore sent for the volume of the report (252 U. S., Oct. term, 1919), and the decision shows that the stock had been apportioned and was to the credit of the stockholders of the bank at the time this decision was made. In rendering his opinion on the case—which differed, I should say, from that of the majority of the court—Mr. Justice Brandeis pointed out the various ways in which these wealthy corporations dodge their taxes. Therefore, I said this morning that they were under condemnation by the Supreme Court of the United States.

In my judgment, it is entirely germane to this question to go into the operations of the money power as operated by our Government. If it can be shown that this money power is directly robbing the people, and that the present administration is condoning it, just as the former one did, then I think the country is entitled to have the facts in connection with this bill, which proposes to raise three or four billion dollars of revenue to pay current expenses.

There was a controversy in the newspapers between Mr. John Skelton Williams and Gov. W. P. G. Harding, of the Federal Reserve Board. Mr. Williams said that the salaries were too high, and he named their increases, which the Senator from Alabama [Mr. HEFLIN] briefly recounted, as to the New York bank. Mr. W. P. G. Harding in replying to Mr. Williams took refuge in the countercharge that Mr. Williams, while Comptroller of the Currency under President Wilson, had voted for some of these increases. That kind of an answer does not strike me as being very strong. The question, after all, is, Are the salaries reasonable? Gov. Harding went further and said that he thought he was worth $50,000 a year, and that is the reason why he took it and is still taking it. He thought these various employees, who were worth so much less last year and are getting so much more now than last year, were also worth it.

Let us see about that. If the governor of the Federal Reserve Board is worth $50,000 a year, what is the value to the country of the President of the United States? What is the value of the Vice President? Gov. Harding enjoys the luxurious and luxuriant privilege of fixing his own salary. That is a privilege which the President does not enjoy. It is a privilege which the Vice President does not enjoy. It is a privilege that no Senator enjoys, no Congressman enjoys, no admiral in the Navy, no general in the Army, no member of the Supreme Court. W. P. G. Harding is the only man that I know of who has been given the power to fix his own salary and to fix the salaries of his subordinates.

Was the Federal Reserve System created for the purpose of making enormous profits out of the people? We have been told here often that the system is a good one, but that the administration is bad. I take issue with that statement. Any system which gives to any set of men, taking it away from the Government, the right to create and control the volume of currency is necessarily a bad system. It puts too much power in the hands of a few men, and they would be more than human if they did not abuse it.

We limit the power of the President. We are constantly criticizing him in his public capacity. That is our right. He may criticize us in our official conduct. That is his right. The press enjoys the privilege of criticizing all public men as to their public work. That is their privilege; but this Federal Reserve Board and its branches resent criticism. The governor of it made the attempt to commit at least assault and battery upon a witness who was testifying about his doing in a committee room in this building; and a defense by the method of assault and battery is not generally considered a good defense, unless you yourself are physically assaulted.

As I say, Mr. President, it is the money power of the Government that is being exerted by this Federal Reserve System. Much has been said about its origin. There was a disagreeable colloquy between two Senators here one day as to that origin. My memory of it is this:

That bill was framed in Europe by the banking firm of Warburg and it was brought to this country by Paul Warburg. Samuel Untermyer, of New York, published an interview, in which he said that it would be injurious to the financial credit of this country unless that system were adopted. It was advocated by the late Senator Aldrich, of Rhode Island. It was advocated by all those who were called standpatters in those days. The Democrats opposed it and defeated it.

The elder J. P. Morgan came here in person and stayed so long that there was criticism leveled at him and he left. The Democrats killled his bill when the Republicans presented it, but immediately after the Republicans were defeated and the Democrats went in there were immaterial changes made in the bill, it passed, and became the basis of the present system, and Paul Warburg was put on the board by President Wilson as one of the original members. Those are the facts.

I think a statement of these things is entirely pertinent to this discussion, and I shall be brief about it. We will take the Boston bank. The capital paid in was less than $8,000,000. The gross earnings were $12,000,000. The expenses were $2,000,000. The total net earnings were $10,000,000. In other words, $7,000,000 in one year earned $10,000,000. What right did the Government have to do that to the people of Massachusetts who were patrons of that bank?

Take the bank at Philadelphia. The capital paid in was $8,000,000, in round figures; the gross earnings were more than $11,000,000, expenses $2,000,000, total net earnings, $9,672,000, or more than the entire capital stock. It was the Government that was doing that. What right did the Government have to exact such a profit from the people of Pennsylvania who wished to avail themselves of the resources of that bank?

Take the bank at Cleveland, Ohio. The capital paid in was $10,000,000. The total net earnings were more than $11,000,000. Is not that more than 100 per cent? Has the Government a right to make more than 100 per cent out of the people who patronize the Government's own bank? If the Government sets that example, what will the private banker do?

We will take the bank at Richmond, Va. The total capital was $3,500,000. The total net earnings were $5,000,000, very nearly double the capital stock.

Mr. DILLINGHAM. Mr. President, will the Senator tell us what period is covered by those earnings?

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. I take this from the seventh annual report of the Federal Reserve Board for the year 1920. There has been no report since then, so far as I can learn.

Now we come to the Atlanta bank, in my own State. The capital paid in was $4,000,000. The gross earnings were $7,500,000. The expenses were $1,355,000. The total net earnings were $6,000,000, or $2,000,000 more than the capital stock. What per cent is that? Nevertheless, my stately friend from Utah [Mr. SMOOT] seemed to be indignant that anybody was charging corporations with making excessive profits. But this report relates to last year, and it is the Government making these huge profits. If the Government profiteers, then private corporations will profiteer.

Take the Chicago bank. The capital stock was less than $14,000,000. The net earnings were $25,000,000. What per cent was that?

Let us go on to St. Louis. The capital stock was slightly less than $3,500,000. The total net earnings were $5,250,000.

Take Kansas City, Mo. The capital paid in was $4,500,000 in round numbers. The total net earnings were $5,500,000.

Take the Dallas (Tex.) bank. The capital was slightly less than $3,500,000. The total net earnings were $1,678,000.

Take the San Francisco bank. The capital paid in was less than $7,500,000. The total net earnings were $10,000,000. What percentage is that? What is that but an excessive profit, and why should the Government be maintaining a lot of bankers on the board here at the head of the regional banks robbing the people in this way? It is not legitimate business. It is robbery under the forms of law.

Consider the salary list of the reserve bank in New York as given by the Washington Times of October 21, 1921:

"The list of salaries paid officers of Federal Reserve Bank of New York, indicating increases paid in salaries from time of their employment to 1920–21, follow: Benjamin Strong, $30,000 to $50,000; Pierre Jay, $16,000 to $30,000; J. H. Case, $20,000 to $30,000; E. R. Kenzel, $4,000 to $25,000; L. F. Saller, $7,000 to $25,000; G. L. Harrison, $4,000 to $22,000; L. H. Hendricks, $6,000 to $18,000; Shephard Morgan, $5,000 to $15,000; A. W. Gilbart, $1,800 to $12,000; J. D. Higgins, $2,500 to $12,000; J. W. Jones, $2,500 to $12,000; L. R. Rounds, $2,000 to $12,000; J. L. Morris, $9,000 to $12,000; W. D. Matteson, $1,500 to $10,000; A. J. Lins, $1,500 to $10,000; G. E. Chapin, $1,500 to $9,000; W. H. Jefferson, $3,000 to $8,000; J. E. Crane, $1,500 to $7,500; W. H. Hamilton, $1,500 to $7,500; R. M. O'Hara, $1,500 to $7,500.

"I have been told," continued Mr. Williams, "that 60 per cent of those 'officers' never received over $1,500 to $2,500 before they came to the reserve bank, but they are now drawing salaries as high as those paid to Cabinet officers.

"The salaries paid to about 30 'officers' by the New York Federal Reserve Bank, exclusive of the salaries of other employees, amount to about as much as the combined salaries of one-half of the Members of the United States Senate plus the salaries of the President and Vice President of the United States."

You would be astounded if I should give you a list of the salaries these men pay themselves. I will read only a few. This one relates to the Boston bank. The officers paid themselves for the year $116,000. They paid the clerical force $784,000. They paid special officers and watchmen $20,000, and for printing and stationery $65,000. There is a final item for "all other expenses," and no items were given. We have to itemize our mileage accounts, and are limited as to our stationery; but these bank officers took $65,000 for stationery, and then grouped under "all other expenses," without a single item being given, $60,000 for one year.

There is a list of the examiners on page 280, one at $16,000 per annum, another at $12,000, two at $10,000, and so on for the 19 different examiners, whose aggregate salaries are $149,000 a year. Every one of those banks, including the bank of Atlanta, is managed in that same extravagant way.

I noticed that the legal services paid in New York, as I now remember, the sum of $9,000, while Boston paid $3,000, and that in Atlanta they paid their lawyers $8,000. The Atlanta bank paid $80,000 for printing and stationery. They were squandering the people's money.

At the same time that the currency is being contracted and enormous injury inflicted upon the valuation of property, Gov. W. P. G. Harding says that the circulation has not been reduced. Mr. President, I examined and have here now in my desk his own report for August of this year, which shows that since August of last year he has contracted the currency $500,000,000; or, to put it more understandingly, perhaps, to the ordinary person who may hereafter read what I have said on this subject, it means less money by $5 apiece for the use of every man, woman, and child in the United States; and that was done in one year.

Those who would look carelessly or casually at the Treasury reports would think we have in circulation something like $50 per capita. The Bank of Venice, which was founded in 1171 and lasted until 1797—when Napoleon Bonaparte crushed it with the military heel at the dictation of Parisian bankers—circulated $80 per capita. Venice was the richest country on earth under that circulation, and she had no gold standard, either. It was a circulation of governmental credit, paper, if you please, and for more than 500 years Venice led the commercial world in the rich commerce of the Near East and of the Mediterranean.

As shown in the official reports, nearly half of the money which we suppose to be in circulation is held in the bank vaults as reserves and is not in circulation at all. We have not more than $20 per capita in actual use. We have taken the blood out of the arteries of trade, and the operation has been sudden and heroic, and the results have been sudden and disastrous. The figures may be found on page 20 of the official report of the Comptroller of the Currency for 1920.

I also made the statement that the manufacturers had made, every year, more net earnings than all of the millions and millions and millions of people, young and old, black and white, had ever made in agriculture during any year.

I repeat that the United States Steel Corporation, according to its own published report, make more clear profits per year than all the farmers make any year. That is an astounding statement, but I am prepared to prove it by governmental reports and by the reports of the United States Steel Corporation itself. We have a great mountain of gold rapidly approaching $3,500,000,000 piled up, useless, dangerous, an Ararat upon whose summit no ark of safety rests for the human race, while the floods are pouring over the earth. It is a fearful situation.

Mr. President, why can not some of this money be put in circulation? Why not relieve the people of this enormous taxation? Why not do it now? As I said, the published program of the Republican Party was to relieve the people who make excessive profits. If there is a class of people in the country who can make excessive profits, it must be that the law gives them an advantage over their fellow citizens. There is no other explanation to be given.

This money power which is now enthroned is exactly the same that was combated in Washington's Cabinet by Edmund Randolph and Thomas Jefferson. It was put upon the country by Alexander Hamilton. The old bank died, as we all know, by the expiration of its charter. Then the money power came back, and during the time of President Andrew Jackson a bitter fight was made on the floor of the Senate against the renewal of the charter which was advocated by Henry Clay and Daniel Webster, large debtors of the bank. Thomas H. Benton succeeded in carrying the Senate with him, backed by the tremendous influence of Andrew Jackson, and the recharter measure was killed. But Mr. Benton said then, "The snake is not dead. It is only scotched. It will come back." It has come back.

There live in literature, and always will live there, some classical speciments of oratory of the highest sort, and the majority of those masterpieces of human speech are denunciations of the money power. Students in college and elsewhere read and recite, thrilling themselves and their audiences as they do so, the immortal indignation expressed in the words of Cicero when he denounced the depredations committed in Sicily by a Roman proconsul by the use of the money power. I said here once before that Julius Cæsar had grappled with the money power and was trying to destroy it, at the time the usurers conspired against him and killed him in the senate chamber. Froude's Cæsar relates the facts.

As Adam Smith says, in his Wealth of Nations, page 73, Brutus was lending money at 48 per cent; but here the Government's report shows that the Government itself is robbing our people of from 100 to 1,000 per cent every year in these Federal reserve banks.

Mr. McAdoo said the Coal Trust was robbing the people of a thousand per cent a year. I wish he had said it when he was in office. He said it after he got out of office, and that discounts his statement somewhat. Still their published reports show dropsical profits not good for them, harmful to the country.

In national wealth there is an increase of about 9 per cent a year. When any one corporation, or group of corporations, gets more than 9 per cent, there are millions of men just as deserving, just as patriotic, who are getting less than 9 per cent. The division is inevitable, and it should be equitable. As I said this morning, while the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH] was addressing the Senate, no one should be allowed to make excessive profits. There is a crime in excessive profits, just as Sam Jones, our immortal evangelist, used to say that God only knew how much damnation there was in a good bargain. It is a thought that goes deep. When one man gets advantage of another in a trade and swindles him, he does it on purpose, and it is a crime that involves moral turpitude.

I will remind Senators that the finest oration, perhaps, in the English language is Edmund Burke's arraignment of the East India Co., which had been robbing the Hindus. The subject of that speech, if Senators wish to look it up, is The Nabob of Arcot's Debts; and all Senators will remember the splendid peroration with which the great Irishman wound up his arraignment of Warren Hastings, at the bar of the House of Lords in England.

The same kind of speeches were made in France when the privileged few of church and state were robbing the producers of four-fifths of all that they could bring forth by their industry. The king had, as a last resort, to call the people together in congress, the states general. There came up the representatives of the third estate, and their complaints were the same that we are making here now of the outrageous taxation of the poor in behalf of the rich and privileged. The speeches that were made in behalf of those suffering people were so moving, appealing then as they did to the whole world, that on one night in August—August 4, 1789—a sort of epidemic of patriotism and self-sacrifice broke loose in the great constituent assembly of France, and one after another the nobles, who had been enjoying these privileges, renounced them, until not one was left. France adopted her declaration of the Rights of Man, as fine a state paper as the Virginia Bill of Rights, which in my judgment is finer than our Declaration of Independence.

Once upon a time, Jesus Christ lost his temper and committed assault and battery upon the money changers in the temple of his race, in the holy place which the bankers, the men of the money power, had invaded and desecrated by plying their trade in the house of worship. The lowly Nazarene lashed them with a scourge, as we are lashing them here with our tongues.

I will say that I am a conservative business man myself and have been so all my life, but the manner in which I and my people have been robbed by this money power makes me see red. If these men high in position who are contracting our currency and taking away the sinews of business do not take heed in time, some sort of scourge is going to fall on them, and it will fall heavily. Our people are not always going to be robbed of what they make and of what their wives and daughters help them to make. They are not always going to eat bread, while others live in luxury on the surplus products of the country. They are not always going to be insufficiently clothed, while the pampered few have more than their share and more than any human being can properly use. The time limit will come sooner or later, and I look for it to come just as it came in England, just as it came in France, just as it came in Germany, just as it came in Russia, when no clouds were on the horizon and when the sun shone clearest. It will come.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. Certainly.

Mr. KING. I have not heard all of the Senator's speech, but he just alluded to the contraction of the currency. I am not sure just what the Senator had reference to. I call the attention of the Senator to the fact that our gold supply was never greater than at present, and the issue of paper money—and I use the term paper money as representing all types except metallic money—was never greater per capita than at present, except for a few months at the peak of the war. The circulating medium of the United States to-day being considerably more than $50 per capita, as the Senator knows, is greatly in excess of what it was during our days of prosperity before we went into the war. For information, I should like to know what the Senator particularly had in mind when he alluded to the contraction of the currency.

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. Mr. President, I am sorry that my friend the Senator from Utah was out of the Chamber when I explained that very thing.

Mr. KING. Then, I shall not ask the Senator to repeat it.

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. The Senator is suffering under what is a very general misunderstanding as to the volume of currency. He is not allowing for the fact that the required bank reserves in the vaults of the national banks amount to $450,000,000; in the vaults of other banks and trust companies, under State supervision, $626,000,000; and in the Federal reserve banks, $960,000,000. If the Senator will rapidly add up those sums in his head, he will see that those reserves take out of circulation about one-half of the volume of our money. I alluded to the very figure which the Senator used, namely, that most people seem to think we have $50 per capita in circulation, whereas the Bank of Venice, as I have said already, had $80 per capita in circulation. We do not have in actual circulation more than $25 per capita at the outside; I think it is nearer $20.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. SPENCER in the chair). Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from New Mexico?

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. I yield, with pleasure.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I think I may state from recollection that only a day or two ago the last report of the Treasury Department which I saw stated the maximum circulation had been $58 and some cents per capita, while now it was $52 and some cents, showing a reduction of about $6 per capita, or in the neighborhood of 10 per cent.

Mr. OWEN. What the Senator from Georgia says is true, however, that the moneys which are supposed to be in circulation, and which are stated by the reports to be in circulation, are not in circulation as a matter of fact. The very figures show that they are tied up as reserves and not available as circulation. The figures also show that during the last year the currency which we had based upon commodity bills has contracted over a thousand million dollars.

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. Mr. President, the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. OWEN] is perfectly correct, and the Senator from New Mexico [Mr. JONES] has taken the face of the figures, without taking into consideration the reserves which are required by law.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I may add that I merely stated what I did as the showing of the Treasury Department itself, and I did not intend to make the statement as indicating any opposition to the views of the Senator from Georgia. I think the Senator from Georgia is quite right in presenting the argument which he is presenting.

Mr. OWEN. Mr. President, if the Senator from Georgia will pardon me, the point of his argument is the more emphasized, because that which has the same effect as a contraction of the currency—that is, the contraction of credit—has taken place on a perfectly gigantic scale in this country under the policy of the Federal Reserve Board, against which policy on three separate occasions I have entered my solemn protest in this Chamber, beginning in January two years ago. The Federal Reserve Board then began to raise the discount rates; they began to use their influence over the country and to exercise that influence upon member banks and upon the directors of member banks and upon the business men of this country until their false policies have paralyzed the credit of the country.

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. The Senator from Oklahoma is correct. He can prove every word that he has said, just as I can prove every word I say.

The Senator from Alabama [Mr. HEFLIN] alluded to the fact that 98 per cent of the wealth of the country was owned by 2 per cent of the population. He may not have recalled the coincidence that that was the exact proportion of concentrated wealth at the time of the downfall of the Babylonian Empire.

Mr. HEFLIN. If the Senator from Georgia will permit me, I do not think he caught all that I said just at the point to which he refers. I said that at the time when Rome fell 2 per cent of the population owned 98 per cent of the wealth, and that if present conditions continued it would not be long before 3 or 4 per cent of the people would own 90 per cent of the wealth of the United States.

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. To that extent I did misunderstand the Senator; but it is a well-known fact, Mr. President, to every student of economics that civilization can not be maintained, a State can not be maintained, where the greater number of the people are destitute; it simply can not be done. Here [exhibiting] in the finest work on civilization that I have ever read, by the Frenchman Du Coudray, a standard work, he distinctly corroborates what the Senator from Alabama said, to wit, that the Roman Empire fell, not so much on account of the barbarians as because of the concentration of wealth in the hands of the few that enervated the Roman rich and deprived the country precincts of population.

It is a well-known fact that the great miasmatic plains which are now inhabited by cattle and a few herdsmen who do not dare to sleep on the plains at night—the Roman Campagna—was once as flourishing as the garden which the church of the Senators from Utah has made out of a sandy waste. Those plains of Italy became depopulated because the present proprietor was wiped out by the land grabber, the land monopolist, by the usurer. It is literally a fact that the Roman Empire was eaten out from within by the usurer. I am citing these facts to Senators now with no hope of their having any effect here, but with some hope that they will have an effect upon the country. I say that the 30,000 corporations which admittedly make excess profits do so at the expense of the unprivileged. Those excessive profits ought to be taxed out of their pockets and put into the pockets of Uncle Sam, and the enormous profits and expenses of the Federal reserve system should be made illegal; indeed, if I had my way, I would stamp the life out of the whole system right now.

It has always been a characteristic of chaos when the power to coin money was vested anywhere except in the Government. During the Dark Ages every feudal lord claimed the right to administer justice, "the low, the middle, and the high," and to coin money. The crowning work of the great Cardinal Richelieu was to break the power of those feudal lords and bring them into subjection to the Crown; he took away from them the right to coin money.

Mr. President, it is a fact that the privilege of private citizens to coin money never passed from the hands of the Crown in England until the time of Charles II, when the goldsmiths of London—who were then her bankers—bribed one of the courtesans of that dissolute king to persuade him into granting them the privilege to coin money for use in Hindustan. She did what she was paid to do, and the act carrying that privilege, taking that much sovereign power away, stipulates the bribe that was paid to that woman by the goldsmiths. Since then, bankers everywhere consider crazy, in a sense, the man who says that they should confine their business to making loans, receiving deposits, making discounts, effecting exchange, and so forth. That is what banks are for. It was never intended that banks should rule the country through the agency of a money monopoly. Did not the National Government tax our State banks out of existence by a 10 per cent tax? That tax still exists, and no State bank can issue or control money.

The power to coin money and control it is an attribute of sovereignty; as much so as the power of the President and the Congress to declare a war and make peace; as much so as the right to establish post offices and post roads; as much so as to say how many soldiers shall serve under the flag, how many sailors and marines shall man our battleships. We have abdicated to private greed, which never becomes satisfied, whose appetite is insatiable—as cruel as the grave and as inevitable as death—a sovereign power.

This country will never be free and prosperous in any commercial or industrial sense, even if in a political sense, while this system remains. Those in charge of the Federal reserve system spend millions of dollars every year on a publicity agency, but I doubt very much whether the Senator from Alabama could get half a column in any daily paper in his State or if I could get half a column in any daily paper in my State for just such an attack as he has made and as I have made on them to-day, which attack I mean to repeat unless the Finance Committee brings out the resolution which I introduced requesting the President to remove these robbers from office.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. President, will my friend from Georgia yield to me for a moment?

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. Certainly.

Mr. HEFLIN. I made a speech here some weeks ago—the Senator was present when I made it—in which I accused the governor of the Federal Reserve Board of misrepresenting the Democratic nominee for President, Gov. Cox, as to what Gov. Cox had said to him about indorsing the deflation policy. I also read an editorial from the Washington Times charging the governor of the Federal Reserve Board with going over to the Republicans last fall during the Democratic campaign and voting the Republican ticket, and not a line about either one of them ever got into the daily press—not a line.

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. Which bears out my statement that their money controls the press—at least to a certain extent. They will not publish anything that you say against them if they can possibly prevent it, and if they do publish it it is apt to be a misrepresentation or a distortion or a garbled extract.

Mr. HEFLIN. If my friend will permit another interruption——

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. Certainly.

Mr. HEFLIN. I know a Senator in this body who received a letter the other day from a very responsible man in the country who charges the Federal Reserve Board with having a publicity bureau in Washington, the chief of which is paid $15,000 a year, and others who assist this man on down—I do not know what their salaries are, but it is charged in that letter that that situation exists now in the Capital of the country. Perhaps that accounts for the fact that we can not get this information to the country.

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. I think it quite likely. Just such an agency could not serve these criminals any better; and when I use the word "criminals" I mean it. They are criminals. Any set of men who would take the Government's power to issue and control money and then use it to give themselves incredible salaries, wasting it with profligacy, almost larceny after trust—any set of men who would make for themselves with a governmental agency profits running from 100 per cent to 1,000 per cent are not honest men. They do not know the first instincts of honesty.

They are at least as bad as the men whom Christ drove out of the temple in Jerusalem. They are at least as bad as the robber that Sheridan and Fox denounced in the English Parliament. They are at least as bad as the men that were denounced in the French Assembly. They are at least as bad as the men that Andrew Jackson denounced in his veto message. They are at least as bad as the men that Thomas H. Benton denounced on the floor of the United States Senate.

I have asked the President to remove them. The resolution is before the committee. I mean to bring up this subject from time to time until we get some sort of action, or I will endeavor to get unanimous consent here some day to consider that resolution. We will have a record vote on it and we will see who are for the people and who are for these robbers.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. GERRY] to the amendment of the committee.

Mr. GERRY. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the reading clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. FLETCHER (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the Senator from Delaware [Mr. BALL]. I am unable to obtain a transfer and therefore will have to withhold my vote. If at liberty to vote, I should vote "yea."

Mr. HALE (when his name was called). I have a pair with the senior Senator from Tennessee [Mr. SHIELDS], which I transfer to the senior Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS], and will vote. I vote "nay."

Mr. HARRIS (when his name was called). I have a pair with the junior Senator from New York [Mr. CALDER], who is absent, and therefore am not at liberty to vote. If at liberty to vote, I should vote "yea."

Mr. HARRISON (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the junior Senator from West Virginia [Mr. ELKINS]. I understand that he is absent on official business. I am unable to get a transfer, but if at liberty to vote, I should vote "yea."

Mr. KING (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. MCCUMBER]. He is not present, so I am not able to vote. If at liberty to vote, I should vote "yea."

Mr. STERLING (when his name was called). I have a pair with the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. SMITH]. I transfer that pair to the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. LADD] and will vote. I vote "nay."

Mr. SUTHERLAND (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON], who is absent. I transfer that pair to the junior Senator from Delaware [Mr. DU PONT] and will vote. I vote "nay."

Mr. SWANSON (when his name was called). I am paired with the senior Senator from Washington [Mr. JONES]. I do not know how he would vote if he were present, consequently I can not vote. If I were at liberty to vote, I should vote "yea."

Mr. TRAMMELL (when his name was called). I have a pair with the senior Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. COLT], who is absent. Being unable to obtain a transfer, I withhold my vote. If at liberty to vote, I should vote "yea."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. DIAL. I have a pair with the Senator from Colorado [Mr. PHIPPS] and therefore withhold my vote. If I were at liberty to vote, I should vote "yea."

The result was announced—yeas 28 nays 46, as follows:

So Mr. GERRY's amendment to the amendment of the committee was rejected.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. President, in reference to the amendment of the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. GERRY], which was disagreed to a moment ago, I would like to read a statement concerning the effect of the bill as it now stands upon incomes of less than $5,000. It is as follows:

Under the bill as it now stands, a married man without dependents having an income of $3,000 per year now pays $40. Under the pending bill he will pay $20, a reduction of 50 per cent.

If his income is $4,000 per year now he pays $80. Under the pending bill he will pay $60, a reduction of 25 per cent.

This assumes a married man without dependents. If he has dependents, the reduction would be proportionately greater.

If his income is $5,000 per year he pays $120. Under the pending bill he will pay $100, a reduction of 16⅔ per cent.

If his income is $6,000 per year he pays $170 per year. Under the pending bill he will pay $160, a reduction of about 6 per cent.

If his income is $50,000 per year he pays $9,190 per year. Under the pending bill he will pay $8,640, a reduction of 6 per cent.

If his income is $100,000 per year he now pays $31,190. Under the pending bill he will pay $30,140, a reduction of about 3⅓ per cent.

If his income is $1,000,000 he now pays $663,190. Under the pending bill he will pay $550,640, a reduction of about 17 per cent.

The greatest reduction in percentage therefore is the married man with an income under $3,000 per year.

I may say that if a man has an income of $2,500 per year under the pending bill he is relieved of all taxes, a reduction of 100 per cent.

The next greatest reduction is under $4,000 per year, and the reduction given the man with an income of $5,000 per year and the man with a million dollars a year is about the same.

The smallest reductions in the bill apply to the man between $6,000 per year and $100,000 per year.

Mr. President, it is the man with an income between $5,000 and $8,000 who really receives the smallest proportionate reduction under the bill, but the amendment of the Senator from Rhode Island, which has been disagreed to, proposed to apply a lower normal rate up to incomes of $15,000, at different rates.

Under the bill as it now stands the man with an income of $10,000 gets a reduction of 12 per cent, as under the existing law; with a $12,000 income he gets a reduction of 13 per cent; and with a $14,000 income he gets a reduction of 15 per cent. So if the amendment of the Senator from Rhode Island had been adopted it would have given the man with an income between $10,000 and $14,000 a much greater reduction proportionately than it would have given the man with an income under that sum.

Mr. HARRIS. Mr. President, I offer the amendment to the amendment of the committee which I send to the desk, and ask that it be read.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read the amendment to the amendment.

The READING CLERK. On page 23, line 2, after the word "centum," strike out the period and insert a colon and the following:

Provided further, That upon that amount of the net income which is received from the labor or personal service of the taxpayer the rate upon the first $4,000 or fraction thereof of such excess amount shall be 2 per cent and upon the second $4,000 or fraction thereof of such excess amount 4 per cent. In ascertaining the income subject to the tax imposed by this proviso the credits provided in section 216 shall be first allowed against such income received from the labor or personal service of the taxpayer, and in computing net income the deductions provided in section 214 shall be properly apportioned under rules and regulations prescribed by the commissioner, with the approval of the Secretary, between such income from the labor or personal service of the taxpayer and other income.

Mr. HARRIS. Mr. President, this amendment to the amendment makes a difference between earned and unearned incomes in the first and second $4,000 and fraction thereof of income. It is not just to tax a man receiving his income from bonds, rents, interest, or like sources, the same as we tax the man who labors or performs personal services for his income. The income of a man who labors depends upon his health and many other things, while the income of the man who has bonds, or gets his income from rents, is not. When the income tax law was passed, Mr. President, it was not intended that the man who worked and received a small income should be taxed; it was intended to tax the man with a large income. This amendment would make the tax just half upon the first $4,000 and the second $4,000 of his income from labor or personal service. Under the provisions of this bill the large incomes from wealth have been lowered, and I am trying to lower the tax on those who work for their incomes, most of which is taken up in the expenses of living.

Mr. TOWNSEND. I would like to ask the Senator from Georgia, in explanation of his amendment, if the services of a Representative or a Senator are regarded as personal labor or activity?

Mr. HARRIS. Mr. President, personal services would include the services of professional men, and the reference to labor would include all those who labor.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Where would a Congressman come in?

Mr. HARRIS. I should think it would include a Congressman. He has to labor for his salary.

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, I see justice and merit in this amendment. All labor, whether of hand or brain, is honorable and useful, but no one will contend that the blacksmith and the lawyer should be held strictly to the same rule, because a blacksmith uses his muscle and his thews and his sinews. His labor is debilitating. No one will say that, while we labor diligently here in the Senate, our labor is as debilitating and is as wearing as that of the man who works 12 or 14 hours in a mill or in a steel factory. So, while there is merit in this amendment, I think it would be better if it had one additional feature added to it, and I hope the Senator will accept this amendment and perfect his amendment accordingly, so that it will read:

That upon that amount of the net income which is received from the labor or personal service of the taxpayer, other than salaries paid by the United States, etc.

I hope the Senator will accept that.

Mr. HARRIS. I shall be very glad to accept that amendment, Mr. President.

Mr. ASHURST. Then, Mr. President, after the word "service," in line 2, add the words "other than salaries paid by the United States."

Mr. PENROSE. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Arizona yield to the Senator from Pennsylvania?

Mr. ASHURST. I yield.

Mr. PENROSE. I only wanted to make a statement about the proposition.

Mr. ASHURST. Of course, I will sit down at once if the Senator wants to talk.

Mr. PENROSE. I only wanted to say, Mr. President, if the Senator will permit, that not only in the course of the consideration of the pending bill, but in the course of the preparation of the bill which is now the law, the question of earned and unearned incomes was most exhaustively considered by the committee, by the Senate, and by the Treasury Department, and the opinion was nearly unanimous on the part of all who have examined it that any such provision is impossible of administration. Undoubtedly it is plausible, and on its face conclusive as to certain phases, but as a general proposition it is absolutely impossible of practical administration, in my opinion, and in the opinion of every one conversant with the subject with whom I have talked. I therefore hope, in the interest of effective legislation, that the amendment will not be agreed to.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, this question of the differential in favor of earned incomes compared with investment incomes is one which has received consideration from the Finance Committee in the past and about which there has been discussion in this Chamber in the past.

When we were preparing the bill of 1918 and the question was raised in the committee, it presented many complications, and because of the hurry under which that bill necessarily was framed and passed no serious effort was made to work out a practical system of taxation for unearned incomes as distinguished from investment incomes; but I recall distinctly that the committee at that time was sympathetic with the suggestion that in fairness and justice there should be a difference, and when the idea was raised upon the floor of the Senate and pressed with considerable vigor I recall that I, as chairman of the committee at that time, made the statement that the committee had considered it, but on account of the difficulties of framing a good system in the midst of the pressure of haste under which we were then acting, while the committee sympathized with the suggestion, no action had been taken.

No action of a general character was taken, but the act of 1918 recognized the principle for which the Senator from Georgia now contends. When we went to work to frame the provision of the bill with reference to personal-service corporations, I think, as the Senator from Wisconsin probably will remember, there was discussion to the effect that personal-service earnings ought not to be put upon the same basis as investment earnings, and while we were not able to formulate a general system at that time, we did recognize that the earnings of personal-service corporations ought not to be taxed as highly as the earnings of investment corporations, and in order to adjust that question so far as we could as it respected personal-service corporations, we deliberately provided that personal-service corporations should be treated as partnerships to the end that they might be exempt from excess-profits taxes. That was done for the express purpose of differentiating the earnings of individuals brought about through the exercise of their mental or their physical powers from the earnings of a corporation which invested nothing but money.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President——

Mr. SIMMONS. I yield to the Senator from Montana.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. In view of the statement made by the Senator from Pennsylvania a few moments ago as to the impracticability of carrying out such a system as is proposed by the amendment printed by the Senator from Georgia, I inquire of the Senator whether the provision of the law to which he now adverts has been found impracticable of operation.

Mr. SIMMONS. It has not been found impracticable of operation. It has operated very justly and very fairly. The idea I mean to convey to the Senate is that while we at that time did not undertake to work out a comprehensive system of differentiation between those two classes of earnings, we found that such could be easily accomplished as far as it applied to personal-service corporations, and having thus found, we so applied the principle in that particular. We exempted them from excess profits for no reason in the world except that we recognized the principle that the earnings of a man's hand and the earnings of his brain ought not to be taxed upon the same principle and to the same extent as the earnings of mere dollars. So that it can not be said, as the chairman of the committee has suggested, that it has been found impracticable. It was not found impracticable, to that extent, nor is it impracticable when applied to the extent that the Senator from Georgia proposes.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President——

Mr. SIMMONS. I yield to the Senator from Wisconsin.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. The Senator from North Carolina, of course, knows well that Great Britain has maintained exactly this system of taxation for scores of years.

Mr. SIMMONS. Exactly, and I was going to refer to that. I thank the Senator for reminding me of it.

It would require considerable time to work out a complete system to make this differentiation all along the line, but the instance to which I have referred was one where it could be easily done, and this is another instance where it can be easily done. All the Senator from Georgia proposes is that the earnings of a man's hand and the earnings of a man's brain shall, up to $4,000, pay but 2 per cent as a normal tax, as compared with the 4 per cent normal tax up to that amount if earned upon investment, and that between $4,000 and $8,000 shall pay a tax of only 4 per cent by way of normal tax so earned, as compared with 8 per cent if earned upon investment, just one-half as much. It is only to apply to those small earnings of not more than $8,000.

As to earnings of that character, we must recognize the fact that the majority, probably, of taxpayers, if not the majority then a very large per cent of taxpayers, are those whose taxable incomes are only $4,000 to $8,000 and who earn that $4,000 to $8,000 by personal service.

When we reach the higher brackets the earnings from personal service are small compared with earnings from investment, but in the low brackets to which the Senator's amendment applies earnings are largely those of labor, physical labor, trained physical labor, and intellectual labor. I hope the day has not come in the United States when we are to refuse to treat the earnings that come as the result of human effort, earnings that represent the heart throbs of a man, earnings that represent so much taken out of every man's life in many instances, on a different basis from investment earnings, or when we shall say that they shall be estimated no higher than the earnings made out of dollars and cents.

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me at that point?

Mr. SIMMONS. With pleasure.

Mr. ASHURST. This same humanitarian impulse makes itself manifest in the State statutes of many States in that all personal earnings in many, if not most, of the States are exempt from attachment except for certain kinds of debts. To the carpenter's tools the same rule applies. It is a humanitarian statute, which attempts to get away from the harsh old rule where the workman debtor's last penny could be taken, the old English rule where the very furniture upon which the family served their simple meals could be taken, the bed upon which the woman who was ill could be taken. This is along the same humanitarian line. It is the personal earnings, as the Senator has well said, which represents the sweat and life and strength of the individual. We should have a care to it. It is not special legislation to have a regard for such earnings.

Mr. SIMMONS. The differentiation is small. It applies only to small earnings and small incomes.

Mr. WATSON of Indiana. Mr. President, will the Senator permit an interruption?

Mr. SIMMONS. I yield to the Senator from Indiana.

Mr. WATSON of Indiana. On the other hand, take an estate where bonds, for instance, have been left to a widow and orphans. Under the provisions of the amendment proposed they would be taxed a higher rate up to the $8,000 than the salary of the Congressman.

Mr. SIMMONS. If their income was made from money.

Mr. WATSON of Indiana. Or the salary of the President about whom we have heard to-day. On the other hand, whatever may be said of the general merits of the proposition as a theoretical scheme, suppose a grocery where there are two partners and they have certain earnings taxed at a certain rate. Suppose those two partners form a corporation and are then taxed on their income. The Senator sees, does he not, that in the case of a corporation they would be taxed at a lesser rate than in the case of the individual partnership? What justice can there be in a proposition of that kind?

Mr. SIMMONS. I do not know that I follow the Senator. The Senator said as a corporation they would be taxed less.

Mr. WATSON of Indiana. Certainly at a higher rate because taxed on the dividends.

Mr. SIMMONS. The Senator means the income tax imposed upon a corporation. I do not follow the Senator clearly.

Mr. WATSON of Indiana. I mean the dividends declared to the individual from corporate income taxed to the individual.

Mr. SIMMONS. That is, dividends derived from investment?

Mr. WATSON of Indiana. Certainly.

Mr. SIMMONS. And the Senator from Georgia proposes to tax them higher than the income derived from personal service. That is what the Senator from Georgia proposes and exactly what I say is fair. If the taxpayer made his income from his corporate investments, then he is taxed 8 per cent; but if he made it from his personal service he is taxed a lesser rate.

Mr. WATSON of Indiana. But in a close corporation like the one I spoke of, the earnings are made quite as much by personal service in the corporation as in the partnership.

Mr. SIMMONS. But in the corporation they pay him a salary, and that salary represents personal earnings.

Mr. WATSON of Indiana. They might or might not pay him a salary.

Mr. SIMMONS. If he does not charge a salary, then he has no personal earnings in that corporation except as they might be absorbed in the total earnings of the corporation. But in the other case, if a salary is paid to the members of a partnership, that salary would be subject to the smaller tax rate which the Senator from Georgia proposes. If a salary is paid him for his work in the corporation that salary would be taxed at a lesser rate, which the Senator from Georgia proposes.

Mr. WATSON of Indiana. And in the case of all these estates?

Mr. SIMMONS. In every case, if the Senator will pardon me, where income is compensation for personal services, whether it be by way of salary or day wages, it will be taxed according to the lesser rate which the Senator from Georgia provides, but in every case where the income has no connection with the personal services of the man who draws it, but represents merely the dollars that he has put into that business, then it is taxed at the higher rate.

Mr. WATSON of Indiana. Of course, the Senator has already admitted that in the case of an estate where money is left to widows and orphans under this arrangement they would be taxed a higher rate than applies to the salaries of the Members of Congress.

Mr. SIMMONS. Why, of course, if the income was derived from property which they owned.

Mr. WATSON of Indiana. Certainly; or bonds.

Mr. SIMMONS. We can not make a law to impose a different rate upon the earnings of a widow's property than upon the earnings of a man's property. That is begging the question. That gets us nowhere. Of course, the case of the widow appeals to us, but we can not make a law to differentiate between the tax upon the earnings from her property and the tax upon the earnings from a man's property, and the Senator knows that. That is too plain to be argued.

Mr. REED. Mr. President——

Mr. SIMMONS. I yield to the Senator from Missouri.

Mr. REED. How does that argument lie in the mouth of the Senator who just made it when he is advocating a bill now—the present bill—which does not make the distinction which he urges?

Mr. SIMMONS. Of course, no law ever has.

Mr. REED. His argument against this proposition is that it does not make a distinction which his own bill does not make.

Mr. WATSON of Indiana. What I am asking for is uniformity. The Senator from Missouri is mistaken about that. I am asking for uniformity of taxation. The Senator is seeking here to discriminate. Not only that, but I believe his proposition is unworkable.

Mr. SIMMONS. We have not yet worked out an entire comprehensive system, but we found the principle not unworkable when we applied it to incomes of personal-service corporations. For the same reason it will not be unworkable when applied to the limited extent proposed in the amendment offered by the Senator from Georgia.

Mr. SWANSON. Mr. President, as I understand, it has been worked out in Great Britain.

Mr. SIMMONS. Yes; but it will take time to work it out here.

Mr. SWANSON. Great Britain has worked it out, and her success would seem to justify us in trying it.

Mr. SIMMONS. The only reason why the committee in 1918 did not attempt to work it out—because I say now, as I said upon the floor of the Senate when that bill was up, that the committee had sympathy for the suggestion—was because we were hurried and we recognized it would require considerable time to work out a comprehensive system, and hence we did not undertake to do it at that time. I said upon the floor of the Senate that thereafter that question would confront us and we would have to solve it; and, indeed, we shall have to solve it.

Not only have we given the question consideration in the Senate in recent years and partially worked it out, but there are many States in the country that adopted the system and where it is in operation to-day. In my own State in the last campaign it was an issue. I discussed it upon the stump in that State just in the way I am discussing it here now. I said then as I say now that it is an outrage and an injustice of the grossest kind to impose the same taxes upon the earnings of a man's heart and brain and soul that are imposed upon a dollar.

There ought to be a differentiation, and in my State we decided so. Many other States in the Union have so decided. I think the great State of New York to-day has a system of that kind. There are many countries in the world to-day that have systems of that kind. My own information is that Great Britain has a system of this sort radically differentiating between incomes derived from personal service and human effort and incomes derived from the investment of money.

Mr. President, the Senator's amendment does not go very far, and it is entirely practicable. It will be easily applied; it will give relief as to earnings up to $8,000 that are made by human effort. I think the Senator has put his finger upon a point where, more than in any other instance of which I can now think, the relief proposed will be of wide application. It will be small, it is true, but in that $8,000 of first earnings is embraced, Mr. President, a large part of the money which is made in this country year after year by the personal efforts of human beings. The Senator, in my judgment, has done a distinct service in suggesting a way by which we may recognize the right of the men making small earnings to different treatment from that accorded those who make other millions out of the investment of their millions.

Mr. HARRIS. Mr. President, I wish to ask the Senator from Indiana [Mr. WATSON] if he would be willing to support the amendment if there should be added a provision including the income of widows—the matter to which he has referred—so as to allow to widows and orphans the same reduction that is allowed to income from personal service? I should be very glad to have such a provision added to the amendment; and I wondered if the Senator from Indiana would be kind enough to support the amendment in the event that such a modification were made.

Mr. WATSON of Indiana. Mr. President, it would greatly aid the amendment, in my estimation, if such a provision should be added, but I have no authority on the part of the committee to accept the amendment.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, let me make a suggestion to the Senator from Georgia.

Mr. HARRIS. I shall be glad to have a suggestion.

Mr. REED. Suppose we adopt the amendment as it is, and then let the Senator from Indiana consult the committee and see if the committee will not let the Senator from Georgia add the provision which he suggests relative to widows by way of an amendment? We will all support such a proposition when it comes to a vote.

Mr. WATSON of Indiana. I am trying to ascertain, as soon as the experts can give me an estimate, about how much difference it would make in the revenue if the amendment were adopted, because always at this stage of the proceedings that is an essential point of inquiry.

Mr. REED. And, Mr. President, always I reply that Senators on the other side are proposing to take off $450,000,000 in the way of excess-profits taxes; and all we have got to do is to put a part of that back on, and we shall have money enough to make up for the reductions.

Mr. WATSON of Indiana. Which, to my mind, is no reply whatever, as I shall attempt to show when we come to discuss the question of the excess-profits tax.

Mr. REED. I shall be glad to meet my friend at Philippi on that question.

Mr. WATSON of Indiana. I shall be very happy if we may. I am not, however, issuing any challenge on the floor of the Senate, to which I am very averse. I may say to the Senator from Georgia, now that the experts have just informed me, that we would lose by the proposed reduction $135,000,000 of revenue. In view of the fact that many complications would be involved in the administration of such a plan, which the gentlemen from the Treasury Department say is not workable, and in view of the fact that at this particular time we are not able to see where we could get back the $135,000,000 of revenue, I am unwilling to vote for the proposed amendment.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I wish to ask the Senator from Indiana a question.

Mr. HARRIS. Will the Senator from Idaho permit me a moment?

Mr. BORAH. Certainly.

Mr. HARRIS. I should like to add to my amendment the words "the labor and personal service and income of widows and orphans."

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I suggest to the Senator not to add that, as it will introduce a doubtful question.

Mr. HARRIS. I will withdraw the suggestion and will offer it separately.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I do not wish to discuss this matter at length. I do not think that the question of the incomes of widows and orphans ought to enter into this particular question at all. The proposed amendment is based upon what has long been considered as a fundamental principle in income tax legislation, and that is, where it is practical and possible, to distinguish between earned and unearned income. The amendment is designed to make that distinction. I read in the newspaper only a few days ago of a child two years of age who had inherited $60,000,000. In other words, there is an entirely different principle involved. I do not know as to the present situation, not having looked into it lately, but prior to the World War for years England in her income tax laws distinguished between unearned and earned incomes—incomes coming from personal service and incomes coming from investments. The design of this amendment is to put that principle into the pending bill. It seems to me a perfectly sound principle.

As to the actual workings of the principle, of course, I am unable to say, and I do not know what the view of the Treasury Department is in regard to it. I do know, however, that it has been worked out in Great Britain as a practical proposition and that they adhere to it now, or have done so for years. I do not see why it could not be worked out as a practical proposition here; and certainly, Mr. President, there is a fundamental reason why the man who earns $4,000 by his hands should be taxed upon a different basis than the person who has an income of $4,000 by reason of bonds or some property which has been left to him or by reason of investments of other kinds. It is that distinction which makes the amendment attractive to me.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Mr. President, the Senator from Michigan [Mr. TOWNSEND] asked the Senator from Georgia [Mr. HARRIS] whether the salaries of Senators would be considered earned income under this bill. I am sure Senators will be pleased to have called to their attention something that has not been called to their attention heretofore, that there is under this bill practically an exemption to all Representatives and Senators. We know what trouble there was in 1913 when a direct exemption was provided for public servants; but under this bill, in a disguised form, there is provided the means for every Representative and Senator to eliminate entirely the income tax on his salary. I will call attention to that provision. I read from page 38, under the title "Deductions allowed individuals":

SEC. 214. (a) That computing net income there shall be allowed as deductions—

And for the first time there has been inserted these words—

traveling expenses (including the entire amount expended for meals and lodging) while away from home in the pursuit of a trade or business.

The department has already ruled that public servants away from home are in pursuit of a trade or business. So that provision of this bill will permit every Representative and Senator to deduct from his income all that he may pay for board and lodging while he is in attendance upon his duties in Washington.

Mr. TRAMMELL. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a question with regard to another paragraph in the bill?

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Certainly.

Mr. TRAMMELL. There has been some criticism directed against the amendment proposed by the Senator from Georgia [Mr. HARRIS] because of the possibility of Senators and Representatives being allowed the same deductions from their salaries as would under his amendment be made on the income of all other citizens. If the amendment of the Senator from Georgia is subject to that criticism, is not the bill as reported by the committee subject to a similar criticism, for on page 23 we find a reduction to 4 per cent upon incomes of $4,000 in excess of the deductions allowed? Will not Representatives and Senators secure the benefit of that provision if the bill passes in its present form just the same as every other taxpayer? If the amendment which has been proposed here for the benefit of those having small incomes is objectionable because Representatives and Senators might enjoy alike that benefit, will not Senators and Representatives secure the benefit of the reduction to 4 per cent on the first $4,000 in excess of the net amount over the deductions allowed by the bill?

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, the observations of the Senator from Florida do not apply to the amendment offered by the Senator from Georgia, because the Senator from Georgia has perfected his amendment by accepting the language which I proposed, to wit, on line 2, after the word "service," to insert "other than salaries paid by the United States." So whatever evils might be lurking in the bill at another point, surely it can not be said, after the Senator has accepted that language, that anything in his amendment would ipso facto or even inferentially exclude the salaries of Members of Congress from taxation. The amendment seems to me, whatever may be in the bill elsewhere, to be free from that vice.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, I do not think there is anything in the bill to that effect.

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, I did not say there was. I do not believe salaries of Senators and Representatives should be exempt from income tax. I think such earnings should be taxed.

Mr. SIMMONS. The committee bill applies to all earnings alike, whether from personal service or otherwise.

Mr. ASHURST. But an observation was made to the effect that if we should adopt the amendment of the Senator from Georgia, we would relieve the salaries of Senators and Representatives from taxation. The Senator from Georgia has accepted language which would preclude the possibility of such a construction.

Mr. SIMMONS. The point I was making was that there was no necessity of language precluding that conclusion until there is submitted an amendment which makes a differentiation.

Mr. ASHURST. Exactly.

Mr. SIMMONS. And the bill now does not differentiate in that way.

Mr. TRAMMELL. The point I was making was that the amendment offered by the Senator from Georgia could not be criticized in that respect if consistency were observed in dealing with the amendment proposed by the committee, because the committee in its amendment proposed that upon the first $4,000 the rate shall only be 4 per cent instead of being 8 per cent. That would certainly reach Representatives and Senators, so that they would participate in the reduction from 8 per cent to 4 per cent the same as would everybody else in the country.

So far as I am concerned, I do not take seriously the criticism that is offered by some who are opposed to legislation of this kind on the ground that Senators or Representatives might secure some benefit that every other person in the country similarly situated would obtain under such measure. I think the contention is more of a subterfuge than it is a real, substantial argument. It might just as well be said that there should not be any exemption of $2,000 or $3,000 because, forsooth, Representatives and Senators, as all other taxpayers, are entitled to it. I do not think there is very much in that argument. We have got to deal with the American people as a whole, and if a Member of Congress happens to come in a class that some of the others come in, he should be entitled to the same recognition. I am not arguing for Representatives and Senators, but I am taking the position that the argument which has been made is rather inconsistent. I am very glad, so far as I am concerned, to support the amendment offered by the Senator from Georgia with the provision in it that it shall not apply to officials' salaries. That unquestionably relieves his amendment from the objection raised on that particular point. I do not think he intended to give Senators or Congressmen the benefits of his amendment. They should not be allowed the deduction he proposes.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Mr. President, I wish to say that when the language to which I have referred was considered by the committee it was discussed from the standpoint of allowing the exemption to traveling salesmen. It was thought that their traveling expenses were a matter for proper deduction and that their meals and lodging should also be included in such deduction; but I have no doubt whatever that the department will so interpret the provision, for already in similar cases they have so interpreted it as to permit a Senator or a Representative while here in Washington attending his duties to an exemption for board and lodging. I am not discussing the merits of the question, whether it is wise or unwise; but the fact still remains that that language will permit a Representative or a Senator to charge off as an exemption the amount expended for board and lodging.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, I do not think any member of the committee had that matter called to his attention. Probably if it had been called to the attention of members of the committee they might have agreed with the Senator from Massachusetts; but if there is any danger of such a result, I suggest to the Senator from Massachusetts that I do not believe that any Senator would oppose an amendment providing that it shall not apply.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. I recall the fact that in the committee no reference was made to its effect upon Senators or Representatives. The matter was called to my attention since the bill came from the committee, and the question was propounded to me as to what effect it would have upon deductions that Representatives and Senators could make. I made inquiries and found out what the rulings of the department were, and I came to the conclusion that these deductions could be made by Representatives and Senators as well as by anybody else.

Mr. BORAH and Mr. WATSON of Indiana addressed the Chair.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Massachusetts yield; and if so, to whom?

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. I yield first to the Senator from Idaho.

Mr. BORAH. I did not understand what the deduction is that may be made, and how it may be made, as the Senator claims, by Members of Congress.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Traveling expenses, including the entire amount expended for meals and lodging while away from home in the pursuit of a trade or business.

Mr. BORAH. Does that mean that we could exclude all our meals and lodging while we are away from home and here in Washington, year after year?

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. I so understand it.

Mr. WATSON of Indiana. Mr. President, I am informed, of course, by those who are here representing the Treasury Department that being a Member of Congress is not carrying on any trade or business. The language is:

> All the ordinary and necessary expenses paid or incurred during the taxable year in carrying on any trade or business, including a reasonable allowance for salaries or other compensation for personal services actually rendered—

That is, in carrying on any trade or business—

> Traveling expenses (including the entire amount expended for meals and lodging) while away from home in the pursuit of a trade or business.

In other words, you would have to construe that being a Member of Congress was either a trade or a business, and these gentlemen tell me that there is no possibility of any such construction, and, furthermore, that so far as the transaction of the business in which we are engaged is concerned, this is our home in the pursuit of this business.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Massachusetts yield to the Senator from Mississippi?

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. I yield to the Senator from Mississippi.

Mr. WILLIAMS. The Senator from Massachusetts has just informed us that there has been a decision by some department of the Government to the effect that being a Senator or a Representative is a trade or a business. I do not know whether there has been any such decision or not. I take it for granted that the Senator has looked into it and that he has correctly quoted what he has heard. If that be true, it merely proves what asses the bureaucracy and the so-called experts are. To pronounce that a man who is a Senator of the United States or a Representative of a district in Congress is thereby engaged in a trade is belittling all democracy and belittling all government.

Mr. WATSON of Indiana. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Wait a minute. To say that a man who is a Senator or a Representative and is attempting to carry on the public business is thereby and for that reason engaged in a private business is belittling all democracy and all government.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Mr. President——

Mr. WILLIAMS. I deny that when I am doing my duty here as I understand it I am carrying on a trade or that this is my business. My business is planting—farming. Another man's business is practicing law. Another's is carrying on something else; and if this idiotic bureaucracy—and all bureaucracies are idiotic; they become so by routine following—has decided that public service is a trade and that public business is a private business it is about time we were getting rid of some of them. It never would have struck me, speaking for myself, to have attempted to deduct as an exemption due me as a Senator my living expenses in Washington because they were a part of the expenses of my trade or my business.

I pity the man whose only business is politics. I pity the man whose trade is politics, and I pity a government that has found even experts asses enough to declare that a public service is a trade, or is a private job, or is a business. It may be true that there are Senators and Representatives who could not live without their salaries as long as they are neglecting their other business; but, still, doing your work here in the Senate is not private business. It is public business, and you are not entitled to deduct expenses as if it were a private business; and although it has been urged by others—amongst others, by James Bryce in his "Modern Democracy"—that too much of American politics consists in making a trade of public business, still the servants of the Government, the so-called experts, the bureaucracy who are becoming more and more representative of the Government every day, and more and more the invisible empire that governs us outside of the two Houses of the National Legislature, ought to have been ashamed of themselves to have made any such public declaration.

I should like to ask the Senator from Massachusetts if he can put his finger upon the decision of the department upon which he relied in connection with this matter, so that, if possible, we can trace it back to the man who had so false an idea of public duty as to be guilty of that decision?

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Mr. President, I can not cite the decision, but I can state to the Senator that an expert in the department stated to me that the rulings of the department would permit a Senator or a Representative to make the deductions that I have mentioned.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Oh, well, Mr. President, then perhaps the expert is mistaken. I have known a greater number of mistaken men among experts than among any other class of people. The expert is by necessity narrow-minded. He runs in a groove. He can not conceive of a general idea. He is incapable of abstract reasoning. He is merely led by one little departmental precedent after another, and maybe he saw somewhere something that led him to infer that that would be the decision of the department. I will undertake now to say that no full-blooded American in any department, even though he calls himself an expert, will ever issue a departmental decision that my duties as a Senator constitute a trade, and that the public business to which I pay my attention in my inefficient way is my private business.

Mr. WATSON of Indiana. Mr. President, will the Senator permit me to interrupt him?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Yes.

Mr. WATSON of Indiana. The only experts on the floor representing the Treasury Department, three of them, have distinctly stated to me since this matter came up, and I so stated a while ago when the Senator was not present——

Mr. WILLIAMS. I have been present. I did not hear the Senator.

Mr. WATSON of Indiana. They stated that by no possible construction could the proposition announced by the Senator from Massachusetts be included within the provisions of the bill.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I am glad to hear that.

Mr. WATSON of Indiana. I knew the Senator would be.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I am glad to hear that, because then we have at least three narrow-groove men against one narrow-groove man, and even three narrow-groove men are better than one narrow-groove man, although one broad-gauge man would be better than all four of them.

Mr. President, I want to say just a few words about the danger of the American people sinking into Prussianism through a stereotyped civil service.

I remember, with an affection that I can hardly describe, a deceased friend, formerly a Senator from the State of Indiana, Mr. Shively, one of God's noblemen, one of the choicest products of American private and public life. He and I were once placed upon a subcommittee of which I was chairman and he was a member. I said, "Ben, do you want to hear any experts about this?" He said, "John, I do not." I said, "Well, I do not." We consulted the other member of the subcommittee, who was at that time the blind statesman from Oklahoma, Mr. Gore, and he said he did not; and Shively and Gore and I had a great deal less trouble explaining our department—for everything then was divided among several subcommittees—to the Senate and to the Congress and to the country than the men who had permitted themselves to be limited and hamstrung by so-called experts.

I have an immense admiration for a real expert, but a little departmental clerk in Washington is not a sure-enough expert. He does not know anything except what another little departmental clerk a little bit higher than he is told him a little while before that, and then the lower and subordinate expert clerk undertakes to instruct the Senator from Massachusetts; and then, finding that they are in a fix, three experts double on one expert, and they undertake to instruct the Senator from Indiana.

We are either fit to represent the country here and to legislate for it or we are not. Of course, it is true, as James Bryce says, that too many men in public life in America were never trained for public life, were never educated for it, never read for it, never thought for it; but, still, there are plenty to carry on the public business. There is a use for an accountant now and then. There is a use for a man to make an estimate as to how much revenue may come from a certain tax. We can not make of ourselves public or private accountants or bookkeepers in the Treasury Department; but when it comes to taking advice upon the nature or character or tendency of a tax, for God's sake do not take it from a bureaucracy.

They can not get out of their rut. They differ in the color of their eyes and their hair and their stature and their weight, but they do not differ from one another at all in the bureaucratic tinge which marks them all as one. After a while, if you continue that sort of thing, you will sink to Prussianism, where really the only thing stronger than the divine right of the Kaiser was a bureaucracy that told him what to say and what to do—a military bureaucracy, a naval bureaucracy, and a civil bureaucracy of some description or other.

Mr. President, if, contrary to the opinion of the three Watson experts and in accordance with the opinion of the one Walsh expert any employee of this Government shall ever determine that a Senator's public business is a private job or that it is a trade, then the departmental chief who does not discharge that fool ought himself to be impeached.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President, the President of the United States is required to do a considerable amount of traveling in the ordinary discharge of his duties, and much more in the discharge of incidental duties. I was wondering whether he would be denied the right to get credit for his expenses in traveling upon the ground that he did not pursue a trade or business. A minister of the gospel, traveling around on a circuit, undoubtedly incurs considerable expense for traveling and for meals during his absence from home, and I was wondering whether he would be denied the right to take credit upon the ground that he did not pursue a trade or business.

Mr. CARAWAY. Mr. President, no minister ever got pay enough to warrant him in making this deduction.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Perhaps that is true. But, Mr. President, I did not rise to discuss that matter. I rose to call attention to information given by the Senator from Indiana, in charge of the bill——

Mr. WATSON of Indiana. I beg the Senator's pardon; I was consulting with the expert.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I was saying that I rose to call attention to information given by the Senator from Indiana, in charge of the bill, to the effect that the amendment offered by the Senator from Georgia would result in a loss of revenue amounting to $135,000,000. I suppose this was merely a rough guess upon first impression by the experts, but I refer to it for the purpose of indicating how much reliance ought to be placed upon information of that character which comes to us.

Mr. WATSON of Indiana. Will the Senator permit an interruption?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I am glad to yield.

Mr. WATSON of Indiana. I consulted Mr. McCoy, the Treasury expert as to estimates, whom we all on both sides of the Chamber consult, and, so far as I know, he is a most reliable and trustworthy man, at least I have always found him so, and I think the Senator has if he has ever had occasion to consult him. I handed him this amendment, while several Senators around were asking him questions, and asked him what in his judgment would be the loss of revenue occasioned by the adoption of the amendment, and offhand he said $135,000,000. Afterwards he got the amendment and went back and studied it, and then came up to me and said, "I gave you too hasty an opinion. It will mean a loss of from about $80,000,000 to $85,000,000." He added, "I had not even had a chance to glance at the amendment when I answered you offhand."

Mr. WALSH of Montana. My purpose in rising was simply to call attention to the fact that no opportunity had been given to the experts to study the problem, and I take it that this modified and reduced estimate also is merely in the nature of a guess.

I deemed that it must be, because we were apprised only the other day, and again this morning, in connection with the amendment tendered by the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. GERRY], that his amendment would result in a reduction of $135,000,000, and it contemplated that all incomes—not those alone derived from personal service of the taxpayer but all incomes—should pay a normal tax of only 2 per cent up to $5,000, of 4 per cent from $5,000 to $10,000, and of 6 per cent on incomes from $10,000 to $15,000, while the amendment before us contemplates a reduction only of from 4 to 2 on incomes up to $4,000, and from 8 to 4 on the second $4,000. One making a rough estimate would say that the loss occasioned by the amendment tendered by the Senator from Georgia should not be to exceed one-third of the amount that would be lost had the amendment tendered by the Senator from Rhode Island been adopted. Accordingly, the loss of revenue, if that is the appropriate expression, does not seem to be very great in connection with the amendment tendered by the Senator from Georgia. It will be observed that it is only in the case of incomes derived from personal services that the deduction is to be made, and, in the second place, that the deduction does not go beyond incomes of $8,000.

Mr. CARAWAY. Mr. President, if I understood correctly, the Senator from Indiana advanced two reasons why he would not be willing to accept the amendment offered by the Senator from Georgia, the first being that the Treasury could not bear the loss of revenue and the second that it was not workable.

What I am curious to know is, if the Treasury expert can tell you in 10 minutes how much revenue you will lose, why can not that same expert finally evolve some rule for administration? If he can so differentiate the incomes which will be affected by the amendment so that in 10 minutes he can tell you how much money the Treasury will be deprived of if the amendment is agreed to, how can he say in the next breath it is not a workable plan at all? It seems absolutely absurd to me that both reasons should be advanced, one that you can not tell what it is going to do and that they can not administer it, and in 10 minutes have the expert tell you how much will be lost by the Treasury Department. Certainly the Senator from Indiana does not want both of those to stand as reasons.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, we have gone a little aside from the question before the Senate. I do not know whether it was the introduction of the question of widows into this discussion that scattered everybody and started Senators going in different directions, but we have done so. Before I say what I want to in regard to the bill, let me say a word as to these experts.

I have sat on the committee with these gentlemen from the Treasury Department, and they have been called upon many times to answer questions very quickly as to the amount of revenue which would be derived under a certain plan of taxation, the amount of money that might be lost by a suggested change, and so forth. They have necessarily been obliged to make estimates, because no man can tell the amount of business which will be carried on in this country, therefore he can not tell absolutely the amount of a tax; but I have been struck with the fact, first, that they have apparently always answered according to their best judgment regardless of whether it was a Democratic Senator who asked the question or a Republican, and regardless of whether it was the proponent of a proposition or a critic of a proposition who asked the question.

They were called in for the purpose of dealing with technique of this matter. I think they are very competent men for the performance of that kind of work. I have only one criticism to make. I think in a few instances they have been too much inclined to say that some plan suggested was not workable, or was difficult of administration, and perhaps being engaged in the business of administration they very naturally incline somewhat toward the removal of difficulties and the escaping of difficulties. That, however, is but human.

The proposition which is now made, namely, to distinguish, in levying a tax upon incomes, between the income which is the result of personal labor and service and the income which is the result of invested capital, seems to me to be one which is not surrounded with nearly as many difficulties as the administration of other provisions already in the law. In all of these laws the Treasury Department is authorized to make rules and regulations, and that rules and regulations could be adopted which would carry the purpose of this bill into effect I do not entertain the slightest doubt.

To begin with, if a man earns a salary, if that is the sole source of his income, that question settles itself; it can be nothing but personal earnings. If he earns a salary, and then collects dividends upon certain stocks which he holds, it is very easy to distinguish in that case. So in the great majority of cases the line of demarcation between an income personally earned and an income which results from capital is very simple.

I grant you that there is a difficult field. A man may be engaged in conducting a business. He may take no salary from the business, but may receive his income in the nature of profits from that business. In that event there is a combination of two things, his personal labor and his invested capital, and the earnings from both sources flow into one common stream. But is it impossible, therefore, to ascertain how much ought to be charged to capital and how much ought to be charged to personal earnings? You know the amount of his invested capital. You know what a fair return upon it would be, and you can ascertain the fair salary which ought to be paid to a man engaged in the kind of business he is engaged in. Rules and regulations can be adopted, and I am unwilling that this proposition should be defeated upon any such puerile ground as that it can not be administered, because, Mr. President, if we can administer the other intricate features of this bill, the difficulties of the one I am now discussing can be readily solved.

Now, we are met by another argument to which I wish to give just a moment's attention. It is stated by my very good friend, whom I so very much admire, the Senator from Indiana [Mr. WATSON], that the principle involved in the pending amendment, namely, that a distinction should be made in the levying of taxes between the income which is the result of personal service and the income which is the result of invested capital, is a sound principle, and that it ought to be written into the bill; but the Senator objects that, although sound in so far as it goes, this sound principle, which would improve the bill, ought not to be put into the bill because we do not go a step further and distinguish as to the incomes of widows and orphans in the same way.

Let us see where we come out with that sort of logic. The present law does not distinguish between the income from invested capital and the income from labor, neither does it distinguish between the income from labor or from capital and the income of the widow. That is the present law and that is in the proposed bill. How can it be said that we should not distinguish between the income from personal labor and the income from invested capital merely because we do not go a step still further than the present law and make a distinguishing feature as to the income of the widow?

In other words, the present bill combines both defects. It does not distinguish between the personal earnings and capitalistic earnings, neither does it distinguish between the income of the widow and the capitalistic earnings. That being the case, it is argued that we should not wipe out one of those inequalities because we can not and do not at the same time wipe out both. That is very much like saying to a man, "There are two things that I ought to do—I ought to protect your house against robbers and I ought to pay you my debts."

Mr. PENROSE. Mr. President, will the Senator permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. REED. In a moment. "Under the existing conditions I am going to do neither; but if you propose to protect my house against robbers I will refuse to join you in that unless you also propose at the same time to pay me the debt that you owe me."

I now yield to the Senator from Pennsylvania.

Mr. PENROSE. I at one time thought just as the Senator from Missouri does on this subject, until I had a little more experience with the question. I should like to ask him how he would treat the case of a man who was running a garage and had a certain amount of capital invested in the building and the parts of the machines and automobiles and at the same time did the work principally himself? How would he segregate the income coming to that individual?

Mr. REED. That is the very proposition that I stated a while ago as one of the most difficult.

Mr. PENROSE. Would not that occur in a vast number of cases?

Mr. REED. It will occur in many cases. It will not occur in the majority of cases, but will occur in many cases.

Mr. PENROSE. When it occurs how can it be handled?

Mr. REED. The answer which I sought to make a little while ago was that the Government can ascertain the amount of capital invested, and knowing the capital invested, can ascertain the gross income and can apportion to the capital that part of the income which will be a fair return upon the capital, and then can charge the rest of it to the personal services of the individual. Rules and regulations can be laid down by the department which will work no injustice in that behalf. In any event it will work for the benefit of the individual in saving him payment upon that which he has wrought with his hands. To that extent he will be benefited even though he should get less than he was entitled to. The present bill lumps it all together and compels him to pay on his total income, while the proposed amendment would grant him an exemption upon that part which was adjudged or ruled was the result of the work of his hand. I think there is no difficulty about that.

We have other problems in the bill, as the Senator in charge of it, I think, will agree, that are very difficult and very hard to work out; yet they have nearly all been solved. It was said that we could not work out the problem of separating the income upon stock which was partly from the earnings before 1913 and partly from the earnings since 1913, a very difficult and intricate thing, and yet the Treasury Department made its rules and regulations and has solved that very difficult problem; and so I might proceed. But it is soluble. It can be done.

While I am talking about that perhaps we will get a little light, not on this direct question but on the whole question of taxes levied upon incomes and levied upon profits, if we will look to our sister—I had almost said republic—on the north. It is the nearest approach to a republic that there is in the world outside of a real and absolute republic—Canada. They are a very intelligent and very wonderful people, and having paid them that compliment I pay them the further compliment of saying they most nearly approach American civilization of any people in the world.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. FERNALD in the chair). Does the Senator from Missouri yield to the Senator from New Mexico?

Mr. REED. I yield.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I should like to call attention to a provision of the bill which it seems to me would present a problem very much akin to that which the Senator from Missouri has just been discussing, and that is the administration section of the law which defines a personal service corporation. It strikes me the problem presented by the Senator from Pennsylvania would not be any more difficult than that which has been administered under this very bill and proposed to be continued for a year as follows:

> The term "personal service corporation" means a corporation whose income is to be ascribed primarily to the activities of the principal owners or stockholders who are themselves regularly engaged in the active conduct of the affairs of the corporation and in which capital (whether invested or borrowed) is not a material income producing factor.

It occurs to me that if that sort of law is workable then the amendment suggested by the Senator from Georgia and now being discussed by the Senator from Missouri would not be any more difficult than that, and it would certainly be as easy to work out the problem suggested by the Senator from Pennsylvania as the one which they now have relating to personal service corporations.

Mr. REED. I thank the Senator. With his usual clarity of statement he has put the matter so that I can not improve it. However, I affirm that any man who will take paragraph 7 of section 200, which the Senator from New Mexico has just read, and give it a moment's study will be compelled to say that the problem there presented is more intricate than the problem presented by the proposed amendment of the Senator from Georgia.

What I am going to say for a moment has only an indirect bearing upon the particular question now before the Senate, but it is matter which I think is of interest to those who are really studying the bill and that it will be of use to us not only now but a little later on.

Turning to Canada, here are the taxes laid in Canada. I am referring now to income taxes:

Four per cent upon all incomes exceeding $1,000 but not exceeding $6,000 in the case of unmarried persons and widows or widowers without dependent children, and persons who are not supporting dependent brothers or sisters under the age of 18 years, or a dependent parent or parents, grandparent or grandparents, and exceeding $2,000 but not exceeding $6,000, in the case of all other persons, and 8 per cent upon all income exceeding $6,000.

That is where they strike the 8 per cent level.

In addition thereto the following surtax:
(b) One per cent of the amount by which the income exceeds $5,000 and does not exceed $6,000;
Two per cent of the amount by which the income exceeds $6,000 and does not exceed $8,000.

Mr. President, the Canadian law proceeds by that sort of step and I ask to print it entire as a part of my remarks.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The matter referred to reads as follows:

(b) One per cent upon the amount by which the income exceeds $5,000 and does not exceed $6,000;
Two per cent upon the amount by which the income exceeds $6,000 and does not exceed $8,000;
Three per cent upon the amount by which the income exceeds $8,000 and does not exceed $10,000;
Four per cent upon the amount by which the income exceeds $10,000 and does not exceed $12,000;
Five per cent upon the amount by which the income exceeds $12,000 and does not exceed $14,000;
Six per cent upon the amount by which the income exceeds $14,000 and does not exceed $16,000;
Seven per cent upon the amount by which the income exceeds $16,000 and does not exceed $18,000;
Eight per cent upon the amount by which the income exceeds $18,000 and does not exceed $20,000;
Nine per cent upon the amount by which the income exceeds $20,000 and does not exceed $22,000;

Eleven per cent upon the amount by which the income exceeds $24,000 and does not exceed $26,000;
Twelve per cent upon the amount by which the income exceeds $26,000 and does not exceed $28,000;
Thirteen per cent upon the amount by which the income exceeds $28,000 and does not exceed $30,000;
Fourteen per cent upon the amount by which the income exceeds $30,000 and does not exceed $32,000;
Fifteen per cent upon the amount by which the income exceeds $32,000 and does not exceed $34,000;
Sixteen per cent upon the amount by which the income exceeds $34,000 and does not exceed $36,000;
Seventeen per cent upon the amount by which the income exceeds $36,000 and does not exceed $38,000;
Eighteen per cent upon the amount by which the income exceeds $38,000 and does not exceed $40,000;
Nineteen per cent upon the amount by which the income exceeds $40,000 and does not exceed $42,000;
Twenty per cent upon the amount by which the income exceeds $42,000 and does not exceed $44,000;
Twenty-one per cent upon the amount by which the income exceeds $44,000 and does not exceed $46,000;
Twenty-two per cent upon the amount by which the income exceeds $46,000 and does not exceed $48,000;
Twenty-three per cent upon the amount by which the income exceeds $48,000 and does not exceed $50,000;
Twenty-four per cent upon the amount by which the income exceeds $50,000 and does not exceed $52,000;
Twenty-five per cent upon the amount by which the income exceeds $52,000 and does not exceed $54,000;
Twenty-six per cent upon the amount by which the income exceeds $54,000 and does not exceed $56,000;
Twenty-seven per cent upon the amount by which the income exceeds $56,000 and does not exceed $58,000;
Twenty-eight per cent upon the amount by which the income exceeds $58,000 and does not exceed $60,000;
Twenty-nine per cent upon the amount by which the income exceeds $60,000 and does not exceed $62,000;
Thirty per cent upon the amount by which the income exceeds $62,000 and does not exceed $64,000;
Thirty-one per cent upon the amount by which the income exceeds $64,000 and does not exceed $66,000;
Thirty-two per cent upon the amount by which the income exceeds $66,000 and does not exceed $68,000;
Thirty-three per cent upon the amount by which the income exceeds $68,000 and does not exceed $70,000;
Thirty-four per cent upon the amount by which the income exceeds $70,000 and does not exceed $72,000;
Thirty-five per cent upon the amount by which the income exceeds $72,000 and does not exceed $74,000;
Thirty-six per cent upon the amount by which the income exceeds $74,000 and does not exceed $76,000;
Thirty-seven per cent upon the amount by which the income exceeds $76,000 and does not exceed $78,000;
Thirty-eight per cent upon the amount by which the income exceeds $78,000 and does not exceed $80,000;
Thirty-nine per cent upon the amount by which the income exceeds $80,000 and does not exceed $82,000;
Forty per cent upon the amount by which the income exceeds $82,000 and does not exceed $84,000;
Forty-one per cent upon the amount by which the income exceeds $84,000 and does not exceed $86,000;
Forty-two per cent upon the amount by which the income exceeds $86,000 and does not exceed $88,000;
Forty-three per cent upon the amount by which the income exceeds $88,000 and does not exceed $90,000;
Forty-four per cent upon the amount by which the income exceeds $90,000 and does not exceed $92,000;
Forty-five per cent upon the amount by which the income exceeds $92,000 and does not exceed $94,000;
Forty-six per cent upon the amount by which the income exceeds $94,000 and does not exceed $96,000;
Forty-seven per cent upon the amount by which the income exceeds $96,000 and does not exceed $98,000;
Forty-eight per cent upon the amount by which the income exceeds $98,000 and does not exceed $100,000;
Fifty-two per cent upon the amount by which the income exceeds $100,000 and does not exceed $150,000;
Fifty-six per cent upon the amount by which the income exceeds $150,000 and does not exceed $200,000;
Sixty per cent upon the amount by which the income exceeds $200,000 and does not exceed $300,000;
Sixty-three per cent upon the amount by which the income exceeds $300,000 and does not exceed $500,000;
Sixty-four per cent upon the amount by which the income exceeds $500,000 and does not exceed $1,000,000;
Sixty-five per cent upon the amount by which the income exceeds $1,000,000.

Mr. REED. So it proceeds in that way until it reaches the $66,000 income. Let us see what Canada did after that. When it reaches $66,000 this is the language:

Thirty-one per cent upon the amount by which the income exceeds $64,000 and does not exceed $66,000;
Thirty-two per cent upon the amount by which the incomes exceeds $66,000 and does not exceed $68,000;
Thirty-three per cent upon the amount by which the income exceeds $68,000 and does not exceed $70,000.

So, proceeding in that way and raising 1 per cent for each $2,000 of income, the law continues until we reach incomes of $500,000. At that point the law reads:

Sixty-four per cent upon the amount by which the income exceeds $500,000 and does not exceed $1,000,000, and 65 per cent upon the amount by which the income exceeds $1,000,000.

So, Mr. President, Canada leaves her surtaxes on incomes of $1,000,000 plus at 65 per cent. The attempt was made here for a flat reduction to 32 per cent as soon as the income reached $66,000, and from there on, no matter how great the income, the tax was to be 32 per cent. The agricultural "bloc," or a part of the agricultural "bloc," agreed to a maximum of 50 per cent, which applies to incomes of $200,000, with no increase after that.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. May I state that the increase from $100,000 to $200,000 is only in the last one of the brackets, so that really the gradations are only up to $100,000 substantially. It practically includes the $200,000 with it, making a difference only of about 1 or 2 per cent between $100,000 and $200,000.

Mr. REED. I am obliged to the Senator.

Mr. President, if Canada can levy and collect these very large income taxes, while I do not say that the action of Canada or of any other country is binding on us, it is highly persuasive of the fact that the income taxes can be collected and that they do not destroy business. Canada is not out for the destruction of business any more than are we.

Mr. SMOOT. Will the Senator yield?

Mr. REED. I will.

Mr. SMOOT. I might say to the Senator that the Canadian surtaxes are exactly the same as is the present law in the United States; that they took their law from our law. There is not a penny difference between the Canadian law and the present law of this country.

Mr. REED. Very well, but we are proposing to change our present law. If the Canadians took their law from our present law—and I have not compared the two statutes word for word—then, Mr. President, they are keeping theirs while we are proposing to change ours.

There is another thing I wish to say about that matter at this time.

Mr. POMERENE. Have the Canadians made any effort to change the law?

Mr. REED. I have only got the statutes. What efforts have been made to change it I do not know.

Let us look at the excess-profits tax, which is the burden which it seems our friends are so determined they will take off at all hazards. I do not know why they are so tender about the excess-profits tax; I do not know how much campaign contributions have had to do with party pledges; but I am doing some thinking about that, and I believe that the people of the country will ultimately do some thinking about it.

Let us see what Canada is doing. It is said that these high surtaxes destroy business; that is, if a man can not make a thousand per cent profit he will get mad and quit, or if he can not make a hundred per cent he will just shut up shop. I showed the other day that with the highest rate which we propose to levy—40 per cent on excess profits—the man making a thousand per cent still had over $60 left out of every $100 of excess profits he has made. We only propose to take 40 per cent in any event, and to leave him $60 out of $100. Then he will have the lesser taxes upon his lesser profits. So I can see this crowd of cormorants—and that is what a man is who wants to make a thousand per cent; if you trace his ancestry back far enough to get into the bird creation you would find that his blood springs ended in a condor—quitting business. Do Senators think a man of that kind is going to forego the $60 profits which he is going to have left because he is made to pay $40 out of the $100 that he has made?

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Missouri yield to the Senator from Ohio?

Mr. REED. I do.

Mr. POMERENE. The Senator from Missouri has been on the Committee on Finance during all of the session, and this very subject has been discussed in that committee repeatedly. Has the Senator yet heard the name of one of the men who would surrender these securities for a nontaxable security?

Mr. REED. Oh, no; I have heard no names. Look at the absurdity of it! Here is a man making 500 per cent. All right. The Government comes along and says, "Out of the 500 per cent you have made we are going to take something less than 40 per cent"—I will merely call it 40 per cent to make easy figures—"you are going to make $50,000, and that is 500 per cent, and when you have made it, we are going to take $20,000 of it away from you and still leave you $30,000—300 per cent of your profit." That gentleman, it is stated, is going to say, "I will not take that 300 per cent; I will just quit business; I will go and invest my money in a 4 per cent security!" There may be Senators in the Senate who believe that, but they will never make the people of the United States believe it.

I have traveled that road until there is no use in going over it again; but let me call the Senators' attention to the Canadian law on excess profits. Here is their act of 1916, which was "assented to on the 1st of July, 1920," which I take means that it is the present, living law of the Dominion of Canada:

His Majesty, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate and House of Commons of Canada, enacts as follows:

1. Section 3 of the business profits war tax act, 1916, chapter 11 of the Statutes of 1916, is amended by adding thereto the following subsections:

"(2) The profits earned in any business during any accounting period ending in the year 1920 which do not exceed 10 per cent per annum upon the capital employed in such business shall be exempt from the tax prescribed by this act.

We ourselves exempt 10 per cent from the excess profits. While the law says 8 on the face of the statute, the exemptions which are allowed raise it to 10 per cent.

Upon any such profits exceeding 10 per cent per annum and not exceeding 15 per cent per annum upon the capital employed, there shall be paid a tax equal to 20 per cent of such profits.

Upon any such profits exceeding 15 per cent per annum and not exceeding 20 per cent per annum upon the capital employed, there shall be paid a tax equal to 30 per cent of such profits.

Upon any such profits exceeding 20 per cent per annum and not exceeding 30 per cent per annum upon the capital employed, there shall be paid a tax equal to 50 per cent of such profits.

Upon any such profits exceeding 30 per cent per annum upon the capital employed, there shall be paid a tax equal to 60 per cent of such profits.

(3) In any business with a capital of not less than $25,000 and under $50,000, a tax shall be paid of 20 per cent of the amount by which the profits earned during any accounting period ending in the year 1920 in such business exceeds 10 per cent per annum.

(4) The rates of taxation set forth in section 3 of this act, as amended by chapter 6 of the statutes of 1917, shall apply in respect of the profits earned in any accounting period ending in the years 1917, 1918, and 1919 by any business liable to taxation under this act having a capital of less than $50,000, if 20 per cent or more of such profits have been derived from the manufacture or dealing in munitions of war or materials or supplies of any kind for war purposes.

2. Section 26 of the said act, as enacted by chapter 39 of the statutes of 1919, is amended by substituting the word "twenty" for the word "nineteen," in the third line thereof, and by substituting the word "seventy-two" for the word "sixty," in the fourth line of the first proviso in the said section.

3. Section 7 of the said act is amended by adding the following subsection thereto:

"(6) In the case of two or more incorporated companies merged or consolidated at any time after the 1st day of January, 1916, for the purposes of this act the capital employed in the business of the company into which such other company or companies are merged or consolidated, or of the company created on such merger or consolidation, shall not exceed the capital of the companies so merged or consolidated as the same existed before such merger or consolidation, together with any additional capital that may have been invested in such business in cash at the time of such merger or consolidation or thereafter."

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Missouri yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. REED. I yield.

Mr. SMOOT. If the Senator will allow me to do so, I desire to call his attention to the fact that the excess profits law in Canada from which he has read was repealed on December 31, 1920.

Mr. REED. The statute which I have read was enacted July 1, 1920.

Mr. SMOOT. The act of December 31, 1920, repeals the act of July 1, 1920.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. How much does Canada levy as a flat tax on the income of corporations?

Mr. SMOOT. Does the Senator mean as a corporation tax?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Great Britain levies 30 per cent, while this bill proposes to levy but 15 per cent.

Mr. SMOOT. Great Britain levies 30 per cent as a normal tax on incomes.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Great Britain levies a flat tax of 30 per cent on business or corporations.

Mr. SMOOT. That may be the rate.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. It is.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED] has the floor.

Mr. SMOOT. I was merely calling the Senator's attention to the fact——

Mr. REED. I want to get this matter exactly as it is. I was quoting from the statutes as late as July, 1920. If that tax has been repealed since then, I want to know what has been enacted in lieu of it. The income tax has not been repealed since then, has it? So that the income tax stands, although something has been done with the excess-profits tax.

Mr. SIMMONS and Mr. SMOOT addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Missouri yield; and if so, to whom?

Mr. REED. I yield first to the Senator from North Carolina.

Mr. SIMMONS. We simply reduce it from 60 and 40 to 40 and 20.

Mr. REED. But we are speaking about the Canadian law.

Mr. SMOOT. I will say to the Senator the income tax in Canada has not been repealed, but is still exactly as our present tax is. Corporations and joint-stock companies, however, pay 10 per cent. I will read each bracket so that the Senator may understand it.

Mr. REED. From what is the Senator about to read?

Mr. SMOOT. The last Canadian law.

Mr. REED. Very well.

Mr. SMOOT. It reads:

CORPORATION TAX.

(2) Corporations and joint-stock companies, no matter how created or organized, shall pay 10 per cent upon income exceeding $2,000. Any corporation or joint-stock company the fiscal year of which is not Any corporation or joint-stock company the fiscal year of which is not computed upon its income for its fiscal year ending within the calendar year for which the return is being made.

In other words, our tax to-day is 10 per cent upon the corporate income and so is the Canadian tax.

Mr. REED. Is that all the corporations pay?

Mr. SMOOT. That is all the corporations pay on their net income.

Mr. REED. What else do they pay?

Mr. SIMMONS. Do they not pay an excess-profits tax?

Mr. SMOOT. The excess-profits tax in Canada was repealed on December 31, 1920.

Mr. REED. What else do they pay?

Mr. SMOOT. When a corporation's earnings are distributed, of course they fall under the income tax, just as in the case of this country dividends when distributed fall under our income tax.

The Senator said that there had been no change contemplated in the income tax law of Canada.

Mr. REED. I did not say that no change had been contemplated; I said I knew nothing about what was contemplated, but I said there had not been a change, as I understood.

Mr. SMOOT. I will say to the Senator that he is correct; but I understood him to refer to a contemplated change. I dislike to take the time of the Senator at this particular moment.

Mr. REED. It is perfectly agreeable to me to have the Senator interrupt.

Mr. SMOOT. Then while I do not wish to make it as a positive statement I saw in one of the New York papers about a month ago, when the pending bill was being considered, that Canada intended to repeal the higher brackets of her income tax law, just as the committee reported in the case of the bill now before us, and that they were going to repeal many of the irritating and nagging taxes and increase their sales-tax rates. I do not know whether that is so or not. I only saw it in the papers as reported by an Associated Press dispatch.

Mr. REED. Very well. That leads me to remark, just in passing, that the present so-called "nuisance taxes" are nuisance taxes because they are levied on some of the things we buy. We propose to wipe that out and do away with the nuisance business by spreading the nuisance tax over everything we buy. That is another one of the astonishing theories—that it is a nuisance tax if you go to a soda fountain and pay a tax on your drink, but if you have to pay on everything you buy in the world that is not a nuisance at all.

I do not want to discuss that, however.

Mr. SMOOT. Of course, I do not want to discuss it with the Senator; but that is not the theory on which they were designated "nuisance taxes." There is a good reason why they are called nuisance taxes, and I think I have already stated it before the Senate.

Mr. REED. Yes; I heard the Senator's argument, and it was a very able argument.

Mr. SMOOT. It is not because of the fact that they are simply imposed at a higher rate, because that is hardly a fair designation. Another thing I will say to the Senator is that I do not think we have collected 40 per cent of the special taxes that ought to have been collected under the existing law. It is left entirely with the retailer as to whether he shall pay the tax or not, and we know that in certain industries there has not been 25 per cent of the tax collected. A general turnover tax does not affect the Treasury of the United States in that way, however, nor does it require the seller of goods to keep special accounts for special goods at a special price, but the tax is imposed at a low rate upon all the goods that are sold.

Mr. REED. I understand the Senator's argument. It is only a question of degree, and I do not care to go into it at this time, because I am not going to discuss the sales tax at this time; but it appears from the Senator's statement in regard to the Canadian law that the law as to excess profits has been repealed.

Mr. SMOOT. Yes.

Mr. REED. I shall take the trouble, if I can possibly get the time, to find what other taxes they have in lieu of that repeal, for it is certain that the Canadian Government is compelled to increase its revenues. At least, we know that it has kept the high taxes upon the incomes, and that it is now, according to the Senator's idea—and I know he is giving us the best of his judgment—contemplating the adoption of a sales tax.

Mr. SMOOT. They have a sales tax to-day. They are contemplating increasing the rate.

Mr. REED. They are contemplating an enlargement of it.

Mr. President, I have been on the floor much longer than I had expected to be. I did want to say a word on behalf of these experts who are not permitted to defend themselves, and I did want to say that in my judgment it is utterly ridiculous to say that the amendment proposed by the Senator from Georgia [Mr. HARRIS] can not be administered.

In the great majority of cases—I apprehend in 90 per cent of the incomes that fall below $5,000—it is purely a question of salary, so that it will largely solve itself. There is not much use in talking about it. I think the other side have made up their minds, regardless of the merits of any question that is presented, that they are going to carry through this compromise. They prevented a loss of about sixty or sixty-five million dollars on surtaxes on large incomes, and in order to get that they swapped off their birthright for an excess-profits tax that would bring us $450,000,000, and I think from their attitude in the Chamber that they agreed to stand by this bill as it is, with the one exception.

Since Jacob and Esau met and traded, there never has been a lot of honest gentlemen more effectually buncoed. It will be remembered that Jacob was a very smart individual, and as far as I could ever make out Esau was a very good-hearted, good-natured chap. He had some excuse for making his trade. He was very hungry, and the greens that were cooking smelled good, and he allowed his appetite to overcome his judgment. I have always sympathized with him, for I have been hungry myself. But why a lot of patriots organizing themselves into a solid bloc, and knowing that they had the votes, if they would but add them to some votes they already had on their side—and they were Democratic votes—to have accomplished any reforms in this bill they desired, should sit down and say: "If you will concede to us a restitution of the surtax up to 50 per cent on high incomes, we will agree with you that we will stand by the profiteers along with you, and relieve them of $450,000,000 of taxes that they ought to pay"—why a lot of patriots, and I know they are all patriots, would have made that sort of a bargain is beyond my comprehension.

I do not know who negotiated on behalf of the majority in that trade, but I apprehend it was a down-east Yankee, or at least a down-east Yankee engineered the deal. I do not say that in an uncomplimentary way, but rather in a complimentary way. I have always had a profound admiration for the ingenuity, the skill, and the brain power of the down-east Yankee.

I once heard a story which I think I may tell without offense—that an old Hebrew doing business out in Chicago had accumulated a fortune, and when his son became of age he gave him a quarter of a million dollars and said to him, "Now, my boy, don't try to stay here in Chicago and trade with these sharpers. They will get this away from you. Find a simple people, a pastoral people, and go down and trade with them." So the young man went down and looked around in New England, and he thought they looked like a pastoral people, and he located. In about a month's time he called up on the long-distance telephone and said, "Father, I want $50 to get home on." The father said, "What has become of your money?" He said, "Father, they got it all away from me." The old man said, "What! That pastoral people?" The son replied, "Pastoral people, thunder, father! These are the 10 lost tribes of Israel down here." [Laughter.]

I am wondering who it was that set up this job and put it over on the bloc. You saved a reduction to 32 per cent flat on incomes above $68,000 in part—that tax had run to 65 per cent—and you got it up as far as 50, and then you traded off the tax on the profiteer, the man who makes 50 per cent, 100 per cent, 500 per cent; the man, as I have said before, that you gentlemen on the other side of this aisle were talking about passing statutes to declare a criminal only a few months ago; the man whose profits are fixed only by the amount he can extort. No man ever asks more than 25 or at the outside 50 per cent profit who is regulated in his business by simply what is a fair and just and reasonable profit. Certainly when he goes above those figures the only limit there is to his cupidity is the ability to exact profits. He is not doing business; he is robbing. He is not trading; he is stealing. He is not trafficking; he is picking pockets. He is not entering the marts of commerce for the purpose of exchanging goods at a fair and reasonable advance; he has set up a shop in which to pick the pockets of the unwary, and take advantage of necessity or of ignorance.

You propose to say to the gentleman who runs a shop of that kind: "You go tax free, except that we will tax you the normal tax on your income." Then you undertake to justify it, and when we ask to have this little reduction made here for the benefit of the man of moderate income, you say: "How much is it going to take out of the revenue?" Well, somebody guesses it at $85,000,000, and you throw up your hands and say, "We would like to do it, but we can not do it. We can not spare that $85,000,000." But why can you not spare it? Because you are taking $450,000,000 off of the gentlemen who are making more than 10 per cent profit, and some of them are making a thousand per cent profit.

I ask the question again and again, and I get again and again in answer the pretense that if you do not let a man make a thousand per cent profit, if you take away from the man who is making a thousand per cent profit 400 per cent of the thousand per cent and leave him 600 per cent, because he can not have the whole thousand per cent he will not take the 600 per cent, but will rush off and invest his money in 4 per cent securities!

The intelleetual gorge rises at that. There is not any use in arguing with a man who will advance that sort of a theory. You might as well have an argument with a white swelling, or hold a discussion with a steam whistle, or expound your logic against a stone wall.

A good many people talk about this 40 per cent excess-profits tax as though you take 40 per cent of all man's income. You do nothing of the kind. You take 40 per cent of the profit he has made, provided that profit exceeds 20 per cent, and if he makes a 20 per cent profit plus, then you take 40 per cent of that. If he has made 20 per cent, you leave him with a profit of 16 per cent, and if he has made 40 per cent, you leave him with a profit of 24 per cent, as I figure it.

But the bloc, as they moved forward gallantly in defense of the taxpayers, as they swarmed out of the bastions and unfurled their gallant banners and cried:

Come one, come all, this rock shall fly
From its firm base as soon as I.

Us & Co. surrendered everything, simply claiming for themselves, and securing, the honors of war. They were allowed to march out with their side arms and their colors flying, but with their pockets rifled and their fortress surrendered.

What a glorious thing it will be, along in the dog days of next year, when the assembled masses gather in the quiet shade of the groves to listen to the words of wisdom that will fall from the lips of their appointed tribunes, when they stand and picture to these masses of people the service they have rendered. They will say, "There are a lot of old standpatters in the Republican Party, and you know they have always been controlled by the corporations, and I am going to explain to you, my countrymen, why we found it necessary to differ from them. We were progressives. They proposed to take the taxes off profiteers to the amount of $450,000,000. They proposed to take the tax off of incomes above $68,000, reducing them to a flat level of 32 per cent, and that meant a loss of $90,000,000; and, my countrymen, we rallied to your support, and we got into a room and we compromised and agreed that if they would put the surtaxes on incomes up to 50 per cent, which are at present 65 per cent, we would yield to them on the $450,000,000 of excess profits. What a glorious service we rendered to you. How thoroughly we defeated the old standpatters. What a wicked lot they are. It is true we saved the horns and tail, but they carried off the carcass and the tallow."

Then there will be great applause from the listening multitude.

No; you will not tell them that. When it comes to the contest, you will go out and talk generally about having been progressives and how you saved them money, but you will not tell what you lost to them; and I propose, as far as my weak voice or my influence will go, to let the country know this afternoon and to know hereafter that you traded off the excess-profits tax, and you did not need to trade off one penny of it. There sat on this side of the Chamber a solid vote, and all we needed on your side was 11 votes to keep the excess-profits tax in the law; and if you thought it was too high, that it ought to be modified, although we think it is just about where it ought to be, we would have yielded some to you in order to have saved the excess-profits tax in a more moderate degree.

We make you that proposition now. We say to you now, before the house is burned, before the battle is entirely lost, that we will join with you gentlemen over there in putting an excess-profits tax on, and while we want to write it high, rather than see it all go, if you write a lower one we will join with you in that, provided you still make it a substantial tax. I am speaking, I know, the sentiment of my associates on this side, and I know it so well that I do not hesitate to venture to make that statement.

If you should not accept this, you of the bloc, pull down your flag which fluttered so gaily over you, and run up the crêpe, the black crêpe of surrender, for you are not entitled to a white flag to march out under; it ought to be a black one.

Mr. President, that is all I want to say at this particular time, and unless we are going into executive session I will suggest the absence of a quorum.

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, we are making deplorably slow progress. When are we going to begin to hold night sessions?

The majority of 24 on the Republican side are charged with this responsibility, and ought to move with celerity. I do not like this bill. I think it is a bad bill, but it seems to me a shame that the American people should be denied action of some kind by this Congress. Why do you not manfully hold night sessions, and hold the Senate in session from 10 o'clock in the morning until 10 o'clock in the evening? Do you fail to perceive that Christmas will be here before you pass this bill if the situation is going to drag on as it has for the past 10 days? Have you not the mental processes to see that you will not pass this bill for 90 days? It seems to me it is an insult to the intelligence of the American people to continue to permit, day after day and day after day, such deplorably slow progress as you are making on this bill.

Here are 20 or 30 Democrats urging you to move more rapidly and hold night sessions on this bill and get through with it.

Mr. STANLEY and Mr. McCORMICK addressed the Chair.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Arizona yield, and if so, to whom?

Mr. ASHURST. I yield to the Senator from Kentucky.

Mr. STANLEY. I simply wanted to suggest to the Senator that if we postpone the passage of this bill, not for 90 days but for 90 years, this country would be inestimably benefited. I would hesitate to urge them to any celerity in the imposition of this thing upon the American people at this time.

Mr. ASHURST. I urge that the majority attend to the business of the day.

Mr. REED. No matter how bad it is?

Mr. ASHURST. If it be bad, the sooner we find it out the better. The Democrats during the recent campaign were accused of a lack of efficiency. I have heard of the Penrose machine, and have heard of the Aldrich machine, and during the campaign you said, "Give us the reins of power and we will show you efficiency; we will show you how to proceed." We proceeded——

Mr. McCORMICK. And look what you did to the country.

Mr. STANLEY. That is not half what the Republican Party is prepared to do to it.

Mr. ASHURST. I ignore the sarcasm of the Senator from Illinois.

Mr. WATSON of Indiana. Will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. ASHURST. I yield for a moment.

Mr. WATSON of Indiana. I wanted to ask the Senator what right he had to charge us on this side with delay, when Senators on the other side have done more talking——

Mr. ASHURST. You are responsible for adjournments. Every motion for recess or adjournment, with but one or two exceptions, came from your side. You are responsible for the lack of progress.

Mr. WATSON of Indiana. But four-fifths of the talking on this bill has been done on the other side of the Chamber.

Mr. ASHURST. That does not deter me from asking that you do more work.

Mr. WATSON of Indiana. We are quite willing to do it.

Mr. ASHURST. I will venture to say that you will adjourn in a few minutes.

Mr. REED. I hope we will.

Mr. WATSON of Indiana. If Senators on this side will stand back of the proposition that beginning to-morrow night we hold night sessions——

Mr. ASHURST. To-morrow night! It is the same old story.

Mr. WATSON of Indiana (continuing). There will be night sessions.

Mr. ASHURST. Why not to-night?

Mr. McCORMICK. Make it to-night.

Mr. WATSON of Indiana. The only reason why we do not make it to-night is because several Senators went to the Senator from Pennsylvania to-day and asked him not to have a night session to-night——

Mr. ASHURST. Why not?

Mr. WATSON of Indiana. And he acceded to their request, because they were not prepared for night sessions, and had all sorts of arrangements made for this, that, and the other thing; but beginning to-morrow night night sessions will be held, and if necessary the sessions will begin at 10 o'clock in the morning, not for the purpose of choking off debate, but for the purpose of preventing talk that does not bear upon the subject in hand, and has no relevancy to the matter under immediate consideration by the Senate. I mean no reflection upon any man who has been occupying the floor.

Mr. ASHURST. Neither do I.

Mr. WATSON of Indiana. But we all know that when miscellaneous and promiscuous debate is started upon these topics, Senators wander far afield from a discussion of the particular matter under debate at the moment, and that, of course, means a consumption of time. I am not charging anybody with conducting a filibuster purposely. That I would not charge. But I do know that there is a very great indifference as to whether or not time is lost, and so far as this side of the Chamber is concerned, responsible as we are to the country for legislation we intend to have legislation, and if necessary we intend to stay here until we get it, be it by night or by day, or by night and by day.

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, that is a very bold statement and it will probably fail, like many other bold statements, especially the statement to the effect that the country was to have immediate relief. I wonder if Senators fail to perceive the serious situation of this country. I wonder if Senators fail to perceive the enormously important problems before this country. I dislike to take time saying these things, but with your twenty-odd majority, I fail to perceive why you do not keep your promises.

Mr. REED. To do what?

Mr. ASHURST. To pass the bills and give the relief the country has been promised.

Mr. REED. Does the Senator know of any bills that are contemplated by the other side which are going to benefit the country? I would like to know what they are.

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, that is no answer to my question.

Mr. REED. Certainly it is an answer. Unless there is something good to come, there is no reason for rushing forward.

Mr. McCORMICK. Mr. President, I now understand the interruptions which have been made on the other side.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Arizona yield to the Senator from Illinois?

Mr. ASHURST. I yield to the Senator for a moment.

Mr. McCORMICK. I am waiting for the Senator from Arizona to conclude.

Mr. ASHURST. I wish to make it manifest that I think that a Senator on the Democratic side and a Senator on the Republican side can serve his country now by proceeding with the business of the country.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President——

Mr. ASHURST. I yield to the Senator from North Carolina.

Mr. SIMMONS. I have listened to the debate to-day and every bit of the discussion that has taken place upon this floor to-day has been upon the bill. It was not always upon the amendment that was before the Senate, but it was upon the bill. A Senator has the right, when an amendment is under discussion, to discuss that amendment, or to discuss any general provision in the bill to which the amendment applies.

Mr. ASHURST. Certainly. My friend tells me nothing new.

Mr. SIMMONS. There has been no irrelevant discussion to-day. There has been nothing but legitimate discussion to-day, and a large part of the discussion, the most of the discussion to-day, has been exceedingly illuminating and exceedingly able.

Mr. PENROSE. Mr. President——

Mr. ASHURST. I yield to the Senator from Pennsylvania.

Mr. PENROSE. Why, they were so extremely interesting that at least three Senators whom I might mention, and who took up over one-half the day, were not listened to by two Members of this body during a period of several hours, including the Senator from North Carolina.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, I have been in my seat all this day, except when I was eating my luncheon——

Mr. PENROSE. It must have been an exceedingly good luncheon.

Mr. SIMMONS. The Senator from Pennsylvania constantly rises upon the floor and states things that he knows are not true.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. President——

Mr. ASHURST. I yield to the Senator from Alabama.

Mr. HEFLIN. If the Senator from Arizona will permit me, it is a rare thing during the day that there are half a dozen Republicans in the Chamber while we are considering the bill. We have to make points of no quorum constantly to bring them to the Chamber where they can transact business for the people. I insist that they stay in the Chamber hereafter and let us get along.

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, in conclusion, I ask unanimous consent that the Senate remain in session until 11 o'clock to-night.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, the Chair need not bother with that. I will object now.

Mr. McCORMICK. Mr. President, that is an appropriate conclusion for the remarks of the Senator from Arizona, who has upbraided the majority. The Senator from Arizona knows very well that four-fifths of the futile discussion of the bill has taken place on the other side of the Chamber—discussion which has consisted of complaints without constructive proposals.

I am not one of those who think the bill is perfect, that it was perfect when it came from the committee, or that it will be perfect when it goes from the Senate to conference; but it reaches approximate perfection, and it is improved only through discussion.

This sort of complaint has been common on the other side of the Chamber from the very moment also that the special session was convoked. Before the recess it was general that the Republican administration and the Republican majority were accomplishing nothing.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Mr. President——

Mr. McCORMICK. That was said again and again in this Chamber. I yield to the Senator for a question.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I should like to ask the Senator, who has just stated that there was no constructive suggestion from this side of the Chamber, if he has not overlooked the fact that Senators on this side have proposed a number of amendments to the bill.

Mr. McCORMICK. Oh, Mr. President, I said four-fifths of the discussion on that side consisted of futile criticisms. It was like the criticism which preceded the recess, which utterly ignored the record of legislation which Congress had made before the recess, the legislation——

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Mr. President——

Mr. McCORMICK. I will not yield to the Senator now. I refer to legislation which had been written on the statute books before the recess, the legislation which was summed up in the letter of the President addressed to my humble self, and which was a matter of such derision and ridicule by the Senator from Mississippi, which, after all, summed up the facts upon which turned the elections in New Mexico and in Massachusetts. The country is not going to be deceived because Senators say that nothing has been accomplished. The country has a measure of the situation with which we were confronted when we came into office.

I hope the Senator from Pennsylvania will not yield to the importunities of those Senators who have complained and who do not want to sit here at nights. I hope we will hold a session to-night and to-morrow night and every night until the bill comes to a final vote. Then we shall see how many absentees there are on this side of the Chamber and on the other side of the Chamber.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Mr. President, I do not know by what authority the Senator from Illinois characterizes the discussion as futile. If we are to understand by that that there is a majority made up here pledged to put through the bill as it is, then perhaps discussion is futile. If it is not in that sense that the Senator uses the term, I should like to know in what sense it is used.

So far as the discussions themselves are concerned, I submit that I have never listened to more able, more logical discussion of any question than I have listened to when Senators have been discussing the pending bill.

Mr. McCORMICK. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a question?

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I gladly yield.

Mr. McCORMICK. The Senator alludes to the discussion of the delinquencies of the Federal Reserve Board and the decay of classic societies to which the Senate has been treated during debate to-day, I take it?

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Then I understand the word "futile" was not used with respect to the discussion of the bill. It may be that at times there has been discussion upon subjects other than the bill.

Mr. REED. Less than usual.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Yes; I was just going to make the statement which the Senator from Missouri has made. I do not recall having listened to discussion upon any bill of importance since I have been in the Senate where Senators confined themselves so closely to the bill as they have while we have been discussing the pending bill, and, as suggested to me by the Senator from Ohio [Mr. POMERENE], of all the bills which have come before this body for discussion this bill needs discussion more than any other.

This bill is framed up with an idea of putting upon the country a principle which I believe the country does not want. I am not in sympathy with those who say that the bill was not thoroughly considered by the Finance Committee. According to my judgment it was considered, but the bill has been framed up based upon a fundamental principle which the majority of the Republicans in this Chamber want to frame up. I think it is the Republican policy which underlies the bill, and that policy is to relieve the few who ought to pay the expenses of the Government from a vast burden and put it upon the many. I think the principle of the bill is worked out in a deliberate way. The votes, I believe, which have been taken upon the amendments proposed to the bill will show that.

If Senators will look at the bill from the beginning to the end, they will find a primary purpose apparent upon its very face. Republicans desire to remove the high surtaxes and they desire to repeal the excess-profits taxes, and those are the two chief things which are sought by the bill. I submit that it is not only the deliberate plan for accomplishing that purpose but it has been gone about in a very adroit way.

Mr. WATSON of Indiana. Mr. President——

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I yield to the Senator from Indiana.

Mr. WATSON of Indiana. Suppose all that be true and the Republican Party desires to commit political suicide, why does not the Senator from New Mexico stand aside and let us do it? We are willing to pass the bill with such amendments as sane discussion may suggest from time to time. Why does the Senator stand in the way of our doing this appalling thing that is going to oppress everybody in the United States?

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Mr. President, I am not willing that the people of this Nation shall be made to suffer in order that the shortcomings of the Republican Party may be made apparent. I am not willing that this thing shall be placed upon the American people if I can prevent it. I do not intend to do it by any filibuster, but I do believe we ought to have thorough consideration and full discussion, so that the people of the country may understand just what is being put upon them.

Mr. WATSON of Indiana. Does the Senator mean by that that he intends to prevent the passage of the bill by a filibuster?

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I just said that I did not.

Mr. PENROSE. It is a pity the Senator did not give the benefit of his sagacious advice while the bill was in the committee.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I rather apprehended the Senator from Pennsylvania might make just that sort of a remark.

Mr. PENROSE. I only make it in a casual way and do not intend to press it.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Yes; the Senator's remarks are usually casual. But I wish to say that the Senator from Pennsylvania understands why I was necessarily absent from the city during the time or a portion of the time the committee was considering the bill.

Mr. PENROSE. I suppose it was in the enjoyment of scenery and fresh air. I hope it was.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. No; the real purpose of it was to get out and tell my people about some of the vicious things the Republican Party was attempting to put upon the people of the country.

Mr. PENROSE. Apparently the Senator failed to make them believe it.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I do not care to enter into a discussion of what occurred in New Mexico during the late campaign, but I think I can safely predict that if the bill passes the result of the next election will be quite different.

I wish to say this in regard to the framing of the bill: I have been back in Washington for some time. There has not been a meeting of the committee called, or at any rate I have had no notice of a meeting, and my understanding is that for some time the chairman of the committee has taken the position that he did not want cooperation of the minority members of the committee; that the various amendments, 75 in number, I believe, have been framed up by the majority of the committee without any consultation with the minority at all.

It has been generally given out that the majority of the committee does not propose to have any meetings of the full committee, that instead of having the meetings of the full committee to discuss the merits and provisions of the bill they have been holding secret or private conferences with the so-called "bloc" or some few members of the "bloc," because it has been stated on the floor here that those things have been agreed upon. Agreed upon by whom? There was no consideration in the full committee of these things.

I submit that this is the time for free and honest discussion of the bill, and it ought to be discussed, and its very deleterious character displayed. I was about to use a stronger term which I think it deserved. I do not believe it lies in the mouth of anybody to complain that the discussion which has been going on here regarding the measure has not been helpful.

Mr. McCORMICK. Mr. President, I hope the Senator from Arizona will feel duly chastened and rebuked by his neighbor and colleague from New Mexico.

Mr. ASHURST. I do not know what the Senator refers to about being chastened.

Mr. McCORMICK. No; the Senator has been engaged with his correspondence and probably did not hear the remarks of the Senator from New Mexico.

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, I did not chasten or rebuke anybody, and I pass the Senator's sarcasm by because I do not understand it. Nothing was further from my intention than to rebuke individual Senators. "Seest thou a man diligent in his business? He shall stand before Kings."

What irritates me more than the vicious nature of the bill is the fact that Senators on the other side proceed with such deplorably slow progress. By nature I want to do the business of the hour. It is one of the principles by which I live. Senators will find out that there is no rule in life that pays better anywhere than to do the business of the hour.

I have no criticism to make of any Democrat who sees fit to speak, howsoever long he may, about this or any other bill. That is his privilege. One of the rules of the Senate gives Senators the right to speak as long as they wish to on any subject at any time when a bill is before the Senate which is debatable.

If the Senator from Illinois [Mr. McCORMICK] thinks I attempted to rebuke anyone, he is mistaken; and I feel no rebuke from anyone, because I feel there is no occasion for me to be rebuked. There is no man in the Senate who could rebuke me; there is no man in the Senate who would do it; because I have tried to conduct myself so that I do not need a rebuke.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I wish to speak for just a moment on the proposition which has been made by my very good friend from Arizona [Mr. ASHURST]. I want, however, to preface my remarks by replying to my almost equally good friend from Indiana [Mr. WATSON], who asks, If the Republican Party is going to commit suicide, why do we not let the execution proceed? Mr. President, I am not willing to have the country murdered even though the Republican Party shall commit suicide to escape the whip of justice. It frequently happens that suicides are preceded by murder. I have no objection to the Republican Party going out by itself and committing suicide, but I do not want it to slaughter the country before it does that very proper act.

Mr. WATSON of Indiana. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Missouri yield to the Senator from Indiana?

Mr. REED. I do.

Mr. WATSON of Indiana. Has not the Senator from Missouri for many years made the same gloomy predictions and uttered the same dismal forebodings about what was going to happen to the country if the Republican Party succeeded in its nefarious schemes? Has he not said the same thing over and over about the protective tariff and all the principles and policies which the Republican Party has advocated for so many years, and has he not in most eloquent words—for the Senator from Missouri is always eloquent—inveighed against the principles and policies of the Republican Party because of the dire things that were about to befall the country when it should succeed in carrying the next election? And yet none of those things have come to pass.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, the United States of America and its 110,000,000 people are so powerful and so great that even the mistakes of my friend from Indiana can not destroy the country.

Mr. McLEAN. Nor could eight years of the administration of the Democratic Party.

Mr. REED. No; nor could eight years of Democratic rule destroy the country.

Mr. McLEAN. But it came pretty near doing so.

Mr. PENROSE. It could humiliate the country also.

Mr. REED. The Senator from Connecticut [Mr. McLEAN] says that Democratic control came pretty near ruining the country. Well, Mr. President, I am not standing here now to pronounce any eulogies upon the Democratic Party; I will take care of that at the proper time. I have criticized very liberally where I thought criticism belonged; but this much I wish to say: Notwithstanding all the mistakes that the Democratic Party has made, we went through the greatest war of history under a Democratic administration; and, whatever its mistakes, the flag of the United States to-day is floating at the highest point that the banner of any country has ever floated.

Mr. SMOOT. Thanks to the Republican Party.

Mr. REED. I do not pretend to say that the Republicans did not help, but the Democratic Party did not destroy this country.

Mr. McLEAN. But the Treasury is pretty empty.

Mr. REED. Well, Mr. President, the Treasury is pretty empty. Why? If the Senator from Connecticut wishes to enter that field, I will go into it with him. The Treasury is "pretty empty" because we put into the field nearly 5,000,000 troops; because we sent food to supply England and France and Italy; because we prepared an armament within an almost miraculously short space of time that saved this country.

Many people think it saved the world. All those things cost money; they empty treasuries. We are considering now how, after the war is over, to raise revenue, and there is a difference of opinion as to how that revenue ought to be raised. The Secretary of the Treasury has practically put himself on record in favor of forgiving to our allies the interest upon their debt to the United States, which amounts to over $10,000,000,000. There is a difference of opinion about that.

Mr. PENROSE. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Missouri yield to the Senator from Pennsylvania?

Mr. REED. I do.

Mr. PENROSE. I deny that statement. If there has been any forgiveness of interest, the Wilson administration forgave the interest. The Senator from Missouri knows that perfectly well. We are endeavoring to redeem the errors and mistakes of the incompetent statesmanship of the Wilson régime.

Mr. REED. O Mr. President, that is easily said, but if they are never redeemed until they are redeemed by those who are now undertaking to take control of this Government, then they will never be redeemed.

I say that the testimony given by the Secretary of the Treasury before the Finance Committee in the hearings on this bill and on the refunding bill will show that we were absolutely unable to get him to say that he proposed to try to collect the deferred interest on our foreign loans.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I know the Senator wants to be perfectly fair.

Mr. REED. I certainly do.

Mr. SMOOT. The Secretary of the Treasury never said that he was going to forgive any interest to any country whatever, but he did say that he was not in a position to say that he could compel payment of interest at this time.

Mr. REED. My statement was that we were unable to get him to say that he proposed to collect that interest or to try to collect it.

Mr. SMOOT. Oh, no.

Mr. REED. I can produce the record to-morrow.

Mr. WATSON of Indiana. Will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. REED. Yes.

Mr. WATSON of Indiana. The Senator will remember that when the Secretary of the Treasury was before our committee he produced the statement of former Secretary Houston as to a promise he had made to the British Government, and, I think, perhaps to the French Government, that on account of the condition of Europe the collection of the interest would not be pressed until two years after that time. The Senator well remembers that. The present Secretary of the Treasury said that he was of the opinion that that constituted an agreement as between this country and those foreign nations, and that he did not see fit to put pressure on them contrary to an agreement that was made by Secretary Houston.

I wish to say further that while every Senator who sat as a Republican around that table believed in the collection of the interest, no Senator who sat there as a Republican ever was in favor of breaking that solemn agreement which had been made with these other nations and upon which they were acting as a people.

Mr. REED. Now, Mr. President——

Mr. WATSON of Indiana. Is not that right?

Mr. REED. No; it is not right. I do not like to disagree in that sharp way with my very good friend, but it is absolutely not right, and I shall be glad to-morrow to bring the record here, if we do not have night sessions every night so that we will have no time to do anything. I claim this, and I propose——

Mr. SMOOT. Does the Senator claim——

Mr. REED. Wait a moment, and I will tell the Senator what I claim. Nobody can twist a word that comes out of my mouth except in the way I want it to come out. The Secretary of the Treasury came in and asked for authority under his bill practically to do whatsoever he pleased in the matter of the settlement of our foreign debts. We then sought to elicit from him what he did propose to do if he were given this carte blanche authority. We asked him, among other things, what was proposed to be done with reference to forgiving the accrued interest upon these debts. After some evasion he stated that correspondence had passed between the former Secretaries of the Treasury and foreign Governments which, in his opinion, might embarrass us in the collection of this money. The answer, of course, was made that if there was any such correspondence it was without authority of law and could not bind us, and that it was not thought to amount to a promise in any event, but if a promise, it was clearly unauthorized. We then asked him what his policy would be, and the substance of his reply was that he did not think we were in a position to insist upon the payment of that money.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President——

Mr. REED. I stated—and that is what raised this controversy—that we could not get him to say that he intended to collect the interest. The Senator can not find in the record his statement that he intended to collect it.

Mr. SMOOT. Will the Senator yield?

Mr. McCORMICK. May I ask the Senator a question?

Mr. REED. I yield to the Senator from Utah.

Mr. SMOOT. Was the Senator present when I asked the Secretary the direct question whether he, as Secretary of the Treasury, had any intention whatever of forgiving the foreign countries the interest that was due from them, and the Secretary answered "None whatever"?

Mr. REED. And was the Senator there when I then asked the Secretary if he meant that he proposed to insist upon the payment, and he answered that he thought we were not in a position to insist upon it?

Mr. SMOOT. That is, not immediately; not until the end of two years.

Mr. REED. No; at any time.

Mr. SMOOT. There is, however, no question in the world, Mr. President, that the Secretary of the Treasury stated to the committee that he did not feel that he was justified under the agreement that had been made to force the payment of the interest at the time the committee was in session.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, we will put the record in here, and will let the Senate have the benefit of it.

Mr. SMOOT. I am perfectly willing to stand on the record.

Mr. REED. I say now that no Secretary of the Treasury who ever occupied that position, whether he was a Democrat or a Republican, had any authority of law or any moral authority to waive one penny of the debt that is due this country from foreign nations.

Mr. McCORMICK. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. REED. I yield.

Mr. McCORMICK. Mr. President, will the Senator tell the Senate in what sense or in what measure the discussion of the foreign debt of the United States will advance the consideration of the bill before the Senate, the delay of which has been objected to on the other side of the Chamber?

Mr. REED. Oh, well, Mr. President, this discussion grew out of the statement that came from the other side of the Chamber that the Democrats had left an empty Treasury, and I am telling them one reason why it is empty. It came from the other side.

Now, if the Senator will compose himself just a minute and recover his Illinois equanimity, I will proceed to discuss the question that I want to discuss.

We all know that this country, just like any other country, has to have some revenue, and we have been trying to settle how it is to be raised. There has been criticism here of the length of this discussion. I have not been in the Senate long enough to call myself an old Member, but during the last 10 long years I have never observed in this body a closer attention to any bill than has been evidenced in the discussion of this bill. It is true that we have not always discussed the particular amendment that was pending, but there is not one of these important amendments that does not affect the aggregate of the revenue, and you can not consider one amendment which cuts down the revenue without the suggestion coming, "Where are you going to obtain revenue to take its place?" That necessarily leads to the discussion of other items.

Has this debate been fruitful?

This bill was brought in here, and I do not criticize the chairman of the committee or the committee for bringing it in at the time they did. They seemed to think that it must come in here in a hurry. We brought it in here when it had not been completely written. It had to be withdrawn the next day or the second day afterwards for a more complete copy.

Mr. PENROSE. The bill had been completely written, and was never altered in one line.

Mr. REED. It was not in form; that is what I mean.

Mr. PENROSE. The printer printed it in different type; and the Senator knows when he makes that statement that it is calculated to mislead.

Mr. REED. I do not mean to mislead anybody. Anyway, I would not mislead the Senator from Pennsylvania. I could not do that.

Mr. PENROSE. No; the Senator could not.

Mr. REED. Certainly not. Nobody could mislead the Senator from Pennsylvania.

The bill was put in so hastily that it was not printed in the form that was desired. It had to be withdrawn and printed in a different form.

Mr. PENROSE. Mr. President, will the Senator permit me to correct his recollection?

Mr. REED. Yes.

Mr. PENROSE. In order to gratify the Senator's peculiar taste as to the kind of italics, type, and punctuation in which the bill should be printed, and the taste of other members of the committee, the printing was changed; but when the Senator says that it was not written or not fully written or not complete or has been changed since that report, his statement is absolutely and deliberately misleading.

Mr. REED. Oh, Mr. President, I can not discuss questions with men who indulge in that sort of language, particularly under the existing circumstances.

Mr. PENROSE. Well, look at the Senator's language.

Mr. REED. What I said was that the bill was not in form.

Mr. PENROSE. It was in form.

Mr. REED. It was introduced in substance the same as it is now, but it was not printed in the form in which we wanted it for consideration, and by the action of the majority of the committee on a vote it was ordered to be otherwise printed. We have spent about 15 minutes in discussing an absolutely inconsequential matter.

The bill came on for discussion. What happened to the bill as the result of debate? Let us see if that debate was worth while.

Here is a bill that was written so blindly in its very form that the average man can not tell anything at all about what it means unless he spends about a week studying it. We know that the Members of the Senate not on the committee will not give it that kind of study, and very naturally. Indeed, if they undertook it, they would need an expert beside them to explain it. But what happened? It was proposed to take off $75,000,000 of the tax on the capital stock of corporations. The result of this debate has been to put back that $75,000,000. Was it worth the discussion?

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, that is the reason why I want the discussion to go on this evening.

Mr. REED. The Senator wants it to go on night and day. We who have to work would like to have a little time to sleep and a little time to reflect and study.

Mr. ASHURST. They sleep while the Senator is speaking.

Mr. REED. It was proposed to take $90,000,000 off of surtaxes. About $65,000,000 of that amount has been saved. Was the discussion worth it? It was worth the time of the Senate, I think, to discuss a question of that kind.

It was proposed here to make some exceptions in regard to American corporations that were doing business outside of the United States.

Mr. STANLEY. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Missouri yield to the Senator from Kentucky?

Mr. REED. I do.

Mr. STANLEY. If it had not been that somebody sold the agricultural bloc a tallow candle for a banana, we would have saved two or three hundred million dollars by this discussion.

Mr. REED. Why, certainly.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, I want to remind the Senator that if it had not been for this discussion, probably one-half of the railroad transportation tax would have still been in the bill.

Mr. REED. Yes; I was coming to that, but I thank the Senator for putting it in. You proposed to retain one-half of the railroad transportation tax, amounting to about $130,000,000 a year, if I remember rightly, and we have removed it as the result of this discussion. Was it worth taking a little time to discuss?

I mentioned a moment ago the tax upon corporations doing business abroad. That was an important item. It has been changed. Was it worth while? I think it was.

We next approach the question of the excess-profits tax, $450,000,000, and that has been discussed to some extent. Some votes have been changed by this discussion. If the bill had merely come in here and been read, it would have passed just as it was introduced.

The result of the discussion has been light. I have taken a great deal of time. I do not pretend that I am able to talk on any question so that I will illuminate the intelligence of any man in the world, any member of the committee, or even my good friend from Arizona, but I have deemed it my duty to talk about some of these propositions. Singularly enough, the things I have been talking for, the things that the Senator who is the leading Democratic member of the committee [Mr. SIMMONS] has been talking for, the things that the Senator from New Mexico [Mr. JONES], the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH], and the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. GERRY] have been talking for, as well as other Senators, notably the Senator from Ohio [Mr. POMERENE], who are not members of the committee, are in most instances the very items which have been remodeled in this bill. There remain to be considered a multitude of other important things.

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. REED. I yield.

Mr. ASHURST. Of course, the Senator knows that the RECORD discloses that I have been constant in my support of the various amendments to which the Senator refers.

Mr. REED. Certainly the Senator has.

Mr. ASHURST. The Senator lost his temper because——

Mr. REED. On the contrary, I have seldom been so good-humored.

Mr. ASHURST. I was judging by the Senator's expressions.

Mr. REED. As to that, I can not say. But the Senator has urged that we work under impossible conditions. I say that kindly. I would not have a controversy with my friend.

Mr. ASHURST. I am not seeking any.

Mr. REED. I will illustrate what an additional burden these night sessions will impose. I attempted to-day to draw an amendment to this bill. I thought I could draw an amendment to anything ever created by man. When I came to fit my amendment to this bill I was by no means sure that it meant what I wanted it to mean, because of the technical language of the bill. I went to one of the experts and asked him what the effect would be, and asked him to give me some figures as to the revenue. That was before dinner to-day. An hour or two ago he told me that he had been called to other work and could not get to it. So we are asked to come in here and work all night to carry on this matter, regardless of everything else, to do what? The Senator says the bill is a bad one. 'Why hasten the evil day? Why stand upon the mountain top and cry, "For God's sake, bring us to destruction quickly?"

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, the Senator says that other people can not put into his mouth words that he does not use. There are other Senators here who occupy that same attitude. The Senator must not put into my mouth words that I do not use.

Mr. REED. I do not want to.

Mr. ASHURST. The Senator will not. I will not let him do it. It is not simply that he does not want to, but I will not permit him to do it; and I do not say that unkindly.

The Senator must know that nine-tenths of the discussion in the Senate—and if he does not know it he is too unpretending a simpleton to stay in the Senate—goes out on an unreturning parabola and never comes back to touch the subject. Nine-tenths of the talk in this body does not relate to the subject under discussion; and there is not a Senator here who will say that it relates to the subject, except that he says his own speeches relate to the subject. My learned friend from Georgia [Mr. HARRIS] introduced an amendment that should have been disposed of in 20 minutes, and it is now nearly 6 o'clock, and that amendment is undisposed of, although five councilmen in the smallest town in Arizona would have disposed of it correctly in 10 minutes; and yet the Senate of the United States takes 6 hours!

I complain against inefficiency. I do not refer now to the Senator from Missouri alone——

Mr. REED. No; I hope not.

Mr. ASHURST. But to others as well.

Mr. REED. The Senator from Arizona, of course, has a perfect right to have whatever opinion he pleases regarding my utterances or those of other Senators. He has assumed the right lately to lecture the whole Senate in regard to its method of doing business. I do not agree with him that the talk in this body is idle. I have heard speeches made here that might as well not have been made, but in the main the discussion in this body is illuminating. The men who complain most are, mayhap, the chief offenders.

Mr. President, I was reciting what has already been accomplished by the discussion of this bill. A board of five aldermen might have done it better and more quickly. The remarkable thing is that these remarkable gentlemen from Arizona do not come down here and take possession of the Congress.

In addition to what I have already mentioned we have had discussions of matters that are yet to be settled, and if we could simply get the Members of the Senate to listen to these discussions it would not be necessary to repeat them four or five times.

In regard to night sessions, if this bill is bad we need not be in a hurry on this side. If the rest of the Republican program is equally bad, then the longer we discuss it and the slower we are in adopting it the better. I do not know of any proposition now being made whose adoption would relieve this country.

The Republican majority has laid aside its tariff bill, because those Members did not know what to do with it. I do not blame them. I am glad they laid it aside. Every day it is laid aside so much the better for the country.

They laid aside the soldiers' bonus bill, and that is not on the program. They do not intend to bring that out and pass it. If we hold night sessions until they get to the bonus bill, we will all die in our seats for want of sleep before they bring it out. I know of nothing that lies in the future that is so alluring that we need sit here all night in wait. Such a vigil will not hasten the dawn.

In the meantime the bloc, the celebrated bloc, which started in to save the country, has surrendered to the profiteers. I congratulate them.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Georgia [Mr. HARRIS] to the amendment of the committee.

Mr. HARRISON. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Assistant Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. FLETCHER (when his name was called). I make the same announcement as to my pair and its transfer as before. If permitted to vote, I would vote "yea," but I can not secure a transfer of my pair.

Mr. HALE (when his name was called). I transfer my pair with the senior Senator from Tennessee [Mr. SHIELDS] to the junior Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. CROW], and vote "nay."

Mr. HARRIS (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the junior Senator from New York [Mr. CALDER], which I transfer to my colleague, the junior Senator from Georgia [Mr. WATSON], and vote "yea."

Mr. JONES of New Mexico (when his name was called). I have a pair with the Senator from Maine [Mr. FERNALD]. In his absence I am not permitted to vote. If I were at liberty to vote, I would vote "yea."

Mr. KING (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from North Dakota [Mr. MCCUMBER]. In his absence I withhold my vote. If permitted to vote, I would vote "yea."

Mr. SUTHERLAND (when his name was called). I transfer my pair with the senior Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON] to the junior Senator from Delaware [Mr. DU PONT], and vote "nay."

Mr. TRAMMELL (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. COLT]. In his absence, being unable to obtain a transfer, I withhold my vote. If permitted to vote, I would vote "yea."

Mr. HARRIS (when the name of Mr. WATSON of Georgia was called). I desire to announce that my colleague [Mr. WATSON of Georgia] has been compelled to go home on account of illness. If he were present, he would vote "yea."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President, I desire to announce the absence on official business of the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] and the Senator from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD], who are paired. I desire to announce also the following pairs:

Mr. McLEAN (after having voted in the negative). I transfer my general pair with the Senator from Montana [Mr. MYERS] to the junior Senator from Maryland [Mr. WELLER] and allow my vote to stand.

Mr. EDGE (after having voted in the negative). Has the senior Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. OWEN] voted?

The VICE PRESIDENT. He has not voted.

Mr. EDGE. I have a general pair with that Senator, which I transfer to the junior Senator from Oregon [Mr. STANFIELD], and allow my vote to stand.

Mr. DIAL. I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Colorado [Mr. PHIPPS], and in his absence I withhold my vote.

Mr. HARRISON. I have a general pair with the junior Senator from West Virginia [Mr. ELKINS]. In his absence, not being able to secure a transfer, I withhold my vote. If permitted to vote, I would vote "yea."

Mr. McCORMICK (after having voted in the negative). Has the junior Senator from Wyoming [Mr. KENDRICK] voted?

The VICE PRESIDENT. He has not.

Mr. McCORMICK. I have a standing pair with that Senator, which I transfer to the junior Senator from California [Mr. SHORTRIDGE], and allow my vote to stand.

So Mr. HARRIS's amendment to the amendment of the committee was rejected.

Mr. PENROSE obtained the floor.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Pennsylvania yield to the Senator from Massachusetts?

Mr. PENROSE. I yield for a question.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. There is still one amendment dealing with the normal tax that has not been disposed of, and that is an amendment which I now offer. I understand after a record vote is had on this amendment the chairman of the Committee on Finance will move to take a recess, and if this amendment is acted on now all matters in connection with the normal tax provision will be disposed of.

Mr. TRAMMELL. I think the Senator is mistaken in saying that all amendments regarding the normal tax provision will then be disposed of, because there will be some other amendments proposed to this particular section.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. I must be absent from the Chamber to-morrow on official business, and I would like to have this amendment acted upon to-night if possible.

Mr. PENROSE. Let it be read and acted on.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. The amendment is very similar to the one offered by the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. GERRY]. It is not as drastic as the amendment offered by the Senator from Rhode Island. His amendment sought to reduce the normal tax on net incomes of less than $5,000 to 2 per cent, on net incomes between five and ten thousand dollars to 4 per cent, and on net incomes between ten and fifteen thousand dollars to 6 per cent. The amendment which I offer seeks to reduce the normal tax on net incomes of less than $5,000 to only 3 per cent, and on net incomes between five and ten thousand dollars to 6 per cent, making all incomes over $10,000 pay the present rate, namely, 8 per cent.

The loss of revenue, I am informed, if this amendment is adopted, will be about one-half what the loss would have been if the amendment of the Senator from Rhode Island had been agreed on, namely, about $75,000,000.

As there has been a full discussion upon the subject, and all aspects of the question have been fully debated, I do not think it is necessary to have any further discussion. I ask for a yea-and-nay vote, and will be content with the result.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will state the amendment to the amendment.

The ASSISTANT SECRETARY. On page 23, at the end of line 2, insert the following additional proviso:

Provided further, That for the calendar year 1922 and each calendar year thereafter, in the case of a citizen or resident of the United States, the rate upon the first $5,000 of such excess amount shall be 3 per cent; the rate upon the second additional $5,000 of such excess amount shall be 6 per cent.

The VICE PRESIDENT. On this amendment to the amendment of the committee the Senator from Massachusetts asks for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Assistant Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. DIAL (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the Senator from Colorado [Mr. PHIPPS]. In his absence I withhold my vote.

While on my feet I desire to announce that my colleague [Mr. SMITH] is detained at home on account of illness. He has a general pair with the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. STERLING].

Mr. EDGE (when his name was called). Making the same announcement as before with reference to my pair and its transfer, I vote "nay."

Mr. HALE (when his name was called). Making the same announcement that I made on the previous vote with reference to my pair and its transfer, I vote "nay."

Mr. HARRIS (when his name was called). Making the same announcement as before with reference to my pair and its transfer, I vote "yea."

Mr. JONES of New Mexico (when his name was called). Making the same announcement in regard to my pair that I made a while ago, I withhold my vote. If permitted to vote, I should vote "yea."

Mr. KING (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from North Dakota [Mr. MCCUMBER]. I transfer that pair to the senior Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED] and vote "yea."

Mr. SUTHERLAND (when his name was called). Making the same announcement as before with reference to my pair and its transfer, I vote "nay."

Mr. SWANSON (when his name was called). Making the same announcement with reference to my pair and transfer that I made on the previous vote, I vote "yea."

Mr. TRAMMELL (when his name was called). Making the same announcement as before in regard to my pair, I withhold my vote. If permitted to vote, I would vote "yea."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. HARRISON (after having voted in the affirmative). I have a general pair with the junior Senator from West Virginia [Mr. ELKINS]. In his absence, being unable to obtain a transfer, I withdraw my vote. If permitted to vote, I would vote "yea."

Mr. McCORMICK. Making the same announcement as before as to my pair and transfer, I vote "nay."

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President, I wish to announce the following pairs:

The Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] with the Senator from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD];

The Senator from South Dakota [Mr. STERLING] with the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. SMITH];

The Senator from Vermont [Mr. DILLINGHAM] with the Senator from Virginia [Mr. GLASS];

The Senator from Maine [Mr. FERNALD] with the Senator from New Mexico [Mr. JONES];

The Senator from Connecticut [Mr. McLEAN] with the Senator from Montana [Mr. MYERS]; and

The Senator from Delaware [Mr. BALL] with the Senator from Florida [Mr. FLETCHER].

The result was announced—yeas 21, nays 32, as follows:

YEAS—21.

Broussard	King	Ransdell	Walsh, Mont.

So the amendment of Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts to the amendment of the committee was rejected.

Mr. PENROSE. Mr. President, I desire to announce to the Senate that I intend to move that the Senate take a recess until 11 o'clock to-morrow morning. Prior to making that motion I desire to state to the Senate, and I hope the country will take note of it, that I propose to move to hold an evening session to-morrow; and on Wednesday I shall submit to the Senate, or there will be submitted to the Senate, a resolution which I hope by that time will be indorsed by a majority of the Senate in writing, and which has already been indorsed by all Senators available this afternoon, pledging themselves to remain in the Capitol and maintain a quorum night and day until the pending bill is disposed of. That will be submitted to the Senate on Wednesday.

Now, I am informed that it is desired and desirable to hold a short executive session, and therefore I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President——

Mr. PENROSE. Then later I shall move, as in legislative session, that the Senate take a recess until 11 o'clock to-morrow.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Before the motion is put I should like to ask the Senator why he does not resort to the rule of the Senate under which a two-thirds majority may bring about a cloture of debate?

Mr. PENROSE. I seek my own method in bringing the result. I think a continuous session of the Senate night and day will enable all to be heard, and those who desire to discuss the evils of Wall Street, the iniquities of the Federal Reserve Board, and many ancient and medieval topics can be heard anywhere during the morning hours from 4 or 5 until daylight. I desire to accommodate those Senators. I now move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, before the Senator——

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is not debatable except by unanimous consent. Is there objection to hearing the Senator from Mississippi?

Mr. PENROSE. I object.

The VICE PRESIDENT. There is objection. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Pennsylvania.

Mr. HARRISON. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is, Shall the Senate——

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, you can not cut me off in that way. That may be the Massachusetts method, but——

Mr. PENROSE. Mr. President, I had the floor and I yielded for a question to the Senator from Mississippi and then made a motion. I ask that the question be put on my motion.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is, Shall the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, I asked the Senator to withhold his motion for a moment while I made a few remarks, and now I ask him again to do so.

Mr. PENROSE. The Senator from Mississippi has not the floor, and I press my motion.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Pennsylvania.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will call the roll.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, what is the parliamentary situation? Am I recognized or not?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The motion for an executive session is not debatable.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I understand that.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair asked if there was unanimous consent to hear the Senator from Mississippi, which was objected to, and the roll call is now proceeding.

Mr. WILLIAMS. If unanimous consent is asked for anything, of course, I shall decline——

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will proceed with the roll call.

The Assistant Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst	Hale	McKellar	Sheppard
Brandegee	Harreld	McKinley	Simmons
Broussard	Harris	McNary	Spencer
Bursum	Harrison	Moses	Stanley
Cameron	Heflin	Nelson	Sutherland
Capper	Hitchcock	Newberry	Swanson
Caraway	Jones, N. Mex.	Nicholson	Trammell
Curtis	Kellogg	Norbeck	Walsh, Mass.
Edge	Kenyon	Oddie	Warren
Ernst	Keyes	Overman	Watson, Ind.
France	King	Penrose	Willis
Frelinghuysen	La Follette	Pittman
Gerry	Lenroot	Poindexter
Gooding	McCormick	Ransdell

The VICE PRESIDENT. Fifty-three Senators having answered to their names, a quorum is present.

Mr. HARRIS. I wish to announce that my colleague [Mr. WATSON] is temporarily detained from the Senate on account of illness.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Pennsylvania that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, if I understand the rules of the Senate, that question is not debatable.

The VICE PRESIDENT. It is not debatable.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Very well.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After 1 hour and 25 minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened.

RECESS.

Mr. CURTIS. I move that the Senate take a recess until to-morrow morning at 11 o'clock.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 7 o'clock and 40 minutes p. m.) the Senate took a recess until to-morrow, Tuesday, October 25, 1921, at 11 o'clock a. m.

CONFIRMATIONS.

Executive nominations confirmed by the Senate October 24 (legislative day of October 20), 1921.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

MONDAY, October 24, 1921.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. James Shera Montgomery, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Father in Heaven, Thou hast not been far from us at any time; Thy promise is not broken, but enlarged. Truly Thou art our everlasting portion, and we bow and bless Thy sacred name in life and in death. O be present in our lives and carry forth our little knowledge into wisdom. Bless the flower and the fruit of our service which is for the common good. May we always get strength and vision from the life of Him who is altogether holy. If any clouds hang over our heads, may they break in blessings and open the gates of difficulty which may be before us. Through Jesus Christ our Lord. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of Friday, October 21, 1921, was read and approved.

AGRICULTURAL ENTRIES ON ALASKAN COAL LANDS.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Mr. Speaker, under instructions from the Public Lands Committee I desire to submit a privileged report on the bill H. R. 7948, a bill to provide for agricultural entries on coal lands in Alaska.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 7948) to provide for agricultural entries on coal lands in Alaska.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, is that a privileged report?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Oregon [Mr. SINNOTT] has called the attention of the Chair to the question as to whether or not it is privileged, and the Chair is uncertain. As the Chair understands, the gentleman from Oregon [Mr. SINNOTT] intends to argue the question before the House as to whether it is a privileged report or not.

Mr. SINNOTT. Mr. Speaker, I think there is no question about the privilege of the bill. If the Speaker desires to hear me now——

The SPEAKER. The Chair will be glad to hear the gentleman at some other time.

Mr. SINNOTT. Mr. Speaker, then I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD on the jurisdiction of the Committee on Public Lands relating to the bill. The subject is an important one, and I have given some time to the collation of the authorities, which may help the Speaker.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

JURISDICTION OF THE COMMITTEE ON THE PUBLIC LANDS TO REPORT PRIVILEGED BILLS.

Mr. SINNOTT. Mr. Speaker, in presenting the question of the privileged character of H. R. 7948, under Rule XI, clause 56, we are first met with the question, assuming the bill to be privileged, can it now be reported from the floor as a privileged bill, since it was originally reported on August 3, 1921, through the basket? Fortunately this question has been decided by Speaker Reed, volume 4, Hinds' Precedents, section 3146:

3146. Bills from a committee having leave to report at any time must be reported from the floor of the House and not by filing them with the clerk.

Although a privileged matter may lose its privilege by an informal manner of making the report, the injury may be repaired by a new report.

Rule XI as it relates to the Committee on the Public Lands is as follows:

The following-named committees shall have leave to report at any time on the matters herein stated, viz, * * * the Committee on the Public Lands, bills for the forfeiture of land grants to railroad and other corporations, bills preventing speculation in the public lands, and bills for the reservation of the public lands for the benefit of actual and bona fide settlers.

CONSTRUCTION BY DIFFERENT SPEAKERS ON RULE XI, CLAUSE 56, AS IT RELATES TO THE COMMITTEE ON THE PUBLIC LANDS.

The leading decisions on the rule giving privilege to the Committee on the Public Lands are cited in volume 4, Hinds' Precedents, sections 4633 to 4639, inclusive.

DECISIONS BY SPEAKER CARLISLE.

The bill H. R. 7901, the subject of Speaker Carlisle's decision on March 17, 1888, Fiftieth Congress, first session, page 2195, cited and copiously quoted in section 4633 of Hinds' Precedents, may be found in the House library, volume 34, House bills, Fiftieth Congress, first session.

Speaker Carlisle held this bill privileged, although its title was as follows:

To secure to actual settlers the public lands adapted to agriculture, to protect the forest on the public domain, and for other purposes—

And the bill, which is too long to read now, in addition to provisions relating to actual and bona fide settlers, covered the following subjects:

Section 2 provides for classification and sale of mineral lands under existing law.
Section 3 provides for entry by a citizen or association of citizens on 160 acres of vacant iron or coal lands.
Sections 4, 5, 6, and 7 provide for sale of timber.
Section 8 provides for reserving timberlands as public reservations.
Section 10 provides for the disposition of lands chiefly valuable for stone, unfit for cultivation, and destitute of timber.
Section 11 provides for public or private sale of isolated tracts.
Section 27 makes it unlawful to cut or destroy timber on the lands of the United States, or to set fire to any tree on such lands, or to knowingly manufacture any lumber from such timber.
Section 28 dedicates 2 rods of each side of the section line on said lands for public highways.

When section 2 of the bill was read, which is as follows:

SEC. 2. That all public lands chiefly valuable for mineral deposits—namely, iron, coal, gold, silver, cinnabar, lead, copper, nickel, and tin—and every contiguous 160 acres or less quantity thereof, in legal subdivisions, the greater part of which is unfit for cultivation, shall be classified as mineral lands, and shall be disposed of under existing laws, except as herein provided. All iron lands shall be disposed of in like manner as is provided by law for entry of coal lands.

Mr. Adams contended that enough had been read to show that the bill was not privileged, on the ground that it had been decided that a matter can not be privileged which contains other matter not privileged in its character. Speaker Carlisle in overruling the point of order among other things said:

In other words, it is impossible to enlarge the area of the public lands subject to entry under the homestead law without in some way legislating in respect to lands that are not now subject to homestead entry.

This quotation is from Hinds' Precedents, Volume IV, section 4633, where excerpts from the decision are given.

Another decision by Speaker Carlisle may be found in CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, Fiftieth Congress, second session, volume 20, part 1, on page 47. This decision is copiously quoted in Volume IV, section 4637, Hinds' Precedents, from which I take the following quotation:

The Chair has invariably placed a very liberal construction upon that rule—

Referring to said Rule XI. On this same page 47 of the RECORD of the Fiftieth Congress, second session, Mr. Holman, who reported House bill 7901, in the first session, in his argument as to the privileged character of House bill 1368, the subject of Speaker Carlisle's decision, referred to House bill 7901, held by the Speaker privileged in the first session as follows, showing the character of the bill which Speaker Carlisle held privileged:

I refer especially, Mr. Speaker, to the decision made by the Chair on the question of order raised on the general land bill at the last session. The general purpose of that bill, the general scope of it, was to secure the public lands to actual settlers, but it necessarily involved a vast amount of other matters; protection of coal fields from monopoly, protection of water courses from monopoly, protection of forests from destruction, and a multitude of other incidental matter. That bill bristled with legislative provisions which are prominent and yet only incidental, and, in some cases, only remotely incidental, to the general purpose of protecting to the actual settlers the public lands, yet the point of order was overruled; whereas this bill contains but a single subject matter and the provisions directly necessary to secure the purpose sought to be attained, namely, that certain lands heretofore granted by Congress to a corporation shall be restored to the public domain and secured for the benefit of actual settlers.

Another decision of Speaker Carlisle is cited in the second footnote under section 4638 of volume 4, Hinds' Precedents, on page 963. In addition to the subjects mentioned in the footnote the bill related to the desert-land law where no settlement is required. The bill also required a map of the irrigation plan showing its sufficiency, and also related to abandoned military reservations, land warrants, and land scrip.

DECISION BY SPEAKER CRISP.

The bill, S. 3643, held privileged by Speaker Crisp, cited in volume 4, section 4635 of Hinds' Precedents, is printed in CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, volume 24, Fifty-second Congress, second session, January 26, 1893, on page 864. The following is a copy of the bill held privileged:

Be in enacted, etc., That all public lands now remaining undisposed within the abandoned military reservation in the State of Wyoming known as the Fort Bridger Military Reservation, are hereby made subject to disposal under the homestead law only: Provided, That actual occupants thereon upon the 1st day of July, 1892, shall have the preference right to make one entry not exceeding one quarter section under existing laws if qualified, which shall include their respective improvements: Provided further, That any of such lands as are occupied for town-site purposes and any of the lands that may be shown to be valuable for coal or minerals shall be disposed of as now provided for lands subject to entry and sale under the town-site coal or mineral land laws, respectively.

It will be noted that while in the first part of the bill the land is to be disposed of under the homestead law only, yet the last proviso provides that any of the land occupied for town-site purposes and any land valuable for coal or minerals shall be disposed of under the town-site, coal, or mineral land laws, respectively. This decision of Speaker Crisp may be found in the RECORD for the Fifty-second Congress, second session, page 2177, February 25, 1893.

DECISION BY SPEAKER REED.

An important decision of Speaker Reed is cited in section 4638, volume 4, Hinds' Precedents, wherein Speaker Reed is quoted:

The Chair thinks that this provision has always had a liberal construction, and will decide that it is a privileged matter.

The provision referred to, of course, is Rule XI, clause 56, as it relates to the Committee on the Public Lands. I shall read the bill, which is printed in the RECORD of the Fifty-fourth Congress, first session, page 1760, February 15, 1896, which Speaker Reed held privileged:

Be it enacted, etc., That suits by the United States to vacate and annul any patent to lands heretofore erroneously issued under a special grant shall only be brought within five years from the passage of this act, and suits to vacate and annul patents hereafter issued shall only be brought within 10 years after the date of the issuance of such patents. But no patent to any lands held by a bona fide purchaser shall be vacated or annulled, but the right and title of such purchaser is hereby confirmed.

SEC. 2. That if any person claiming to be a bona fide purchaser of any lands erroneously patented or certified shall present his claim to the Secretary of the Interior prior to the institution of a suit to cancel a patent or certification, and if it shall appear that he is a bona fide purchaser, the Secretary of the Interior shall request that suit be brought in such case against the patentee, or the corporation, company, person, or association of persons for whose benefit the certification was made, for the value of said land, which in no case shall be less than minimum Government price thereof nor more than the amount paid by the purchaser to the original grantee of the United States, and the title of such claimant shall stand confirmed. An adverse decision by the Secretary of the Interior on the bona fides of such claimant shall not be conclusive of his rights, and if such claimant or one claiming to be a bona fide purchaser, but who has not submitted his claim to the Secretary of the Interior, is made a party to such suit, and if found by the court to be a bona fide purchaser, the court shall decree a confirmation of the title and shall render a decree in behalf of the United States for the value of the land as hereinbefore provided. Any bona fide purchaser of lands patented or certified to a railroad company, and who is not made a party of such suit, and who has not submitted his claim to the Secretary of the Interior, may establish his right as such bona fide purchaser in any United States court having jurisdiction of the subject matter, or, at his option, as prescribed in sections 3 and 4 of chapter 376 of the acts of the second session of the Forty-ninth Congress.

SEC. 3. That if at any time prior to the institution of suit by the Attorney General to cancel any patent or certification of lands erroneously patented or certified, a claim or statement is presented to the Secretary of the Interior by or on behalf of any person or persons, corporation or corporations, claiming that such person or persons, corporation or corporations, is a bona fide purchaser or are bona fide purchasers of any patented or certified land by deed or contract, or otherwise, from or through the original patentee or corporation to which patent or certificate was issued, no suit or action shall be brought to cancel or annul the patent or certification for said land until such claim is investigated in said Department of the Interior; and if it shall appear that such person or corporation is a bona fide purchaser as aforesaid, or that such persons or corporations are such bona fide purchasers, then no such suit shall be instituted and the title of such claimant or claimants shall stand confirmed; but the Secretary of the Interior shall request that suit be brought in such case against the patentee, or the corporation, company, person, or association of persons for whose benefit the patent was issued or certification was made for the value of the land as hereinbefore specified.

It is obvious from these decisions of Speakers Carlisle, Crisp, and Reed that a liberal construction has always been given this Rule XI, clause 56, as it relates to the rights of the Committee on the Public Lands.

Examining H. R. 7948 in the light of these decisions, it is apparent that the bill is entitled to a privileged character. Section 1 of the bill grants actual settlers a surface homestead right on public lands containing coal, oil, or gas, which are not now subject to homestead settlement. Section 1 enlarges the area of the public domain subject to homestead settlement. Section 2 of the bill provides for the issuance of a patent with a reservation to the United States of all the coal, oil, or gas in the land patented. Section 2 further protects and safeguards the rights of the homestead settler by restricting the operations of the coal, oil, or gas permittee or lessee in the interest of the homestead settler; it also requires the permittee or lessee to give a bond for the payment of damages to the crops or improvements on the land. It will be remembered that the coal, oil, or gas deposits in the land covered by H. R. 7948 are now subject to disposition under the Alaska coal leasing act of October 20, 1914 (38 Stat., 741), and the oil leasing act of the Sixty-sixth Congress, Public 146, approved February 25, 1920, United States Statutes at Large, volume 41, page 437. Said acts provide for the removal of said minerals by permit or lease.

Therefore, Mr. Speaker, the main provisions of section 2 are to insure to the settler the fullest use of the homestead with the least possible molestation from the permittee or lessee; the means for accomplishing this object are by requiring a bond or undertaking against damages to crops and improvements, also by restricting the permittee or lessee to so much of the surface only as may be reasonably required for his mining operations. Without such safeguards and restrictions the privilege of the homestead settler would be bootless and nugatory. This proposition is well stated in that part of Speaker Carlisle's decision on H. R. 7901, Fiftieth Congress, first session, not quoted in Hinds' Precedents, section 4633, and which I shall read:

The Chair supposes that a bill reported from this committee might include matters having no relation to the public lands or to the privileged subjects mentioned in the rule, and thus might lose its privilege; but the Chair will state that in such a bill all provisions relating to the preservation of the public lands for actual settlers, and providing the means for accomplishing that object, are certainly privileged; otherwise the privilege would amount to nothing.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS.

Mr. DYER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Missouri asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

EXPUNGING OF REMARKS FROM THE RECORD.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, I move to expunge from the RECORD of Saturday, October 22, the remarks printed as an extension of remarks by Hon. THOMAS L. BLANTON, of Texas, beginning on page 7417. And as explanatory and in justification for the motion I make, I call the attention of gentlemen to a copy of a letter which is found on page 7420 of the RECORD, beginning at the bottom of the page.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Wyoming moves to expunge from the RECORD the remarks indicated. Those in favor——

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I would like to be heard on that. These are my remarks. Will the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL] yield me some time? I would like to be heard on it. My remarks will be proper.

Mr. MONDELL. How much time does the gentleman desire?

Mr. BLANTON. I would like 10 minutes. This is an important matter. It is a matter——

Mr. MONDELL. The gentleman ought to apologize to the House instead of asking 10 minutes.

Mr. COCKRAN. Perhaps he will.

Mr. MONDELL. I think anyone who reads the RECORD will agree that it was an unpardonable breach of the privileges of the House to have inserted in the RECORD such a letter.

Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the motion.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Wyoming moves the previous question.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, certainly some of these remarks are not objectionable.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas is out of order. Unless the gentleman from Wyoming will yield——

Mr. BLANTON. Will the gentleman grant me some time?

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. Mr. Speaker, I ask for the regular order.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question.

The question was taken, and the Speaker announced that the ayes seemed to have it.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I ask for a division.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 153, noes 1.

Mr. MALONEY. Mr. Speaker, I ask for information. Does that strike out the entire remarks?

The SPEAKER. The previous question is ordered.

Mr. BLANTON. The motion is to strike out the entire speech.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Wyoming will state his motion.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, I move to expunge from the RECORD the entire extension of remarks indicated.

The SPEAKER. Will the gentleman please indicate it?

Mr. MONDELL. Beginning on top of page 7417 of the RECORD of Saturday, October 22, and extending down to the bottom of page 7424.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Wyoming makes a motion, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. MONDELL moves to expunge from the RECORD the extension of remarks beginning on page 7417 and concluding at the bottom of page 7424.

Mr. MONDELL. Down to the end of the extension of remarks on page 7425.

The Clerk read as follows:

Down to the end of the extension of remarks on page 7425.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the motion of the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL].

The question was taken, and the Speaker announced that the ayes seemed to have it.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I ask for a division.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 146, noes 1.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I object to the vote because it shows there is no quorum present, and I make the point of order that there is no quorum present.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas makes the point that there is no quorum present, and it is clear that no quorum is present. The Doorkeeper will close the doors, the Sergeant at Arms will notify the absentees. Those in favor of the motion to expunge will, as their names are called, vote "yea" and those opposed will vote "nay," and the Clerk will call the roll.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 314, nays 1, answered "present" 2, not voting 114, as follows:

REFUNDING FOREIGN OBLIGATIONS.

Mr. FORDNEY. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 8762.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Michigan moves that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the refunding bill. The question is on agreeing to that motion.

The motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Iowa [Mr. TOWNER] will please take the chair.

Thereupon the House resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 8762, with Mr. TOWNER in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 8762, which the Clerk will report by title.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 8762) to create a commission authorized under certain conditions to refund or convert obligations of foreign Governments owing to the United States of America, and for other purposes.

ANNOUNCEMENT.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I want to ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. LOWREY] may address the House out of order for two minutes, to make an announcement that he wants to make to the House.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Tennessee asks unanimous consent that the gentleman from Mississippi may address the House out of order for two minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. LOWREY. Mr. Chairman, I just wanted to announce what I think will be a most interesting and most helpful meeting to-night in the general caucus room at the House Office Building. There will be two addresses by two Americans who have been in Japan, one for 20 years and the other for 30 years—Dr. Walne and Dr. Axling. They are both very much interested in the cordial relations between this country and Japan, and they are both men of ability. The two speeches will last together, I suppose, about an hour, and we can depend upon it that they will be wise, that the speeches will be helpful and interesting. I invite every Member to hear those speeches if possible. [Applause.]

REFUNDING FOREIGN OBLIGATIONS.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. FREAR] desires to offer an amendment.

Mr. FREAR. Mr. Chairman, at the conclusion of the speeches on Friday I offered an amendment. I ask permission to withdraw that, and to substitute another amendment.

Mr. STAFFORD. No amendment has been offered yet.

Mr. FREAR. Then I offer an amendment, if I may.

Mr. COLLIER. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment. I intended to offer the amendment when the motion to rise was made on Friday.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. FREAR] was on the floor at the same time, as the Chair recalls. The Chair will recognize the gentleman from Wisconsin. The Clerk will report the amendment offered by the gentleman from Wisconsin.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. FREAR: Page 2, line 14, after the word "interest," insert "Provided, That the total amount of interest payable on any such obligation received hereunder shall not be less than an amount equal to interest on the principal thereof at the rate of 5 per cent per annum.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. FREAR] is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. FREAR. Mr. Chairman, I offered an amendment Friday night. It referred to a limitation on interest rates placed on the refunded foreign obligations and was allowed to lie on the table. I have asked leave to withdraw it.

This amendment which I now offer as a substitute is one presented by the chairman of the committee [Mr. FORDNEY] as preferable, and meets, as I understand, with no objection from the Treasury Department. It provides for a total 5 per cent rate of interest, which I think will quiet much of the apprehension which has been expressed on both sides of the aisle, and at the same time serve as a complete protection to the Treasury Department and an assurance that we will receive back the full amount of the interest that has been called for.

I do not care to discuss it further, except to say that it meets with the approval, as I understand, of the Treasury Department. It certainly is an improvement over the amendment I offered. I have no pride of authorship in the matter. It covers, as I understand, the interest provision placed in the original acts authorizing foreign loans and the delinquent three years' interest agreed upon, all of which is included in the 5 per cent rate.

Mr. FESS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FREAR. Certainly.

Mr. FESS. I understand the gentleman's amendment is that the total shall not fall below 5 per cent, which gives some latitude if the commission finds it advisable in the different terms, long and short, that one might be higher than 5 and one might be lower than 5, but at the same time the total will amount to but 5 per cent?

Mr. FREAR. That is my understanding, and it was explained to the House the other day that of course there had been three years' interest which have been delinquent and outstanding, and the purpose is to carry that along with the other interest; and that is the only manner in which it can be clearly expressed.

Mr. FESS. My concern was whether, in giving the legal authority, we might find it wise on economic matters to repudiate what we give legal authority for. You do not think that would do it?

Mr. FREAR. This was prepared by the Treasury Department, and it seems to me it is as reasonably protected as we can draw it.

Mr. COCKRAN rose.

Mr. STEVENSON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FREAR. Yes.

Mr. STEVENSON. I would like to ask the gentleman if he does not also contemplate fixing some limit on the length of time that the bonds shall run, so that they can not put it at 100 years?

Mr. FREAR. That is another proposition, standing by itself.

Mr. COCKRAN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FREAR. Certainly.

Mr. COCKRAN. The question I want to ask the gentleman is, What particular virtue attaches to 5 per cent? Is there any particular reason why 5 per cent is fixed as the rate?

Mr. FREAR. The Treasury Department has inserted that rate because that is the amount they are charging to-day. It covers the amount of delinquent interest and the rate fixed in the original loan authorizations. It reaches the amount of 5 per cent and has been agreed upon between the countries of Europe and our own.

Mr. COCKRAN. Is there any provision made for contingencies—suppose the interest rose to 7 or 8 or 9 per cent, is it the intention that these obligations shall forevermore and for all time bear 5 per cent interest?

Mr. FREAR. I can not say anything beyond what the amendment itself states. It is clear in its terms. But if we refund we can refund at any rate we agree upon.

Mr. MADDEN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FREAR. Yes.

Mr. MADDEN. I was wondering whether it provided for payment of interest in annual or semiannual periods.

Mr. FREAR. There is no provision in relation to that. Let me say that we are dealing with Governments, some able to pay and some unable to pay. It is thought best to let the department have some degree of discretion. Let me say that, as I understand, this meets with the consent of the Treasury Department. It is offered by the chairman of the committee, or, at least, he handed it to me; and it is, in the judgment of the department, preferable to the substitute which I offered. We can not put all restrictive conditions in this bill. We are dealing with 19 Governments and with varying questions of economics, so I think we ought to leave the department some discretion while we are placing restrictions on it.

Mr. TREADWAY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FREAR. I will.

Mr. TREADWAY. The question I wanted to ask has been perhaps answered by the gentleman as to what was the attitude of the Treasury Department. Do I understand that the Treasury Department offered this amendment?

Mr. FREAR. The Treasury Department handed it, as I understand, to the chairman of the committee, who handed it to me, as something that they would accept if it met with the approval of the House.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FREAR. I will.

Mr. LONGWORTH. I think in order to be absolutely accurate it ought to be stated that the Treasury Department does not favor this amendment. It prefers the bill as it was reported by the committee, but if the House desires to adopt any limitation it feels that this would be the most desirable.

Mr. FREAR. I think that statement of the gentleman from Ohio is correct. Let me add that the Treasury Department says it is not objectionable to the bill as introduced by the Treasury Department. The bill as introduced gave the Secretary of the Treasury sole power. The committee put on five amendments and this will make the sixth amendment, and this saves the commission from pressure that will be brought to bear later urging a reduction in interest rates. All that is desired is to meet the conditions named in the original act of authorization and to include the delinquent interest, all of which I believe is a matter of general agreement between the Governments interested.

Mr. FORDNEY. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 10 minutes and to revise and extend my remarks.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Michigan asks unanimous consent to address the House for 10 minutes and to revise and extend his remarks. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. FORDNEY. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen, I took up with the Treasury Department the amendment offered by the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. FREAR] on Friday evening. The Treasury Department had serious objection to that amendment, but prepared an amendment, which has been offered by the gentleman from Wisconsin this morning, and said that the Treasury Department would much prefer no amendment at all, but if the House insisted upon an amendment the one offered by the gentleman from Wisconsin this morning would be the most preferable, because such amendments throw about the commission a great handicap.

Now, I want in the time I have to address the House to call attention of gentlemen to the contradictions in the existing law, one paragraph with another.

Section 2, page 6, provides—and I will not read it all, but that portion which bears upon the subject of interest:

SEC. 2. That for the purpose of more effectually providing for the national security and defense and prosecuting the war by establishing credits in the United States for foreign Governments, the Secretary of the Treasury, with the approval of the President, is hereby authorized, on behalf of the United States, to purchase at par from such foreign Governments then engaged in war with the enemies of the United States their obligations hereafter issued, bearing the same rate of interest and containing in their essentials the same terms and conditions as those of the United States issued under authority of this act.

* * * * * * *

The act further authorizes the Secretary—

to enter into such arrangements as may be necessary or desirable for establishing such credits and for purchasing such obligations of foreign Governments and for the susequent payment thereof before maturity, but such arrangements shall provide that if any of the bonds of the United States bearing a higher rate of interest than 3½ per cent, then and in that event the obligations of such foreign Governments held by the United States shall be by such foreign Governments converted in a like manner and exchanged into obligations bearing the same rate of interest as the bonds of the United States issued under the provisions of section 5 of this act.

Now, then, on page 12 this language is found:

The Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized to purchase at par from such foreign Governments, respectively, their several obligations hereafter issued, bearing such rate or rates of interest, maturing at such date or dates, not later than the bonds of the United States then last issued under the authority of this act, or of such acts approved April 24, 1917, and containing such terms and conditions as the Secretary of the Treasury may from time to time determine, or to make advances to or for the account of any such foreign Governments, and to receive such obligations at par for the amount of any such advances; but the rate or rates of interest borne by any such obligations shall not be less than the highest rate borne by any bonds of the United States which, at the time of the acquisition thereof, shall have been issued under authority of said act approved April 24, 1917, or of this act, and any such obligation shall contain such provisions as the Secretary of the Treasury may from time to time determine for the conversion of a proportionate part of such obligations into obligations bearing a higher rate of interest if bonds of the United States issued under authority of this act shall be converted into other bonds of the United States bearing a higher rate of interest, but the rate of interest in such foreign obligations issued upon such conversion shall not be less than the highest rate of interest borne by such bonds of the United States.

There is a law stating that in converting those short-time obligations into long-time obligations the rates of interest in the long-time obligations shall not be less than the highest rates that our bonds carry.

Reading, now, further from this compilation of Liberty loan legislation, on page 14, subdivision (b), we find the following:

The Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized from time to time to convert any short-time obligations of foreign Governments which may be received under the authority of this section into long-time obligations of such foreign Governments, respectively, maturing not later than October 15, 1938, and in such form and terms as the Secretary of the Treasury may prescribe; but the rate or rates of interest borne by any such long-time obligations at the time of their acquisition shall not be less than the rate borne by the short-time obligations. * * *

The short-time obligations bear a rate of interest at 5 and 6 per cent, most of them, but there are some obligations issued by the foreign Governments that carry a rate of interest at 3½ per cent. However, while we were making loans to these foreign Governments they paid the interest semiannually to our Government on all obligations issued up to that time, and on the obligations which they have given to our Government which are demand notes that bear 3½ per cent interest they paid 5 per cent, because it was agreed between our Government and the foreign Governments that the rate of interest should be 5 and not 3½ per cent.

Mr. J. M. NELSON. Mr. Chairman, what is the gentleman reading from?

Mr. FORDNEY. I am reading from the law which authorized those loans, under which they were made. In section 3, page 15, of this pamphlet, there is another paragraph that relates to interest, being the acts of April 24, 1917, and later, and in it we find this provision:

But the rate or rates of interest borne by any such long-time obligations at the time of their acquisition shall not be less than the rate borne by the short-time obligations so converted into such long-time obligations.

That is the existing law.

Mr. WALSH. From what law is the gentleman reading?

Mr. LONGWORTH. Section 3 of the second Liberty loan act.

Mr. WALSH. But the gentleman has read from two or three different bond acts.

Mr. FORDNEY. Yes; and those loans were made under two or three different acts. I am reading from the act approved September 24, 1917, referring now to the last paragraph which I read. The other paragraphs were in the act of April 24, 1917.

Mr. FESS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FORDNEY. Yes.

Mr. FESS. I notice the law to which the chairman refers has this proviso, that the authority granted by the section to the Secretary of the Treasury to establish credits for foreign Governments as aforesaid shall cease upon the termination of the war. My question is whether the law the gentleman is reading will be operative when the exchange of treaties has been made.

Mr. FORDNEY. Yes; the authorization of the loans will cease at the time, and no loans could be made after that time; but we are still officially at war with Germany.

Mr. FESS. But we will not be very much longer.

Mr. LONGWORTH. The distinction, I will say to my colleague, as I understand it, is this, that the authority to make further loans ceases after the date of the termination of the war, but the powers to be exercised under the acts are indefinite.

Mr. FORDNEY. The cessation applies only to the time when the loans can be continued to be made. So far as the amendment offered by the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. FREAR] is concerned, on Saturday last I conferred with the Treasury Department, and they concluded that the amendment that was then suggested by the gentleman from Wisconsin would be very objectionable indeed and greatly handicap the commission. They prepared the amendment which the gentleman has this morning offered, and stated that if they were to have any amendment they would prefer this. Personally I would prefer no amendment at all.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Michigan has expired.

Mr. FORDNEY. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. FORDNEY. The reason why I would prefer no amendment at all is this: The 3-year extension of time for the payment of this interest expires on the 1st of May next year. The interest due for the first year in round numbers was $500,000,000. For easy figuring let us say that each year the past due interest is $500,000,000. Therefore on the 1st of May next year there will be $1,500,000,000 of interest due. That has been due for three years, and if we are to receive 5 per cent on those deferred payments of interest the interest on the $500,000,000 for three years would amount to $75,000,000.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FORDNEY. Just a moment. Let me conclude this statement. Then for two years the interest would be $50,000,000 and for one year $25,000,000, or a total of $150,000,000 on accrued interest past due. Some leeway must be given to our representatives to obtain from the foreign Governments the interest due us on those past-due obligations, and I do not believe we should tie the hands of the commission in settling these accounts and getting a right amount from those foreign Governments that belong to our people; and how in the world we can at this time dictate and determine by law just what course shall be pursued by the commission, I am unable to say. I yield to the gentleman from Tennessee.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. I did not very clearly catch the reading of the amendment offered by the gentleman from Wisconsin. Is that amendment broad enough to provide that there shall be 5 per cent interest charged on deferred interest?

Mr. FORDNEY. It provides that we shall receive not less than an average of 5 per cent. That is the substance of the amendment.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. That is on the principal?

Mr. FORDNEY. It does not say principal, but it means the obligation, because when the interest becomes due it becomes a part of the principal, in my opinion. It will have to cover the entire amount then due when the settlement is made, principal and interest. That is what I should say, although in that I might be in error.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FORDNEY. I will.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. I think in the ordinary transactions between individuals—I know it is the law in my State, and I think it is the law generally in all the States—unless compound interest is specifically provided for it can not be collected in an action at law.

Mr. FORDNEY. I think you are in error. In the State which I have the honor to represent, any obligation that bears interest annually compounds for one year at least, but not longer unless specifically provided for. Under the laws of the State a provision in a contract providing for compounding interest is unconstitutional, but if you hold a mortgage on a piece of property and the interest is payable annually, and there is a default of interest, that interest for the first year bears interest, but not after one year's time. Whether that might be the same law in the various States I do not know, but that is the law in the State of Michigan.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Will the gentleman yield further?

Mr. FORDNEY. I will yield.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. I have gained the impression, whether from the hearings or from other sources I can not for the moment recall; I do not know whether there is anything in the hearings about it, but certainly I have obtained the opinion that the representatives of the foreign Governments, in so far as this matter has been discussed, have very earnestly insisted that it would be pretty difficult for them to explain to their Governments under the practices of those Governments how they could agree to compound interest.

Mr. FORDNEY. If the gentleman will permit me right there, I am afraid my time has about expired——

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. We will try to get the gentleman more time; this is a very important matter.

Mr. FORDNEY. Mr. Davis, the Assistant Secretary of the Treasury, explained——

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has again expired.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent—how much time does the gentleman want?

Mr. FORDNEY. Five minutes.

SEVERAL MEMBERS. Take 10 minutes.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman may have 10 minutes additional.

Mr. FORDNEY. I will try to conclude in five.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Tennessee asks unanimous consent that the gentleman's time be extended 10 minutes. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. LONGWORTH. If the gentleman will yield I think——

Mr. FORDNEY. I was saying to the gentleman that Mr. Davis, then Assistant Secretary of the Treasury, made this statement to our committee, that in the deferring of these payments of interest the foreign Governments were willing to do this—that is to say, they did not want to go back to their Governments and ask authority to issue more interest-bearing obligations, but they were willing to do this, that if we would defer the payment of interest for three years at the end of three years the foreign Governments would be willing to add one-half of 1 per cent to 5 per cent, making it 5½ per cent for the first two years' interest upon all these obligations, and for the next two years 6 per cent, and for eight years, making a total of 12 years, they would pay interest at the rate of 6½ per cent, and one-half per cent at this would reimburse us for the $1,425,000,000 of interest deferred. It is 5 per cent on $9,500,000,000 for three years. That would give to our Government exactly the same amount of money, $1,425,000,000, that the interest upon interest would amount to in that length of time.

Mr. STAFFORD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FORDNEY. That arrangement was not entered into by the foreign Governments, although the foreign Governments were ready and willing at that time to agree to that sort of a plan and perhaps this commission can induce the foreign Governments to agree to something of that kind to reimburse us.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Would not then the specific answer to the question of the gentleman from Tennessee be this, that neither the existing law nor the amendment of the gentleman from Wisconsin, which practically reenacts, would permit the collection of compound interest, but only interest enough which at the end of the time would have been the full amount if paid from the beginning?

Mr. FORDNEY. Absolutely. The average interest would be not less than 5 per cent. Now, it is not the purpose of our Government to punish these people over there. It is the purpose of our people to obtain by these settlements the very best interest of the people of the United States and get what justly and equitably belongs to us. But this must be remembered, too, that in borrowing money from our people which we received from the sale of our Government bonds during the war and making these loans to foreign Governments much time elapsed between the time we received the money on our bonds and the time we made the loans, and we lost interest during the time while that money rested in the hands of the Treasury Department; and the expense in taking care of this in one way or the other means considerable and we are entitled to be reimbursed for all those expenditures.

Mr. DUNBAR. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FORDNEY. I will.

Mr. DUNBAR. The gentleman has been talking a good deal about interest. Have any negotiations been entered into between the United States Government and the Allies regarding the settlement so far as the principal is concerned?

Mr. FORDNEY. Our Government holds short-time notes—demand notes, rather—for all loans made during the war.

Mr. DUNBAR. Do the foreign Governments have any proposition to make as to what they will give for these short-time notes?

Mr. FORDNEY. They have agreed and have paid, so far as they have paid any interest, 5 per cent on all these obligations.

Mr. DUNBAR. This bill is for the purpose of refunding the debt. Have there been any negotiations that would indicate——

Mr. FORDNEY. To refund the debt, providing for long-time obligations and the rate of interest to be paid in the future, whereas the demand obligations we now hold bear various rates of interest, ranging from 3½ to 6 per cent.

Mr. DUNBAR. My question does not concern itself so much about the interest as it does with the assumption of obligations in some tangible form by our allies.

Mr. FORDNEY. In taking the long-time obligations there must be a provision relating to the interest, and as short-time obligations, as I have said, bear various rates of interest, we want to settle upon a final rate, and provided for in the long-time obligation.

Mr. DUNBAR. Has there been any negotiations between the United States and her allies regarding the settlement to be made as to the principal of the debt?

Mr. FORDNEY. The principal is provided for by law. There is no question about that. There is no question about the amount they owe us. They are ready and willing to give us their long-time obligations if we will only send representatives there authorized to take those long-time obligations.

Mr. DUNBAR. What are these long-time obligations they propose to give us?

Mr. FORDNEY. I do not know, but the law provides the year 1938.

Mr. DUNBAR. Does not the gentleman believe that a knowledge of what these long-term obligations are would have considerable influence in our voting for this bill?

Mr. FORDNEY. Very likely. But I am not ready to tie the hands of the commission right now and say something that I do not know anything about. I do not know whether it would be advisable to take a short-time obligation from some of those bankrupt nations over there and know that they would not be paid when due or take long-time obligations. If I were to settle those claims, if I were sent there to represent the people, I would not want you to tie my hands in meeting such conditions as confronted me.

I have confidence in the President of the United States and the Secretary of the Treasury, and I have confidence especially when there is a commission of four men added to the Secretary of the Treasury, making a total of five. When we made the loans without any restrictions whatever upon the Secretary of the Treasury we had confidence in our Secretary of the Treasury, by and with the advice and consent of the President, to make the loans. Have you no more faith in the Republican representatives in the same position that the Democrats were in?

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. As I understand the gentleman from Michigan, notwithstanding he thinks the proposed amendment is better than the one that was suggested at our last meeting, he thinks this amendment ought to be voted down?

Mr. FORDNEY. I do.

Mr. KNUTSON. Has any understanding ever been had between this Government and foreign countries as to the rate of interest to be paid on the indebtedness?

Mr. FORDNEY. Yes; and they have paid 5 per cent interest, as far as they have paid any interest. They have already paid as far as they had money to pay with, and they paid 5 per cent, although the obligation only called for 3½ per cent.

Mr. TINKHAM. Was there any evidence given by the Secretary of the Treasury that there had been any negotiations, either by word of mouth or in writing, concerning the funding of the debt and the payment of interest?

Mr. FORDNEY. The Secretary of the Treasury takes the position that they have no authority to convert those short-time obligations into long-time obligations.

Mr. TINKHAM. Mr. Chairman, that is not an answer.

Mr. FORDNEY. Perhaps I did not understand the gentleman.

Mr. TINKHAM. My question was, Did the Secretary of the Treasury indicate in any way to the committee that in any way, either by word of mouth or in writing, any negotiations had been entered into with any foreign Governments concerning refunding of that interest?

Mr. FORDNEY. He determined that they have no authority to do anything of that kind, and they are asking for it by the adoption of this bill.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. Would it be possible, if this Frear amendment is adopted, for us to be attempting to procure from the foreign Governments, or any of them, more interest than we are paying on the Liberty loans for the money we are using?

Mr. FORDNEY. We are now. The interest they have paid is greater than what we paid to our people.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. That hardly was the spirit of the original notes, was it? It was intended originally they should pay as much as it cost us, and no more.

Mr. FORDNEY. They agreed to pay 5 per cent, and have been paying it, and are willing to pay it. Mr. Chairman, I now insert at this point a letter handed me by my good friend Congressman MADDEN, written by John G. Shedd, president of Marshall Field & Co.

JOHN G. SHEDD, PRESIDENT OF MARSHALL FIELD & CO., REPLIES TO CONGRESSMAN FORDNEY'S ATTACK ON THE FIRM'S ATTITUDE TOWARD THE FORDNEY TARIFF BILL.

Our attention has been directed to published statements said to have been made in Congress last Tuesday by Representative FORDNEY, of Michigan, to the effect that Marshall Field & Co. is opposed to the American valuation plan in the Fordney tariff bill because of its large purchases in Germany and Japan.

In 1909 newspapers quoted Mr. FORDNEY as stating definitely that we owned hosiery factories in Japan. We wrote Mr. FORDNEY denying this. At the same time there was read into the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of April 10, 1909, page 1080, an affidavit made by us in which we stated that we had no financial interest in foreign factories.

Again, in 1913, Mr. FORDNEY stated at a hearing before the Ways and Means Committee that we had not answered his inquiry as to whether we were interested in factories in Japan. We wired denial to Congressman RAINEY, of the Ways and Means Committee, on January 22, 1913.

Mr. FORDNEY evidently has a poor, or convenient, memory, as on October 18, 1921, he again declared that Marshall Field & Co. buys the entire production of factories in these countries in order to get the benefit of cheap foreign labor; that it spends millions of dollars in Chemnitz, Germany, and in Japan for goods that it sells to American citizens; that it buys the entire product of not one but many mills in Germany making hosiery and knit goods; that it buys the entire product of knit underwear and hosiery of four factories in Japan.

With due respect to the position of Congressman FORDNEY, chairman of the Ways and Means Committee of the House of Representatives, we can not permit such repeated misrepresentations to go unchallenged.

Marshall Field & Co. has not bought the entire product of German hosiery or knit goods mills and has never bought or made hosiery or knit underwear in Japan.

In the year 1920 we did the largest volume of business in our history. In that year we paid for goods made in Germany less than one-half of 1 per cent of our volume of business and for goods made in Japan less than 1 per cent. In fact, all the money paid for goods made in all foreign countries, including commodities on which there is no duty assessed, constituted considerably less than 10 per cent of our entire business.

We have buying offices in the principal markets of the world and are constantly seeking the novel productions of foreign labor which has not been produced in this country.

Mr. FORDNEY asks, "Why not employ people at home and pay their money here?"

We are manufacturers in America on a large scale, owning and operating domestic manufacturing enterprises in seven States, having in the neighborhood of 17,000 American citizens on our manufacturing and distributing pay roll. The products of our mills include silks, carpets, rugs, sheetings, sheets, pillow cases, comforters, ginghams, outings, bedspreads, wool and cotton blankets, knit underwear, laces, lace curtains, handkerchiefs, towels, crochet and embroidery cottons, threads, yarns, cotton damask, burlap bags, cotton batts, men's and boy's clothing, perfumes and toilet goods, and many other articles that go into consumption in our country. We are probably the largest buyer and distributor of textile production of American labor. We import cotton yarns, China cotton, and burlap and manufacture them in this country into laces, curtains, blankets, burlap bags, etc., giving employment to hundreds of American workers in this country. Our entire capital is invested in America.

Our experience in buying and distributing merchandise for more than 50 years convinces us that the practical and successful method of assessing duties in vogue for over 100 years should not be discarded for a theoretical, untried, and impractical plan that will inevitably increase the cost of living to the already overburdened consumer, and, in our judgment, bring disastrous results to the United States. We have therefore felt it our duty and right to express our opinion to Congress, to the press, and to the merchants of the country that they might realize its danger.

Mr. Chairman, if this company imports such small quantities of foreign-made goods, why are they so vigorously opposing the American valuation provision of our new tariff law? I do not wish to do an injustice to anyone. I am happy to insert Mr. Shedd's letter, and if I am incorrect will most humbly apologize, but have been somewhat misquoted.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, let us get clear in our minds this matter of the payment of interest. There have been no interest payments on the foreign debt up to this time of any considerable amount by any nation out of their own funds. Some of our foreign debtors have left in the Treasury a portion of the allotments and loans made to them, with a view of meeting accrued interest on foreign loans. Whatever payment of interest there has been has been out of funds we furnished. Remember that. Now, Mr. Chairman, I rather regret I can not agree with any of these suggestions for fixing or attempting to fix an interest rate. I admit the gentleman from Wisconsin presented some rather forceful arguments in favor of an attempt to do that. Perhaps the best argument in favor of an attempt at fixing interest rates by Congress is that by fixing the minimum rate we shall relieve the commissioners to a certain extent from importuning and embarrassment. But the gentleman from Wisconsin himself will now admit that the amendment he first suggested, if not absolutely unworkable, would be so difficult of administration as to render it clearly unwise to adopt it.

The interest rates fixed or suggested by the statutes under which the various loans were made vary considerably, and under the gentleman's amendment we might charge England 3½ per cent and Czechoslovakia 5 per cent, though I am quite certain the gentleman from Wisconsin would not want to do that.

Mr. FREAR. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MONDELL. Yes.

Mr. FREAR. The gentleman refers to the first amendment now?

Mr. MONDELL. Yes; the first amendment the gentleman offered. The chairman of the committee [Mr. FORDNEY] has discussed the matter of interest with the Secretary of the Treasury, and the Secretary, who prefers that there shall be no interest rate fixed, suggested that if there must be one he preferred an amendment such as has just been offered by the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. FREAR] rather than the amendment offered by the gentleman from Wisconsin in the first instance. But the Secretary can not, it occurs to me, be favorable to such an amendment.

I can not believe that he gave the effect of such an amendment careful consideration; and while suggestions from the Treasury Department and the Secretary of the Treasury are persuasive with me, they are not conclusive by any manner of means.

What is the situation? Europe, now in serious financial straits, owes us vast sums. So far as Great Britain is concerned, I think there can be no doubt of her ability to meet her obligations, or of the fact that she will do so. With regard to France, our next largest debtor, her financial situation is not so favorable. France will, I fear, have a very hard time of it in meeting her obligations. As to some of the countries heavily indebted to us, it seems quite clear they can not pay us much of anything now. I do not pretend to know just when they may be able to pay.

I am one of those who have believed and said that we should approach this entire matter without any other thought than that we should eventually receive the total of the principal of the sums the countries of Europe owe us.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Wyoming has expired.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that I may proceed for 10 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the gentleman's request?

There was no objection.

Mr. MONDELL. These debts should be paid, and, so far as the sums due us from the major powers of Europe are concerned, I have no doubt they will be paid. And yet, taking that view of it, we must admit that if we did enter the war, as it has been said we did, to save civilization, we were a little tardy in getting in, and the money that was loaned was for the saving and perhaps did save civilization.

However, notwithstanding the fact that these loans were a contribution to the saving of civilization, we made enormous contributions on our own account in men and money, and I think these obligations should be met, and I think the nations of Europe are prepared to meet them.

When we come to the question of interest, I am of the opinion that the provisions of this bill are quite sufficient as a guide to the commission. The interest rate shall be such—page 2, lines 15 and 16—"as shall be deemed for the best interest of the United States of America."

Who is going to make this settlement? In the last analysis, as Uncle JOE CANNON would say, the President of the United States; for whatever is done by this commission under section 2 is done with the approval of the President. When it is all done by these five men appointed by the President and confirmed by the Senate, representing, I hope, the minority as well as the majority, the President will finally pass upon all the questions involved.

Just how can we now wisely determine the question as to what the interest rates should be? Under the amendment that has been offered, perhaps the Secretary of the Treasury had in mind a reduction of the interest rate in certain cases, possibly at the beginning of the period of the loan, with an increase of rate as time passes. That could be done under the amendment. The loan could begin at 3½ and close at 7. It may be that in the case of some of these obligations the interest rate ought to be as low as 3½ per cent. I do not know. But I do not believe we should put ourselves in the position of holding the obligations of friendly foreign nations with an interest rate that may run as high as 6 or 7 or 8 per cent in the latter years of the loan.

Well, gentlemen say you can come back to Congress and have that all adjusted. That is the trouble now. If former Secretaries of the Treasury had performed their full duty under the law, it would not be necessary for the Congress to be considering this question now at all.

The entire matter would have been settled long since. It is only because former Secretaries under the last administration failed to perform their whole duty under the law that this question is now before us, for the law provided specifically what should be done and how it should be done, and under the law a large portion of these obligations would have had an interest rate of 3½ per cent.

If the world ever gets back to normal, or to what has been considered normal in the past, the obligations of solvent powers will sell at par bearing a rate as low as 3 per cent or 3½ per cent. That was the situation prior to the war, and there is no reason why it may not be the situation 3 or 4 or 5 or 10 or 15 years from now. I doubt the wisdom of a provision that under no circumstances shall the interest charged in the aggregate be less than 5 per cent. I believe we can well leave this whole matter to the discretion of the President and the commissioners, so far as interest rates are concerned, in the expectation and belief that they will make such arrangements touching the interest on these foreign debts, foreign obligations due us, as shall be deemed by them to be for the best interests of the United States of America. I doubt if they will decide that our interests or fairness and justice demand so high a rate as 5 per cent in all cases.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MONDELL. It may be necessary to be very lenient with some of these debtors, some of the smaller countries of Europe, in the matter of interest charges. I think it is very unwise to lay down a hard-and-fast rule touching this matter.

Now I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Does not the gentleman believe that if we adopt this amendment, which provides that the total interest received shall not be less than an amount equal to the interest at the rate of 5 per cent that fact shall preclude the charging of interest at a higher rate than 5 per cent on the principal?

Mr. MONDELL. Well, from my reading of the amendment I was under the impression that it would authorize an interest charge beginning at a lower rate than 5 per cent and rising to a rate above 5 per cent, provided the total interest for the period during which the obligation ran would amount to 5 per cent.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. If we limit the interest rate to 5 per cent, of course it will never exceed 5 per cent, will it?

Mr. MONDELL. I think it might be more than 5 per cent under this provision.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. In practical effect?

Mr. MONDELL. It says that it shall not be less than 5 per cent in the aggregate. I think it might begin at a lower rate and run to a much higher rate.

Some gentleman may deem it wise for us to demand the last ounce of the pound of flesh, but I doubt it. I think we should insist on the payment of the principal. I think it is fair and just and reasonable that we should do so; but if we are to have these obligations funded in such a way that it will be possible for some of the lesser powers to meet their obligations, there must be a good deal of leeway left the commission and particularly in the matter of interest charges. The gentlemen operating under this act must have a very considerable amount of discretion. There is little doubt with regard to the interest rates on the major portion of the obligations.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. MONDELL. May I have one minute more, Mr. Chairman?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman asks an extension of one minute. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. MONDELL. The very fact that the Secretary of the Treasury suggested the amendment before us as a possible substitute for the amendment heretofore proposed indicates that he has it in his mind to charge at least an interest rate that will meet all the expenditures and obligations of the American people under these loans. I think the very fact of his making the suggestion warrants us in the belief that there will be no disposition to reduce the interest rate below a figure that will return to the United States her outlay on these loans; and if we are compensated in the amount these loans have and shall cost the American people, I think that is quite enough. We certainly do not desire to make a profit on the transaction. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. COLLIER].

Mr. COLLIER. Mr. Chairman, I offer a substitute for the amendment offered by the gentleman from Wisconsin.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Mississippi offers a substitute for the amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Substitute offered by Mr. COLLIER for the amendment offered by Mr. FREAR: Page 1, line 10, after the word "authorized," insert:
"To enter into agreements with representatives of foreign nations."
On page 2, at the end of section 2, insert:
"Provided, That no agreement or agreements so entered into with respect to any matter herein authorized shall be deemed to have been completed nor to have force and effect until it shall have been submitted to the Congress of the United States and embodied in a law passed by Congress."

Mr. LONGWORTH. Mr. Chairman, I reserve a point of order that that is not properly a substitute for the amendment of the gentleman from Wisconsin.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio reserves the point of order.

Mr. COLLIER. I do not care to discuss the point of order.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Then I will make the point of order.

Mr. COLLIER. I should like to discuss the amendment.

Mr. COCKRAN. I hope the gentleman from Ohio will give the gentleman from Mississippi an opportunity to be heard on the merits of his amendment.

Mr. LONGWORTH. I said I would reserve the point of order, and of course I shall be glad to do so if the gentleman desires it.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will recognize the gentleman from Mississippi on the reservation, if he desires to be recognized.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Certainly.

Mr. COLLIER. I understood the gentleman from Ohio had made the point of order.

Mr. LONGWORTH. I understood the gentleman to say that he did not care to debate it. Of course, I shall be very glad to reserve the point of order.

Mr. COLLIER. The gentleman misunderstood me. I do not care to debate the question whether this is in order, but I do want to debate the merits of the proposal.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman is recognized to discuss the amendment.

Mr. COLLIER. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen, this amendment seeks to restore in a way the limitations which existing law throws around the refunding of these obligations. The present bill destroys all the limitations, all the safeguards, that the Liberty loan act of 1917 throws around the refunding of these obligations.

The reason I offer this as a substitute is that if this amendment be adopted then there will be no use for the amendment offered by the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. FREAR], because if the amendment which I have offered be adopted then we may give this authority either to the Secretary of the Treasury or to a committee. We may give them blanket authority to enter into negotiations with these foreign Governments, or to make such arrangement as they deem best in reference to interest, in reference to the length of time when these payments are to be made, because the arrangements that they make are not final, but will have to be sent back to Congress for review and revision.

The position taken by the minority from the start is that there is no need for this bill, that the bill now before the House seeks to take the place of an existing law which has thrown every safeguard possible around the refunding of these obligations. This existing law has determined and limited the amount of interest to be paid upon these bonds, for the Liberty loan acts have determined and fixed the duration of those bonds by having them expire at the same time when the Liberty loan bonds issued in the United States expire. All that this amendment seeks to do is to have the Congress finally pass upon the agreements made by our representatives with the agents of the foreign Governments.

Mr. J. M. NELSON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COLLIER. I yield to the gentleman from Wisconsin.

Mr. J. M. NELSON. I wish the gentleman would tell us what proportion of these obligations are payable on demand. I can not reconcile statements made on the floor of the House. Some gentlemen say they are all payable on demand and others say not.

Mr. COLLIER. What is payable on demand?

Mr. J. M. NELSON. These obligations.

Mr. COLLIER. If the gentleman will read the Liberty loan acts he will find that in those acts the Secretary of the Treasury was instructed to purchase at par the obligations of the foreign Governments and to accept from them obligations in all their essentials bearing a resemblance to the bonds that were issued in the United States in order to get the money for them.

Mr. J. M. NELSON. Do I understand that the periods are all now fixed on these loans and that there are no demand obligations?

Mr. COLLIER. The periods of time for which the obligations are to run, I think, are fixed by existing law. That is the position I take.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, I would recommend gentlemen on the other side the following amendment, which would have practically the same effect as the one offered by the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. COLLIER], and apparently answer all their purposes. I would recommend an amendment striking out all after the enacting clause creating a commission composed of five errand boys who would be authorized to go to Europe, receive whatever proposals were made by European Governments, and hand them back to the Congress. That is the practical effect of the amendment of the gentleman from Mississippi. It will reduce the commission to a nonentity without any power.

Mr. LAYTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Yes.

Mr. LAYTON. Does the gentleman think that in a matter of this magnitude, involving $11,000,000,000, which even the little children of this country are interested in, does he think that this body should abdicate its functions and place them in the hands of five men? I do not.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. The gentleman from Iowa thinks nothing of the kind. It is the first time in the history of any nation of any importance that settlements of matters in dispute, settlement of debts difficult of collection, settlement of matters belonging to the Treasury, have been undertaken by a legislative body. So we are not abdicating our functions in the least when we undertake anything of that kind. Let me proceed a little further. Some gentlemen think that you are going to get more money in the manner undertaken here, but I will tell you now that you are simply fixing things so that you will never get a nickel on a large portion of these obligations by undertaking to say that you will not concede anything, you will yield nothing, but will insist on the last penny and the extreme rate of interest.

Mr. DUNBAR. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Yes.

Mr. DUNBAR. Are there any of these obligations in dispute? England owes us $5,000,000,000; is that in dispute?

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. There is no dispute about that. If the gentleman will look into the matter, he will find that there is a dispute as to the amount due on sales that have been made.

Mr. DUNBAR. That is a small portion of the bill; what we are interested in is the money borrowed by European nations. If that is in dispute, we have not been so informed.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Nobody has claimed that that was in dispute, but there conditions have arisen which make an adjustment necessary. As I said on last Friday, some of these nations can pay in the future; not one of them can pay to-day the principal amount or part of the interest. Some can pay later on. There are some of them that are in a condition of bankruptcy to-day. If I held a debt against a bankrupt, or went out as a lawyer to collect it, would I insist on the last penny? Would I want to go out without authority to yield anything to him? He would throw up his hands in despair and say he never could pay it, and what was the use. That is the position some gentlemen want us to take in collection of the debt.

Mr. DUNBAR. France, Great Britain, and Italy owe in principal and interest over $10,000,000,000 of the $11,000,000,000 that are owed us by European countries. Does the gentleman believe that either of these three nations are bankrupt?

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Does the gentleman know the condition of Italy?

Mr. DUNBAR. I will say that I believe that Italy is bankrupt. I do not believe that England will ever pay her debt, and she never expects to pay the principal. What we should do, and do quickly, not in three years' time, is to provide in the bill——

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. If my friend wants to make a speech I will aid him in getting time, but I do not want to yield too much time now.

Mr. LAYTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Yes.

Mr. LAYTON. Where is the objection to this Congress, assuming it to be an intelligent body of men, sitting in final judgment of the facts ascertained by the commission in each case?

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Does the gentleman think that a commission will be of any use whatever? Some gentlemen have said that this commission was liable to give away a portion of the debt. If so, I do not want to hear anything from them. Some gentlemen have said that the commission would deliberately act contrary to the interests of the country. If so, I do not want to hear any further from them.

Mr. LAYTON. Whether they propose to give away a part of the debt or remit a portion of the interest, let the Congress of the United States say what it will do.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. If that is the way to treat a debt of this kind, it is something new to a lawyer who has spent a considerable part of his life in collecting hard debts.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Yes.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Is it not a fact that the agents of foreign Governments have to report back to their Governments before they can get final action?

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. No.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Why not?

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Because they proceed in a more sensible way. They have authority to say to the other Governments, If you do this we will do that, and that is the only way you can get an advantageous settlement of the matter. These nations are struggling to-day to get money enough to carry on the administrations. Many of them are not able to raise money enough to pay the current expenses. Proceed in the way you are proposing, and as to a large portion of these debts you will never get anything. Here are nations who fought side by side with us, like Belgium, which held back the Germans at the beginning of the struggle, nations like France, giving the lives of a million men to save the civilization of the world. They have exhausted their resources. In some cases the very existence of their Governments is threatened by reason of their financial condition. Are we going out now and say to them that we have appointed a commission that will exact the last penny from them and then make no concessions whatever? Are we to say to them that we will make no terms, that we will authorize this commission to make no concessions as to the time of payment or as to the rates of interest? We have already put in the bill a provision that no portion of the debt can be canceled, and now what more do you want? Gentleman, if you proceed in this manner we might just as well dispense with this commission entirely, for it will be of no use whatever and it could be of no benefit. The Secretary of the Treasury can receive proposals from these foreign Governments at any time now. The commission would be utterly worthless.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Iowa has expired.

Mr. COCKRAN. Mr. Chairman, I may have to ask the indulgence of the committee for an extension of time, because I hope to present an aspect of this matter which can not be discussed in five minutes and which, though, so far as I know, it has not yet been discussed, is fraught with the utmost importance, not merely to this country but to the whole world. We are dealing now with a situation that has never before faced any civilized society. Like every other question which has arisen in the extraordinary times through which we are passing, this one is obscured and embarrassed by the necessity of employing a terminology which was developed under totally different conditions. When we apply to the problem of dealing with the enormous debts due to this country by foreign nations, principles which have governed debts due by Governments to private individuals, we are in grave danger of being betrayed into grievously erroneous conclusions.

National debts are of comparatively recent origin. Hitherto they have been due to individuals. Never before has a debt—a stupendous debt—existed where several nations were the debtors and one other nation the creditor. This creates a position of surpassing and overshadowing difficulty. It is one for which no parallel or precedent can be found in all the past experience of mankind, and therefore one which I think ought to be approached in a spirit of the purest patriotism, without the slightest tinge of political partisanship or prejudice.

National debts may be said to have begun at the close of the seventeenth century, when King William III, in the era of momentous military enterprises, found himself at variance with his Parliament. He could not undertake to raise money after the methods invoked by Charles I, because to do that it had been shown would cost the King his head. And so the idea of borrowing money on a systematic or comprehensive plan was evolved out of the necessities of the King, who was contemplating a war on the Continent.

The first attempt was something in the nature of a gamble or lottery. It was what we would call nowadays a kind of tontine life policy. A number of persons were invited to subscribe; I think it was £100 each. As one died a certain proportion of the fund went to the survivors and the rest to the Crown. But these methods were found very inadequate, when—I think it was in 1694—a Scotchman named William Thompson appeared in London and proposed that he would loan to the Crown £1,200,000 in return for a charter authorizing him to do a banking business and to issue paper money against this debt, on which the Government was to pay 8 per cent interest, a very moderate rate at that time.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COCKRAN. Yes.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Was it William Thompson or William Patterson?

Mr. COCKRAN. Did I say Thompson? It was Patterson. I thank the gentleman for his correction. I meant William Patterson. The amount was raised by public subscription—the whole of it paid into the Treasury before the period fixed for the first installment. The charter was issued to the "governor and the company of the Bank of England," and out of that transaction may be said to have arisen the entire financial system of modern times. That debt never has been paid, but it has been increased at various intervals. The bank has always exercised the right to issue its own notes for an amount equal to the debt owed it by the Government. All its other promises to pay, at least until the last war—I do not know what changes in its system may have occurred under the stress of that emergency—being covered and balanced by actual bullion held in its vaults.

Mr. Chairman, the system of borrowing money by Governments thus established has spread all over the world. But, remember, until now it has always been the Government, that is to say, the sovereign that has asked and accepted advances from his subjects, which he promises to repay. There was no abasement of sovereignty in that transaction. The sovereign had always accepted loans from his subjects, even when he tried to force moneys from them, without the consent of Parliament; he always called these levies "benevolences," thus giving them the name at least of voluntary advances, even when they were anything but voluntary in fact. A Government could always afford to borrow money, because the sovereign could not be sued. He could not be compelled to pay principal or interest. There was no tribunal before which he could be haled, and, therefore, when he borrowed money there was no impairment or abasement of his sovereignty whatever. Nobody could call him to account. His honor might be tarnished, but his sovereignty was in no way compromised. If the loan were floated in foreign countries and money raised in them, those foreign citizens or subjects who advanced it placed themselves in the position of his own subjects. They were equally without power to compel payment of the debt, or even to sue for it, and thus we see that raising of a loan by Government involved no surrender of sovereignty.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from New York has expired.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the time of the gentleman may be extended for 15 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

Mr. BLACK. Mr. Chairman, reserving the right to object, I shall not object at this time, but I shall to any further extension of time, because I have an amendment which I think is in order, and I presume that a substitute will be offered later on and that debate will follow.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. COCKRAN. Mr. Chairman, we are now confronted by a very different condition. For the first time in its history the world now faces the necessity of dealing with an enormous debt due by sovereigns where the creditor is also a sovereign. Here is the momentous feature of our situation and of the situation in which the debtor Governments find themselves that I think this House should very carefully consider.

What is the true, ultimate significance of this condition without precedent in human experience, where a debt of unparalleled magnitude oppresses the energies of men everywhere and the debtors and the creditor are all sovereigns. Is such a relationship possible without the gravest danger of disturbance and disaster?

Conceive its possibilities. We are the creditor of countries which, we are told here, can not possibly pay even a fraction of the interest that is due. Practically all of them are maintaining huge military establishments; some of them are maintaining military establishments and maintaining practically nothing else. If we are their creditors in the ordinary sense of the relationship we have a right—is it not, in fact, our duty—to step in and say to those debtor nations: "You have no right to waste your resources in such unproductive—not to say destructive—enterprises, because in doing so you are impairing the security of our debt." But the moment we did that we would have invaded their sovereignty, and they, to defend that sovereignty, would be bound to repudiate our interference. Thus, we may see our debt jeopardized and perhaps destroyed. Yet if we are to respect the integrity of those very sovereignties whose integrity we entered the war to defend and sustain, we must be content to remain passive spectators while the security of our property is in process of destruction. What remedy can there be for that condition? There is none that I can suggest. There is none that mortal man can suggest. For the situation is absolutely unprecedented.

But this much surely is clear—every step we take must be governed by realization of the fact that at this time a mistaken ill-judged, intemperate act or word might kindle a flame that would enwrap the world in a conflagration which must reduce our civilization to hopeless ruin.

Mr. Chairman, it must be remembered that if we should undertake to compel regard for our interests as a creditor against some action or policy of a nation indebted to us that we might consider dangerous to the security of our debt, there is but one way in which we could do it, and that is by force of arms. Surely it is no exaggeration to say that we have here a condition pregnant with disaster to all the world, a condition the like of which never before confronted human beings and which therefore demands the utmost prudence in dealing with it on our part.

On the other hand, we can not and we should not forget the fact that, in addition to the enormous expenditures which we have incurred to make this war a success, we have advanced to these countries the enormous sum of $11,000,000,000. And it is our sworn duty to protect the interests of this country in that stupendous debt where lies the path of duty leading to peace and good will and effective industrial cooperation between nations with this unexampled difficulty to face and overcome.

Mr. Chairman, our own debt is of staggering proportions. The debts of these other countries are so large that there is grave reason to doubt whether any of them can be paid. Some gentlemen have said that certain countries are insolvent and that others are not. If every debtor country should undertake to pay the obligations now due us they would all be insolvent, and since they can not meet their obligations they are actually insolvent if we are to measure solvency by the usual standards.

But while the difficulty these conditions create is enormous it is by no means insuperable. It may, indeed, open the way to a future of progress and prosperity greater than the world has ever known.

There is one feature about national debts running through all history since they became elements of civilized society which ought to be reassuring in these days of doubt and perplexity. It is this: As they have risen in volume so always has the prosperity of the countries that contracted them. After the peace of Utrecht England's debt was £50,000,000, and then it was believed and stated by some men considered among the wisest of their time that it was a burden that must permanently cripple the body politic. After the wars of the Austrian succession the debt rose to £80,000,000, and then men of the highest repute, including Tobias Smallet, in his history of England, declared her case to be desperate. And after the vigorous and memorable administration of the elder Pitt when the debt had risen to £140,000,000 the very wisest men of England were declaring it was impossible to bear that obligation and remain solvent. Even David Hume, one of the most profound philosophers and accomplished economists of his generation, declared it would have been better if England had been conquered in war than saddled with such a debt. And Adam Smith, while he did not absolutely despair of the future, yet said, in his Wealth of Nations, that the extreme limit had been reached; any increase would be fatal. It was because the English people were universally convinced that it was absolutely necessary to obtain aid from the colonies in order to meet those burdens that the attempt to tax them was undertaken. That attempt resulted not merely in failure, but it piled £100,000,000 more on the debt, and then it was almost universally conceded that the very end had been reached and that hopeless bankruptcy was inevitable. But in a few years the expenses of the French revolutionary wars raised the debt to £800,000,000; and, extraordinary to relate, after each of these tremendous increases of national expenditures and of the debts contracted to meet them the country instead of sinking in the mire rose by leaps and bounds to prosperity greater than had ever been known. In the light of all history I can not feel that these great debts are necessarily causes of despair. As I have already said, it is well within the range, not merely of possibility but of probability, that we may emerge from those conditions of difficulty and doubt to a prosperity greater than the world has ever known. But to do this we must see that some definite advantage is gained by mankind commensurate with the extent of the sacrifices they have made and the greater sacrifices they may be required to make.

The wars of the French Revolution, which left England with a debt of £800,000,000, inflicted still more extensive burdens and inflicted much greater losses on all other European countries. But it wrought benefits which more than compensated for the sacrifices it entailed. By it men gained access to the soil on which they lived. The survival of old feudal systems made it impossible to purchase land. These were all swept away, and that liberation was followed by the wonderful progress of the nineteenth century, when the productive power of human hands was reinforced by a succession of inventions which wrought such improvement in conditions of human existence as a previous generation could not have conceived. The expenditures and the waste of the last war are vastly greater than any ever waged on this earth. This debt due to us by England as compared with her entire debt at the close of the French Revolutionary war is as eleven billions to four. And this is but a small fraction of her total debt. Our own debts have mounted up till they reached the stupendous figures of twenty to thirty billion dollars. The debts of other countries have piled up to a degree that it is hardly possible even to compute. And yet, if the result of all this terrible experience should be universal disarmament, not limitation of armaments, but actual disarmament—complete, universal, and immediate—the reduction of all military establishments to the point necessary to maintain domestic peace, this expenditure of money, vast though it has been, the loss of life and the injury to private property, which were still more distressing features of the dreadful conflict, would prove to be the wisest investment of money, the grandest enterprise of which the world has ever been the theater. It would make the war itself, not a scourge laid by an angry Providence on a world that had forfeited His favor, but a merciful dispensation of a beneficent God to lift humanity to the highest plane it had ever reached.

Now, this brings me to my conclusion. I believe these enormous debts due us should be treated by this country as the greatest forces to show men that they must disarm, that they can not continue to maintain huge armaments and at the same time meet these obligations. And the moment they show willingness to disband their military forces, then we should by our treatment of these debts and by every other means in our power aid them to restore their industrial prosperity.

There may be some Governments willing to ignore their obligations to us. I doubt it, but even if there should be the fact that they have at one time acknowledged the debts by issuing their obligations could not fail to lend great weight to representations by this country in favor of disarmament. But there is one country that certainly can never dispute an obligation which she has once issued. England's greatness depends entirely upon her reputation for commercial probity. She was not the leading country of the world when the Bank of England was established about the same time that the system of coinage established on the advice of Locke and Newton assured every man who deposited a thousand pounds in an English bank, that he would get it back in money of precisely the same value. It was this reputation for commercial probity that made her the depository of the money of the whole world. And it was from the profits of banking that she was able to finance the wars against revolutionary France. And when in the middle of the last century by a system of war trade she made the whole world the unobstructed source of raw materials for her factories she established that extraordinary position throughout the world which one of her poets characteristically described when he sang:

> Set in these stormy Northern Seas,
> Queen of these restless fields of trade,
> England, what shall men say of thee
> At whose feet the worlds divide?

The world has for many years divided at the feet of England, not because of her fleets or her armies but because her commercial probity has never been questioned, and I believe, no matter what might be her disposition, she can not afford to ignore any demands that may be made on her to meet an obligation. Her debt to us may therefore be a factor of enormous weight in effecting disarmament if our Government uses the position of creditor to induce England to join us in ridding the world of the dreadful curse of military establishment. But this enormous power which may be exercised by this fund I do not want intrusted to any hands but the hands of Congress, where the Constitution places it. By the pending bill you intrust to this commission the power practically to abolish these enormous debts, because the right to fix the rate of interest carries with it the right to determine the character of the debt itself. That is a power with which angels could not be trusted. If you should put it in the hands of angels you would soon find it was being exercised by the hands of devils. Methods of corruption are so subtle and extensive that to bestow such a power on any limited number of human beings would be almost certain to bring scandal on the Government and profound discontent on the country. There is no occasion for giving such power to a small commission when we have here a body which will be as generous as the most generous, just as the most just, patriotic as the most patriotic, humane to the degree required by the utmost requirements of humanity.

I do not want to fix at this time the rate of interest prescribed by the amendment. There is no more sacredness in 5 per cent than in any other rate. And therefore there is no reason for making that rate permanent. But if this resolution proposed by the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. COLLIER] is not adopted, there will be no limitation at all on the power of the commission. I would not——

Mr. LONGWORTH. I want to call the attention of the gentleman to the fact that none of the acts of this commission are in force and effect unless approved by the President.

Mr. COCKRAN. I am not willing to put this power in the hands of the President, for the reason that the founders of the Constitution put it in the hands of this body after the fullest discussion.

It may be that in time a rate of even 3 per cent would be excessive. It may be, on the other hand, that 8 or 9 per cent would be reasonable. But whatever rate of interest may be finally fixed on we can not refuse to retain in our hands the final determination of what should be done with this enormous fund without being recreant to our oath of office. We are appointed to control the public purse. We can not trust that control to anybody else and remain loyal to our duty. But apart from all technical constitutional provisions, I believe the policy of statesmanship, of humanity, and of patriotism requires us to keep the final power to deal with this debt in our own hands. We surely will not write ourselves down incapable of acting with discretion and prudence and even with generosity in this matter of supreme moment. I appeal to the Republican majority to assert the dignity of the Congress it controls, not merely to make our own position more exalted, but to perform our duty in a manner which will redound to the credit and prosperity of this country and contribute immeasurably to the welfare of the whole human race. [Loud applause.]

Mr. BLACK. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that the debate on the point of order is exhausted. I have no objection at all to the discussion proceeding indefinitely, but I would like to get an amendment that is in order before the House.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair understands the gentleman demands the regular order. Does the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. LONGWORTH] press his point of order?

Mr. LONGWORTH. I am willing to reserve it until especially the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. GARRETT] may express his opinion. I am clearly of the opinion that the substitute is not in order, but I also maintain, Mr. Chairman, that debate of the reservation of the point of order is under the five-minute rule, and gentlemen may obtain the floor by making an amendment to strike out the last word, or a similar motion.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state for the information of the committeee that if a gentleman demands the regular order, where the reservation of a point of order to an amendment is pending before the committee——

Mr. BLACK. I reserve the demand for the regular order to make this statement.

The CHAIRMAN. Allow the Chair to make this statement. It is necessary then for the person who reserves the point of order to make that reservation of the point of order.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Do I understand the Chair to rule that debate on the reservation of the point of order is by unanimous consent?

The CHAIRMAN. The debate on a reservation of a point of order is by unanimous consent, and it is within the privilege of any member of the committee at any time to demand the regular order, when it is incumbent on the member who has made the point of order to either withdraw the point of order or make it. I understand the gentleman from Texas makes the point of order, and the Chair is inquiring of the gentleman from Ohio whether he desires to withdraw the point of order or make it.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. I make the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Washington makes the point of order. Does the gentleman from Ohio withdraw the point of order or make it?

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LONGWORTH. Yes.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Does the gentleman make the point of order that it is not germane to the amendment?

Mr. LONGWORTH. For the moment I am simply making the point of order that it is not offered properly as a substitute for the amendment of the gentleman from Wisconsin. I am not now making the point of order that, if offered to the body of the bill, it may not be germane. I will reserve that to a later period. I submit now, Mr. Chairman, that the amendment of the gentleman from Wisconsin relates to specific authority already granted under the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is ready to rule. The amendment of the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. FREAR] provides that "the total amount of interest payable on any such obligation received hereunder shall not be less than an amount equal to interest on the principal thereof at the rate of 5 per cent per annum." The object of the amendment of the gentleman from Wisconsin is for the sole purpose of restricting the discretion of the commission as to the interest arrangements that may be entered into. The substitute offered by the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. COLLIER] goes much further. In fact, it makes no reference whatsoever to the purport, directly or indirectly, of the amendment of the gentleman from Wisconsin. It relates to agreements that may be entered into. It has a much broader scope than the pending amendment. In fact, it has no relation to it except in a very distant degree, and therefore it can not be considered a substitute, and the Chair sustains the point of order.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

The committee informally rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, a message from the Senate, by Mr. Craven, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had passed bill of the following title, in which the concurrence of the House of Representatives was requested:

S. 2588. An act extending the time for the construction of a bridge by the Chicago, Milwaukee & St. Paul Railway Co. across the Missouri River at Chamberlain, S. Dak.

REFUNDING FOREIGN OBLIGATIONS.

The committee resumed its session.

Mr. BURTON rose.

Mr. BLACK. Mr. Chairman, I have an amendment which I wish to offer.

The CHAIRMAN. For what purpose does the gentleman from Ohio rise?

Mr. BURTON. I rise to oppose the amendment.

Mr. BLACK. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that the debate is exhausted.

Mr. BURTON. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

Mr. BLACK. That is a pro forma amendment, and I offer an amendment to the substance.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair has not been here the entire time while the amendment was pending, but if no Member heretofore has offered the pro forma amendment to strike out the last word, the Chair will recognize the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BURTON], who offers a pro forma amendment.

Mr. BURTON. Mr. Chairman, I am unalterably opposed to this 5 per cent amendment. When we survey the history of the wonderful struggle in which the happiness and the civilization of the whole world was at stake, it emphasizes our relations with our associates in that awful contest. Their sufferings were far greater than ours; frightful though ours may have been. The very shadow of death extended over almost all of Europe, and that dark shadow has not yet been removed; and this Congress, speaking for the American people, can not afford to drive a hard bargain with those who were our allies in that struggle in which the future of the whole human race was involved. [Applause.]

This is no time to insist upon what is termed "honest usance." It is a time for generosity. It is a time for recognition of the frightful sufferings of those who stood by us, who fought our fight, who labored for the protection of our own welfare as a nation and our firesides and homes.

I wish to make one or two practical suggestions. Five per cent under normal conditions is a very high rate of interest for any country to pay. Three per cent was the rate prevailing in England and in France down to a comparatively recent period. The rate in Great Britain was shaded to 2½ per cent. Due to a rising rate of interest, beginning about the commencement of this century, Government bonds drawing 2½ to 3 per cent fell in value considerably below par in the two countries. It is a very interesting phenomenon, but one, I think, readily explained. Our own Government commenced in the Civil War to issue bonds at 7.3. That rate was dropped to 6 per cent, and then by successive grades it fell to 4; and then in the case of the bonds which could be used as the security for the issue of national bank-note currency, to 2 per cent. But any nation would feel under ordinary conditions that 5 per cent was an almost prohibitive rate and carried a threat of probable bankruptcy. I trust we have already passed the peak in the high rates of interest, and I judge that is so from present indications.

Mr. FREAR. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BURTON. Certainly.

Mr. FREAR. This is simply intended to make it equal to the amount placed in the Liberty loan act for three years' indebtedness.

Mr. BURTON. From the language of the amendment I can not make out anything except that 5 per cent shall be the rate of interest charged. I shall ask that the amendment be read again before a vote be taken upon it.

That rate we ought not to impose upon those countries. We are soon to have a conference convening here that promises, I trust, far-reaching and beneficent results. Not Paris, nor Versailles, nor Berlin, nor The Hague, nor London was ever the theater of a meeting of the nations of greater importance or holding out, I trust, greater promise than this meeting at Washington on the 11th day of November next. [Applause.] And let us not arouse suspicions, let us not throw distrust or possible ill will over that gathering by proclaiming to the nations of the earth, who should join with us in the cause of peace and good will, that we insist upon a rate of interest which, until the exceptional conditions of this war, was almost unprecedented among the debts of the nations.

Mr. Chairman, if I can have some further time, there is another phase of the question that I would like to discuss.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Ohio has expired.

Mr. COCKRAN. How much time does the gentleman want?

Mr. BURTON. I should like to have five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio asks unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes more. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. BURTON. I am altogether opposed to the reference of this question of the loans back to this Congress. There is no one who more than I would be reluctant to relinquish any proper prerogative of this body. But neither the executive nor the legislative branch can gain by intruding into the province of the other. The details of this settlement do not properly belong to a legislative body. Let the Congress lay down general rules such as that no debt shall be released, if you will. There must be a great deal of negotiation and of bargaining of agreements with reference to rates of interest and as to date of payment, and I may say in regard to these rates of interest, suppose some country would say, "If you will give us a low rate of interest we will pay in five years, but if you charge us a high rate of interest we can not pay until 30 years." Do you wish the commission to be restrained in its action in the face of such questions as that?

The settlement of these questions does not belong to the Congress. A reference back to Congress would mean interminable delay, and the nations with which we deal would claim the same right. When the broad authority was given to lend billions upon billions, resulting in the loaning of $10,000,000,000 or $11,000,000,000, why was it not provided that the granting of the loans by the Secretary of the Treasury should be approved by the Congress? That was a power far greater than this.

Mr. STEVENSON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BURTON. I regret that I can not yield, because my time is so limited.

Considering that to be a proper function to rest in the discretion of the Executive, the right was given to the Secretary of the Terasury, with the approval of the President.

If we leave the final settlement of this question with Congress, it is inevitable that there will be numerous amendments, and so no agreement can be final. Any tentative agreement made by the commission will be referred back to that commission again. I have had much experience in legislatures, and I have noticed the penchant for amendments. I served once with a man of whom it was said that if the Ten Commandments were laid down as a platform, he would be prompt to move an amendment; and if any proposal of the commission goes through here without substantial modifications, it will be a miracle.

Let me call your attention to still another practical fact. The parties with whom you are dealing will not go to the length to which they would go, will not make the agreements which they would make, if they know there is behind the agreement which they enter into the condition that it be referred here to the action of Congress, which will inevitably demand concessions and conditions. When I think of the ambitious action of persons in seeking to control the Executive I am reminded of the remark of Jack Cade, who was oftentimes a forerunner of many ideas regarding modern finance. He sent word to King Henry, "I am content that he shall be king, but I will be protector over him." When anyone attains very considerable influence in any position there is the idea of overshadowing the executive department. Can we not rely upon the honesty of those who are chosen by the President? The light of publicity rests upon them. Sooner than indulge in any neglect of the interests of the United States or any shadow of dishonesty they would rather face the pistol of an adversary, for an aroused public opinion will demand that those commissioners observe the requirement of the statute, that they do that which is for the United States. They will be loyal to our country's best interests and will be enabled to safeguard the interests of the people.

Mr. Chairman, I wish to say one thing more. Do not let us count here as if we could reach out our hands and obtain the amount of these debts. There is the threat of bankruptcy over all of our debtors, not excepting even those who are financially the strongest. It is a time for recognizing that situation; and there is yet a stronger appeal. In view of the relations, present and future, of this country to those countries, it is time for friendly consideration, for generosity, for mercy even, rather than for harshness in insisting upon our rights. [Applause.]

Mr. FORDNEY. I move that all debate on this amendment and all amendments thereto close in 20 minutes.

Mr. BLACK. I have a substitute which I wish to offer.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. The amendment pending is merely a pro forma amendment. I should like to be recognized in opposition to that amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Texas wish to discuss his substitute for the amendment?

Mr. BLACK. I do if I can ever get the chance to offer it.

The CHAIRMAN. It is the right of the gentleman who has charge of the bill, after five minutes on an amendment, to move to close debate at any time, instanter if he desires. It is within his privilege now if he desires to make the motion. As the Chair understands the motion of the gentleman from Michigan, it is to close debate on the amendment of the gentleman from Wisconsin and all amendments thereto in 20 minutes. Is that the motion?

Mr. FORDNEY. On the amendment offered by the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. FREAR] and all amendments thereto.

Mr. BLACK. Does the gentleman mean to include any amendments to the amendment?

Mr. FORDNEY. The amendment of the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. FREAR] and all amendments to that amendment, not amendments to the section.

Mr. BLACK. The pro forma amendment had better be withdrawn, then.

The CHAIRMAN. That is not necessary. The gentleman from Michigan moves that all debate on the amendment of the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. FREAR] and amendments thereto close in 20 minutes.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Before the Chair puts that, I want to make some remarks on this.

Mr. FORDNEY. On this amendment?

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Yes; and the nature of the remarks will involve a broader aspect than the amendment itself. I would be glad, before we come to the vote upon this amendment, to have the opportunity of expressing myself not only upon this amendment but upon the other aspects of it.

Mr. FORDNEY. I will add 5 minutes, and make it 25 minutes, and yield the 5 minutes to the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. GARRETT].

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. I want more time than that.

Mr. FORDNEY. How much more time?

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. At least 10 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will inquire of the gentleman from Michigan how the time is to be controlled.

Mr. FORDNEY. There were 20 minutes asked for on this side of the House to oppose the amendment. If the gentleman from Tennessee wants 10 minutes, I will add 10 minutes and make it 30 minutes.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. The gentleman can not move to close debate can he, in the committee?

The CHAIRMAN. After there has been five minutes' debate on an amendment the gentleman has that right.

Mr. FORDNEY. I will modify my motion and make it 30 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. While it is not within the province of any Member to designate the persons who shall have control of the time, nevertheless, for the benefit of the Chair, in recognition it is sometimes of value for the gentleman in charge of the bill to suggest the names of the Members who have asked for time. The gentleman from Michigan [Mr. FORDNEY] asks unanimous consent to modify his amendment and to make it 30 minutes. Is there objection?

Mr. FORDNEY. I also ask unaimous consent that I control 15 minutes of that time and that the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. COLLIER] control the other 15 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Michigan modifies his request and asks unanimous consent that all debate on the amendment of the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. FREAR] and all amendments thereto close in 30 minutes, one-half of the time to be controlled by himself and one-half by the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. COLLIER]. Is there objection?

Mr. BLACK. I object.

Mr. FORDNEY. Then, Mr. Chairman, I move that all debate on the amendment of the gentleman from Wisconsin and all amendments thereto close in 30 minutes.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. HILL. Mr. Chairman, foreign Governments owe the United States $10,141,267,585.68, in addition to certain accrued interest. Of this huge sum, $9,435,225,329.24 is due from advances made by our Government from money it raised under the Liberty loan acts. That money came from the pockets of our patriotic people, who bought Liberty bonds until it hurt. It came even from the pay of our soldiers, who also bought Liberty bonds until it hurt. I well remember the Liberty loan campaign we waged among the soldiers of the Twenty-ninth Division and the great sum its members subscribed. Poor and rich, soldier and civilian, all contributed to the sums our Government lent to foreign nations because of the war. Why we lent Cuba $9,025,000 I do not know. What Esthonia did with the $13,999,146.60 we lent it I do not know, but I do know that beside all of the great loans—$4,166,318,358.44 to Great Britain, $3,350,762,938.19 to France, $1,648,034,050 to Italy—the United States paid out of its own pocket for its huge Army and Navy and financed itself its deciding military part in the war.

To-day all nations of the world need money. The United States itself needs money. We need money to lift the burdens of present taxation, and we need money to pay such obligations as those commonly called the soldier bonus. The people of the United States are to-day watching to see what action this Congress will take in reference to the refunding of the foreign loans.

The United States need not have gone into the war as it did. It could have selfishly raised its armies, built its navies, and used its treasures to fortify its coasts so that no foreign nation could have ever successfully attacked it. It did not do so, and I am glad it did not do so, but there is no reason why we should remit the loans of money we made on top of our enormous contributions of men and money as represented by our independent participation in the war. The American people will be glad to see in this bill that the World War Foreign Debt Commission will not have power to cancel "any part of such indebtedness except through payment thereof."

This legislation which we shall soon pass is one of the great steps toward returned American normalcy.

I take this occasion to bring to the attention of the Congress a matter which touches deeply upon the historic past of this Nation—a matter which touches deeply a vital source of national inspiration. It has recently been announced that the War Department would sell to the highest bidder that sacred birthplace of the Star Spangled Banner, Fort McHenry. Our Secretary of War, Mr. Weeks, has repudiated this announcement, but at the same time he stated that Congress was responsible for the disposition of forts, arsenals, and camps for which there is not a present prospective military use. I know that this House, and I know that the Military Affairs Committee of this House, with membership on which you have honored me, will never consent to any such disposition of Fort McHenry. Sanctified by the shellfire of an enemy fleet which gave birth to our National Anthem, indissolubly associated by the immortal Francis Scott Key with the patriotic soul of America, Fort McHenry stands as one of the heritages of the whole Nation, and I do not believe that this Congress will ever consent to its disposal as a useless war property. [Applause.]

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I regret exceedingly that the parliamentary situation is such that we can not have a vote upon the proposition contained in the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Mississippi before we vote upon that offered by the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. FREAR]. I would be less than frank with the House if I did not state that I am exceedingly dubious about the desirability of adopting the amendment of the gentleman from Wisconsin. And yet, if it is to be determined by this House that this authority over questions of both administration and policy, policy which I said in my remarks the other day ought to be determined by the legislative branch, are to be turned over to a commission, then I do feel that we must vote for some limitations other than the bill itself carries. If the Collier amendment could be the first proposition voted upon and was carried, then, so far as I am concerned, I would not support the Frear amendment. More than that, I would be willing to strike from this bill some, if not all, of the limitations placed upon the commission.

The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BURTON], for whose ability we all have great respect, has after all in arguing this question and insisting this power should be turned over to a commission, used only the argument of convenience. That is an argument which might be made on unnumbered questions that arise, because 5 men can act more speedily and more promptly than can 435. But that is not the question. As the gentleman from New York [Mr. COCKRAN] so well said just now, and as was said in general debate the other day, the Constitution imposes a duty on the Congress in regard to moneys raised by public taxation. Furthermore, as was so well said by the gentleman from New York, it is a question which in its broadest aspects goes far beyond the mere matter of the money already owed us. Have you thought, my fellow Members, that in these debts now due to the United States there probably lies the germ of more difficulties, dissensions, differences, and irritation for the future than anything that has ever arisen in the history of this country?

This is no debt between individuals; it is a debt between nations. This is a transaction between sovereigns. There is no world court to which we can go to enforce our rights as individuals can go. There is but one way that this indebtedness ultimately can be collected unless the nations voluntarily pay it, and that is by war. Not only should the Congress retain in its hands that power which it will have, even if this commission is created, of determining, in accordance with the bill, what policy it will adopt in a matter of collection in the years to come as fixed by the commission, but it should retain now, at the time of the settlement, those questions of policy that will constitute the possibilities of irritations of two generations yet to come. Congress is the war-declaring body and has all the responsibilities that attend upon that power.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Tennessee has expired.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Can I have 10 minutes more?

Mr. BLACK. I ask, Mr. Chairman, that the gentleman from Tennessee be allowed to proceed for 10 minutes, not to be taken out of the 30 minutes, because the majority leader [Mr. MONDELL] used 15 or 20 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The time has been limited to 30 minutes, and it is only fair that 15 minutes should be accorded to this side of the House. The Chair would be glad to accede to any arrangement gentlemen may make as to the use of that time.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. I will say that there are 10 minutes remaining that belong to this side, and I will simply ask to proceed for five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Tennessee?

There was no objection.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Now, Mr. Chairman, I wish to emphasize in this presence, and I do this particularly because of certain suggestions made by the honorable gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BURTON]—I wish to emphasize in this presence that the attitude I take, and I know the attitude which my fellow Members on the minority side take, is not to be construed as a lack of confidence in the integrity of the Secretary of the Treasury or the President of the United States.

I said the other day that an insistence of that sort was merely pettifogging. It is a question of the proper division and correct exercise of the powers of government. There are functions concerning the revenues of this country that the Congress is peculiarly charged with under the Constitution and that, in my opinion, can not be delegated. Danger of encroachment on the Executive? Oh, no, indeed. Desire to limit the Executive? Indeed not. I do not desire to limit the Executive in the exercise of any executive power, but I am not willing to confer upon any executive the exercise of legislative power, because the Constitution of my country forbids it.

The Collier amendment will be offered in due time, but the trouble is that we have first to vote upon the amendment offered by the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. FREAR]. In apprehension of the fact that the amendment of the gentleman from Mississippi may not prevail, I think I shall, though reluctantly, vote for the amendment offered by the gentleman from Wisconsin in Committee of the Whole, but if subsequently when the gentleman from Mississippi offers his amendment it should prevail and this bill goes back into the House, I myself shall ask, if no one else does, for a separate vote on the Frear amendment, and shall then record my vote against it.

Bear in mind just what is involved here. The authority exists now in the Secretary of the Treasury to deal, according to the acts of April 24, 1917, and September 24, 1917, with all this indebtedness except that which is held by the Grain Corporation, the Armenian Relief Administration, and those products that were purchased by foreign Governments from the War and Navy Departments. Outside of them the Secretary of the Treasury has ample power, and I assert again now that no legal adviser of the Secretary of the Treasury has ever yet officially let it be known that he believed there was any doubt about that power.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Yes.

Mr. STAFFORD. If the law authorizing the sale of Liberty bonds delegated the power to the Secretary of the Treasury to accept foreign bonds in payment of the loans or credits advanced to foreign Governments, why did not the prior Secretaries of the Treasury, Mr. GLASS and Mr. Houston, exercise that power?

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, it was pointed out here, and the hearings are full of the statements, that under Mr. Secretary GLASS in 1919 negotiations began, and upon the authority of Secretary GLASS I can state that under his administration and under the administration of Mr. Houston an agreement had practically been reached, when suddenly for some reason unknown negotiations were broken off by Mr. Lloyd-George, the premier of England—not upon the initiative of the Government of the United States.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Tennessee has again expired.

Mr. HUSTED. Mr. Chairman, it seems to me there are two compelling reasons why the interest rate should not be fixed in this bill at 5 per cent. The first reason is a purely selfish, business reason, and the second is a moral reason. Of course the business reason is much the less important and I shall discuss that first.

I am opposed to it because I believe it is absolutely contrary to the interests of good bargaining. We are proposing to negotiate with some 19 Governments for the settlement in some form of these loans. Some of these Governments are insolvent and some of them are on the brink of insolvency. From a purely selfish, business standpoint we are in very much the situation of a board of directors of a bank that is trying to settle with an insolvent debtor, or with a debtor who is on the brink of insolvency. If the board of directors should say to the cashier that he may settle only upon the basis of the recovery of the principal and 5 per cent interest thereon, that board would not get very much of a settlement, and no wise board of directors would adopt a resolution of that kind. They would give the cashier authority to make the best settlement he could under the circumstances, assuming always that there was a cashier equal to his job.

The second reason is of vastly more importance. It is a moral reason. As has been said on this floor, we went into the war with those nations and we were rather slow going in. I have always felt, and I believe I always shall feel, that we should have gone in immediately after the sinking of the Lusitania [applause], but that is neither here nor there now. We went in, and, thank God, we accomplished victory, but these nations with whom we went in suffered vastly more than we did in loss of life and in the destruction of property, and if we attempt now to collect from them more interest than we are paying upon the funds that went into these loans, we will be doing a wrong and an immoral act, which will subject our country to just criticism throughout the world. [Applause.]

Mr. BLACK. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. BLACK to the Frear amendment: After the word "provided" strike out the balance and insert the following: "Any such bond or obligation of any foreign Government accepted under the authority herein granted may contain an agreement providing for the repayment of the loan on an amortization plan by means of a fixed number of annual or semiannual installments sufficient to cover, first, a charge on the loan as interest at the rate of 4 per cent per annum; and, second, such amounts to be applied on the principal as will extinguish the debts within an agreed period of not more than 35 years."

Mr. BLACK. Mr. Chairman, I want to make this statement to the House, even though the time for discussion is so limited that I may not get any opportunity to discuss the amendment which I have offered. I do not often object to the extension of time in debate or call for the regular order in the House as I did when the reservation of a point of order was pending to the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. COLLIER], and the only reason I have done so this afternoon is because I anticipated that sooner or later the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. FORDNEY] would move to close debate and that I would have no adequate time in which to discuss my amendment. I have no objection to the discussion proceeding all of the afternoon, as far as I am concerned, if it is the will of the House to do that. But I do want to take this opportunity to say that I think it is the duty of the Chair to recognize Members who have amendments which they desire to offer and which carry substantive propositions, rather than to recognize Members to propose pro forma amendments, such as to strike out the last word. I regret now that the debate has been limited to a very short range of time by the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. FORDNEY], and I will have no adequate time to discuss what I think is a very important proposition and one which we might well consider and upon which we might well take favorable action.

Throughout the debate much has been said about the collection of the principal and interest due us by our allies in the Great War. Yes. "Hurry up; get busy," say some. "Get the money," say others. It is all very well to talk about the collection of this interest and this principal as if it could be done by the mere waving of a hand; but when we come to figure out how it may be done we are confronted with some very real and practical difficulties. Prior to the war the United States had an annual balance of trade in its favor of about $500,000,000 which was settled by European nations by their offsetting against it the payment of interest on the securities and obligations which European investors held in American industrial enterprises and municipal improvements and by sums which our merchants and exporters owed for services of their merchant marines. These conditions now, as everyone knows, are greatly changed. Europe has resold us all of our securities, or practically so; we have a merchant marine of our own which is finding it hard to secure sufficient commerce to keep it busy and is losing large sums of money every day. As a matter of fact, one of the reasons for the present stagnation of commerce and industrial depression throughout the country is the difficulty of our customers abroad finding ways to settle the balance of trade in our favor. In fact, the system of exchange with some countries has all but broken down completely. The only time that the world really enjoys prosperity is when there is a free exchange of commodities and services, and certainly all will admit that this essential element is sadly lacking at the present time.

So as I view it this question of collecting our debt from our allies presents a problem of great difficulty and the solution is not going to be easy, and yet there is one solution which neither our people will accept nor are the Allies asking, and that is a cancellation of the debts. But while the American people are not willing that the debt should be canceled, I do believe that they are willing that we, their representatives, should be generous and forbearing in the rate of interest and the terms of payment. In this attitude they are moved by generous impulse toward our allies and by intelligent appraisal of the difficulties which confront the world.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLACK. I regret I have only five minutes. I will state briefly the purpose of my amendment, and then if I have time I will yield. Now, the purpose of my amendment is to authorize the commission in such cases as they may see proper to fix a 4 per cent rate of interest and to provide that a sum in addition to that sufficient to amortize the debt in 35 years shall be paid. An annual payment of 5 per cent on the indebtedness of any particular nation will accomplish the purpose which I propose. It will afford a definite plan of payment as well as provide a moderate rate of interest. Therefore I believe we could well afford to collect from these European debtors this 5 per cent annually, so that within 33⅓ years the entire indebtedness would be wiped out, and at the same time we would have also collected interest at the rate of 4 per cent per annum. Now, I admit if we look upon this indebtedness from a cold-blooded standpoint of debtor and creditor, why, then, probably my amendment should not be adopted and we should get all the interest that "the traffic will bear." But I can not look at the matter in that light. I do not forget that at the time most of this money was loaned to our allies it was during the darkest days of the war, when it seemed as if the Germans would break through to the channel ports and were then thundering at the gates of Paris. Russia had collapsed on the eastern front and was out of the war and Germany had rushed her well-trained legions to the western front, so as to make one last supreme effort to break through before the Americans could get there.

A supreme moment of history had arrived. Upon the outcome depended in a large measure the future civilization of the world. It was in this fateful hour that Field Marshal Sir Douglas Haig addressed the following stirring appeal to "all ranks of the British Army in France and Flanders." He said: "Every position must be held to the last man. There must be no retirement. With our backs to the wall and believing in the justice of our cause, each of us must fight to the end. The safety of our homes and the freedom of mankind depend alike upon the conduct of each one of us at this critical moment." And at a tremendous cost of human blood these gallant British soldiers did hold the line until our intrepid American boys could get there in sufficient numbers to win the war. Suppose the British or the French had collapsed and had given up the fight as the Russians did? How many more thousands of lives and billions of dollars would it have cost us to win the war? Yet we have the spectacle in this country to-day of certain ones crying out with a loud voice, "Soak the British, make them pay."

Yes; I want Great Britain to pay. Also Belgium, France, Italy, and the other nations which owe us, but I do not want the United States to be harsh and cold-blooded in demanding it. We can well afford to display a spirit of forbearance and generosity in this matter as we displayed a spirit of loyalty and cooperation in helping to win the war. We will lose nothing by it.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. FREAR] has done very valuable work in the preparation of this bill in endeavoring to surround it with such safeguards as would not give authority which would be perhaps greater than should be conferred upon a commission. But in this case I think he has endeavored to go too far. I think it would be highly unwise to attempt to limit to any specific figure, I care not what it is, the interest that may be agreed upon for the funding of these obligations. A great many gentlemen seem to have gone upon the theory that it is to this commission only that this full power of negotiation is delegated, whereas as a matter of fact every act of the commission before it has full force and effect must receive the approval of the President. Now, the exact effect of the amendment offered by the gentleman from Wisconsin is to reenact as a part of this act the provisions in section 3 of the Liberty loan act which provides:

But the rate or rates of interest borne by any such long-time obligations—

That is, obligations to be hereafter refunded—

at the time of their acquisition shall not be less than the rate borne by the short-time obligations so converted into such long-time obligations.

Now, all the obligations we hold, amounting to over $10,000,000,000, from the foreign countries are now represented by demand notes at 5 per cent, and this proposition of the gentleman from Wisconsin simply reenacts as a part of this bill that section of the second Liberty loan act. I can conceive, gentlemen, though having no pretension to being a financier, that in the days to come when interest rates will be expected to drop that it would be much wiser to have a part of the foreign debt refunded in very long term securities at a lower rate of interest than 5 per cent rather than have them only in short-time securities at 5 per cent, and I fear that such a provision as this would tend in the direction during the negotiations of having these foreign obligations at a short time rather than——

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LONGWORTH. I regret my time is so limited. If I have the time later, I will yield. But at any rate it must be borne in mind, gentlemen, that this amendment is not made on the suggestion of the Treasury Department. This I concede to be true, that if the Congress desires to place a limit on the interest in these funding operations that this is the way to do it. If you desire to put any limit to the interest, this amendment is the one that should be voted for, but I agree entirely with my distinguished colleague [Mr. BURTON] that this is not the time, even if it might be advisable at some other time—this is not the time for the United States to be in the attitude of a creditor who is attempting to exact the last cent of interest. A great conference of the nations is approaching. We should meet on the most friendly possible terms. They owe us $11,000,000,000. We expect to get it all, but if we now say we are going to hold you down to the very last cent of interest I do not think this is the time to be in the position of demanding the last pound of flesh. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired; all time has expired. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLACK] to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. FREAR].

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, may we have the Black amendment reported?

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the amendment offered by the gentleman from Texas will be again reported.

There was no objection.

The Clerk began to read the amendment.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Chairman, may we have that amendment read as it will appear in the original Frear amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state to the gentleman from Alabama that this amendment is in fact a substitute, although it is called an amendment. It is intended to supersede, as the Chair understands it, entirely the language of the original amendment.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Very well; I withdraw the suggestion.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment of the gentleman from Texas to the amendment of the gentleman from Wisconsin.

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The question now reverts to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. FREAR].

The question was taken, and the Chair announced that the noes appeared to have it.

On a division (demanded by Mr. FREAR) there were—ayes 68, noes 128.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. COLLIER. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. COLLIER: Page 1, line 10, after the word "authorized," insert "to enter into agreements with representatives of foreign nations"; and page 2, at the end of section 2, insert "Provided, That no agreement or agreements so entered into with respect to any matter herein authorized shall be deemed to have been completed nor to have force and effect until it shall have been submitted to the Congress of the United States and embodied in a law passed by Congress."

Mr. LONGWORTH. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that the amendment is violative of paragraph 3, Rule XXI, in that it is not germane to the bill or the particular paragraph to which it is offered.

I yield to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. SANDERS].

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I make the further point of order that the proposed amendment is virtually two amendments, embodying two substantive propositions, and therefore violates the rule that one amendment only should be submitted at one time.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order made by the gentleman from Wisconsin occurs to the Chair as being well taken. The gentleman from Wisconsin makes the point of order that the amendment consists of two parts; that it is an attempt to amend two different portions of the paragraph. The point of order is that we can not consider both amendments at the same time.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I do not recall the precedents just at the moment. I have a very distinct recollection that it is a frequent practice in the House to offer amendments in this form. I do not recall just now ever hearing a point of order made upon it. Of course, the obvious way to reach the situation would be by the gentleman demanding a division of the question. It does not seem to me that there is very much substance in the point of order. If the precedents are against me, of course I will take it back. It lies within the power of any gentleman to reach the same result by asking a division of the question.

The CHAIRMAN. Permit the Chair to call the gentleman's attention to the fact that it appears on the face to be a little different from the usual method when amendments of this character are offered. This amendment seeks to authorize a change in the language in a part of the bill, and then follows that with an independent proviso. It hardly seems to the Chair that they can be considered together.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I respectfully submit that the two amendments, or the two propositions, are complementary to each other. I think there can not be any doubt about that. The first proposition in the amendment offered by the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. COLLIER] is to authorize negotiations. The second proposition is to provide when those negotiations shall become effective. It seems to me that they are perfectly related and in the same section. The proviso offered by the gentleman from Mississippi, Mr. Chairman, is not independent of his first proposition, although there is sufficient difference in them to make it a divisible question upon the demand of any gentleman.

Mr. STAFFORD. If the gentleman will permit, does not the gentleman see that there are two separate propositions?

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. I do——

Mr. STAFFORD. And that they are apparently two amendments. The precedents are uniform that the gentleman can not offer in one motion amendments related to more than one specific matter.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Now, the gentleman's recollection as to the precedents is probably better than mine, but I have this impression. I insist that these two propositions are perfectly related to each other. I admit that they are divisible, and my idea of the way to get at it is for a gentleman to ask a division of the question.

Mr. STAFFORD. The committee has a right first to determine whether they shall accept the first formal proposition as to entering into an agreement. That is a definite amendment itself. And the other proviso is a distinct, separate proposition, and the committee should have the right to exercise its judgment as to that.

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. Mr. Chairman, while I am not in favor of this amendment in any way, I desire to say that it seems to me that this is one proposition. That is to say, if the gentleman, instead of putting it in two places, had made his first insertion the entering into an agreement subject to approval of Congress, it would mean just what he said. That is all one proposition—an agreement subject to the approval of the Congress.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is made at this time that the amendment consists of two propositions, and the point is sustained by the Chair. The gentleman from Mississippi can decide which amendment he wishes to present first.

Mr. COLLIER. Mr. Chairman, I offer the first part.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report it.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment by Mr. COLLIER: Page 1, line 10, after the word "authorized," insert the words "to enter into agreements with representatives of foreign nations."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. COLLIER].

Mr. COLLIER. Mr. Chairman, I thought I was entitled to time on that.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will recognize the gentleman.

Mr. COLLIER. I do not care to take up the time of the committee for any great length on this amendment. These amendments are simply the gist of what all the general debate was on last Friday and what the greater part of the debate this morning has been on. Therefore I do not care to argue it further. I simply want to say this, however, that the amendment now before the House simply leads up to the amendment I am going to offer next. The amendment now before the House simply authorizes the commission to enter into agreements with representatives of foreign nations. The amendment I expect to offer after that amendment has been disposed of is:

Provided, That no agreement so entered into with respect to any matter herein authorized shall be deemed to have been completed or to have force and effect until it shall have been submitted to the Congress of the United States and embodied in a law passed by Congress.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COLLIER. I will.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. Does not the gentleman feel, on reflection, that his words, after all, are only surplusage? How can any commission created by this law report or extend the time of payment, and so on, without entering into an agreement with foreign nations?

Mr. COLLIER. That is so.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. Who else are they going to do it with?

Mr. COLLIER. The gist of the amendment is to perfect the latter amendment. I consider the first part of the amendment simply a perfecting part of the amendment.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Since the gentleman has stated that the purpose of his amendment is to lay the foundation of this agreement which will require the ratification of Congress to all this proceeding, will the gentleman state what the use of it will be? What authority will it give the Secretary other than that which he has now? He can enter into agreements subject to the approval of Congress now.

Mr. COLLIER. I did not catch what the gentleman from Iowa said.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. I say he can enter into agreements subject to the approval of Congress now.

Mr. COLLIER. Of course he can go on and fix these bonds up now by law on the statute books. But he wants to change that law. He wants those limitations to be set aside, and he wants to throw away those safeguards, and wants authority to have a new commission to refund these obligations in a new way. Of course it has got to be done by some of the agents of the United States, and I would really prefer, I will say to the gentleman from Iowa, that if you are going to change existing law and throw aside all the limitations that we put into existing law—if you are going to do that, I do not think it matters about a commission or one man, but if you accept the amendment that I have offered I believe it will be better, and I prefer to give blanket authority to the Secretary of the Treasury to enter into negotiations with these foreign Governments and then report back to the Congress all the tentative agreements he may make.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. That is what he can do now.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. Exactly. That is what he can do now.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Mr. Chairman, just one word. While I do not think the amendment amounts to anything one way or the other, it leads up to an amendment that may amount to something and to which this committee is opposed, and I hope it will not be agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. COLLIER].

The question was taken, and the Chairman announced that the ayes seemed to have it.

Mr. COLLIER. Mr. Chairman, I ask for a division.

The CHAIRMAN. A division is demanded.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 64, noes 104.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. COLLIER. Now, Mr. Chairman, on page 2, at the end of section 2, I will ask the Clerk to read the second part of the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the second part of the gentleman's amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. COLLIER:

Page 2, at the end of section 2, insert "Provided, That no agreement or agreements so entered into with respect to matters herein authorized shall be deemed to have been completed nor be of force and effect until it shall have been submitted to the Congress of the United States and embodied in a law passed by Congress."

Mr. LONGWORTH. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that the amendment violates paragraph 3 of Rule XXI. It is not germane either to the bill or to the section.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, in connection with that point of order I want to call the attention of the Chair to two or three precedents which seem to be very clearly in point.

The purpose of this bill is by one complete act of legislation to dispose of the question of the foreign debt. After this bill has been signed by the President, under its purpose now, the legislative branch of the Government will be through with it, and the executive department will be clothed with authority to completely settle the entire matter; to take bonds, or to take obligations in place of the present obligations that we have.

The proposal embodied by the amendment offered by the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. COLLIER] makes of the commission that is created by this act a commission of inquiry and investigation, with power to report back to Congress with a view to then having the law passed that disposes of the question. To be sure, his amendment deals with the foreign debt, but the mere fact that it deals with the foreign debt is not necessarily conclusive that it is germane. For instance, in a bill dealing with the sale of public lands an amendment which provides for a gift of public lands is not germane. In a bill providing for the investigation of the cost of armor plate, a proposed amendment fixing the price of armor plate is not germane. An amendment changing a resolution of inquiry, Mr. Chairman, into a resolution of instruction is held not to be germane. That is found in Fifth Hinds', section 5804.

Here was a resolution, Mr. Chairman, to the effect "That the President of the United States, if not incompatible with the public service, be requested to communicate to this House all correspondence with the British Government on file in the State Department with reference to the case of D. H. O'Connor, a citizen of the United States, now imprisoned in Ireland."

That was the resolution. The following amendment was then submitted in the nature of a substitute:

That the President be, and he is hereby, requested to obtain for D. H. O'Connor and other American citizens, now imprisoned under a suspension of the habeas corpus by the British Government in Ireland without trial, conviction, or sentence, a speedy and fair trial or a prompt release.

Now, the main resolution and the amendment both dealt with the same thing; but, Mr. Chairman, the resolution dealt with a question of inquiry, and the proposed amendment changed it to one of instruction, and it was held not in order.

I want to call the attention of the Chair to two precedents which I think are very conclusive on this proposition. One is in Fifth Hinds', section 5850.

To a bill authorizing the Court of Claims to adjudicate a claim an amendment providing for paying the claim outright was held not to be germane.

I want the Chair to notice that the bill itself dealt with this particular claim, but the claim authorized the Court of Claims to deal with it. The amendment provided for the disposition of it then by Congress, another body, so as to conclude and finally determine the matter. That is exactly the reverse of what is true here. This proposed legislation proposes for Congress to deal with a subject now conclusively, and completely authorizes the executive department to carry out the terms of the law. The proposal of the amendment is not for Congress to deal with it now, but it is that Congress shall create this commission and authorize them to make inquiry and investigate and find out and report back, and then the Congress may, or it may not, complete the matter.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. Yes.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. I think the gentleman is not going to speak of the argument at all, but this resolution as amended would not authorize the commission to do anything but to go over there and get some offers, if they could, just as a messenger might do.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. Yes. This amendment authorizes the commission to investigate and then report to Congress.

Now, Mr. Chairman, the reverse of the cases I have just cited has been held to be true, so far as parliamentary law is concerned, and I think this citation which I shall cite to the Chair at this time is exactly on all fours with the proposition before the Chair. This is from Hinds' Precedents, section 5851, following 5850, that I just cited:

To a proposition to pay a claim an amendment proposing to send the claim to the Court of Claims was held not to be germane.

In other words, they had a proposition before the Congress that the Congress should determine whether a claim should be paid. An amendment was offered dealing with precisely the same claim, but it did not propose that Congress should finally adjudicate the matter. The amendment proposed that the Congress should send it to the Court of Claims, and the Chair then held that that amendment was not germane, because it was not the same proposition.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. I yield to the gentleman from Vermont.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. Does not the gentleman believe that the Treasury Department now has authority to enter into formal negotiations and to submit its report to Congress and ask for ratification of a contract based upon such negotiations?

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. I think so.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. This bill undertakes not to do such a thing as that, but to have the Congress settle it finally. Therefore the amendment, to my mind, is a complete negative of this bill.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. It is.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. Then is not the parliamentary remedy not to seek to negative the bill by an amendment, but to move to strike out the enacting clause or to vote against the bill?

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. To be sure.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. This is not the remedy.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. I agree with most of what the gentleman has said. If the gentleman is opposed to the bill, he can move to strike out the enacting clause. But the decisions are very clear, Mr. Chairman, that you can not bring in by way of an amendment a proposition to submit a matter to an entirely different tribunal when you are undertaking to deal with it by the Congress of the United States; and the reason for that is very apparent. If we had the right to bring a new proposition before this House by way of amendment, it would mean that the House, within a few moments, on short debate, could legislate upon matters of grave importance. It is the purpose of parliamentary law to send these matters to committees, to let the committee have hearings, and determine and then report to the Congress, and that is the principal reason for the rule. If this amendment were held to be in order, the reason for the rule would be clearly disregarded.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. In just a moment. In two or three minutes I want to call the attention of the Chair to some similar rulings that I think are much to the point.

I refer first to page 475 of the Manual. That was the case of a tariff commission. I want the Chair to notice the language used in the ruling by the Speaker when he was determining whether the creation of a tariff commission and the referring of matters to a tariff commission was germane to a revenue bill. It was on a motion to recommit. He said:

> The subject matter of the part of the motion to recommit which relates to the Tariff Commission is to gather information; or, to state it in other words, the purpose of the tariff bill is to get money, while the purpose of the Tariff Commission is to get information.

Now, that is exactly this case. The purpose of this legislation is to clothe a commission with authority to get this money, to arrange for it so that it can be gotten in the future. I read again from the decision of Mr. Speaker Clark:

> The subject matter of the part of the motion to recommit which relates to the Tariff Commission is to gather information; or, to state it in other words, the purpose of the tariff bill is to get money, while the purpose of the Tariff Commission is to get information; and it seems to me that if the English language has any significance whatever, the two propositions are different, that one is not germane to the other, and the truth is that the only kinship between these two propositions is that both contain the word "tariff."

Then, on page 479 of the Manual, quoting from another decision—

> And to raise money or to get money is the whole scope of this bill now pending here to-day.

Then, dropping down to another paragraph—

> And the whole scope of this tariff commission proposition is to get information.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I submit that under this long line of precedents the proposition of the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. COLLIER] is an entirely different subject matter, and that under the rules of this House it should be held out of order, and this House should not be compelled to pass on this entirely new matter in contravention of the rule.

Mr. CRISP. Mr. Chairman, I shall trespass upon the time of the House but a very few moments in discussing this point of order, which to my mind is as clearly without any merit as any point of order I have ever heard lodged against any amendment in the House of Representatives.

One of the grounds for the point of order is that it violates section 3 of Rule XXI, which is the rule adopted for the purpose of considering revenue bills. The Chair and every Member of the House know that that rule was adopted by the House for a specific purpose and that it contravenes all general rules of parliamentary law in every body in all the world. That rule was adopted when the House was considering what were commonly called popgun tariff bills.

Mr. LONGWORTH. If the gentleman will allow me, I made the point of order both under paragraph 3 of Rule XXI and under the general rule of germaneness. I made it under both.

Mr. CRISP. I understand that. When we were considering what were called the popgun tariff bills, each bill dealing with one particular subject of the general tariff bill and amending it, it had been held in some of the decisions that under the rules of the House it opened up the whole tariff bill for amendment. So section 3, of Rule XXI, was put in to narrow amendments and restrict them to that one schedule.

But, Mr. Chairman, that provision of the rule has no bearing whatever upon this case, because the bill we are considering is not a revenue bill. The evidence of that is that the gentleman in charge of this bill, knowing it was not a revenue bill, did not rely on the rules to call it up as a privileged matter on the ground that it was a revenue bill, but he asked unanimous consent for the consideration of this bill, and I am told that the report was dropped through the basket. Reports on privileged bills must be made from the floor of the House, and where a report is made through the basket, if the bill was privileged, that destroys its privilege.

So that paragraph of the rule has no bearing whatever on this case. Now, as to the general proposition as to whether or not it is germane. I have taken the precaution to go to the dictionary and get the meaning of the word "germane." Here it is: "Near akin, in close relationship, appropriate, relevant, pertinent." Now, who can say that the proposed amendment is not near akin, in close relationship, relating to, and pertinent to this bill?

What is this bill? This bill is a bill to create a commission "authorized under certain conditions to refund or convert obligations of foreign Governments owing to the United States of America, and for other purposes." What does the amendment propose? It proposes that this commission can enter into negotiations and report to Congress certain plans and methods by which its debts shall be funded; that their action shall not be binding until it is ratified by Congress. What is the legal effect? It is simply a limitation on the power of the commission to do this particular thing. It adds no new matter. It is certainly germane, and I hope the point of order will be overruled.

There is a reason in all rules concerning parliamentary bodies. The reason of germaneness is so that the House could not be swept off its feet and called upon to consider new and extraneous matter. The House is not swept off its feet, the House is not called on to consider new matter, it is not called upon to consider any new subject interjected into the bill by this amendment. It simply places a new limitation on this commission, and provides that its act shall not be binding until ratified by Congress.

Mr. Chairman, the argument of my friend from Indiana [Mr. SANDERS] and the question asked by my good friend from Vermont has but one conclusion, and that is that because the committee of the House brings in a bill here to do a thing in a certain way that the rest of the House is gagged and can not change the plan. That is the logic of their contention.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CRISP. I will.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. The gentleman says to do a thing in a certain way. That is exactly the proposition in the bill—to do a thing in a certain way—and the proposition of the amendment is not to do it but to get advice.

Mr. CRISP. The proposition is to do it with a certain restriction. The House of Representatives is greater than any committee of the House, and when any committee brings in a legislative scheme, the House has a right under the rules to change that legislative scheme by providing a different method provided it is germane. This amendment simply places a limitation upon the commission created by the bill. For the life of me, I can not see that this provision is not germane, and I trust that the point of order will be overruled.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I would like to add a word to what has been so well said by the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. CRISP]. Paragraph 3 of Rule XXI, which is the first proposition invoked here to destroy this amendment, says:

> No amendment shall be in order to any bill affecting revenue which is not germane to the subject matter in the bill; nor shall any amendment to any item of such bill be in order which does not directly relate to the item to which the amendment is proposed.

Now, Mr. Chairman, the language of the Constitution of the United States is as follows:

> All bills for raising revenue shall originate in the House of Representatives.

This paragraph 3 of Rule XXI has up to this time always been applied to bills coming under that particular provision of the Constitution which I have just read. This is not a bill to raise revenue. Surely no gentleman will contend that. This bill does not raise a dime of revenue. This bill provides a method for settlement of obligations growing out of the loan of revenue that has been already raised by taxation of the people of the United States. I take it that no gentleman will insist that this is in any respect a revenue bill as mentioned in this section of the Constitution.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Yes.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Paragraph 3 of Rule XXI relates to bills affecting revenue. This certainly affects revenue.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. If that construction can be placed on it, to wit, that this is a revenue bill because it "affects" the revenue, then the rule could be invoked on any appropriation bill, because appropriation bills "affect" the revenue. This has not been treated as a revenue bill. Why, it is a matter of record that the Committee on Finance in the Senate of the United States reported an original bill long before the House had ever acted upon it. If it had been a revenue bill the Senate committee should have been estopped from acting on it, because, under the Constitution, bills raising revenue must originate in the House of Representatives.

Now, a word further. There is quite a distinction, to my mind, between the proposition stated by the gentleman from Indiana when he pointed to the case in which it was held that in a bill to pay a claim an amendment to send it to the Court of Claims was not in order. Why? Because the bill before the House or the committee, whichever it was, was a final settlement of the proposition. An amendment was offered to send it to the Court of Claims, which was a proposition entirely different from the proposal before the House. The proposal before this body now is to create a commission giving them plenary power to negotiate and settle certain indebtedness due the Government of the United States. This proposition contained in the amendment of the gentleman from Mississippi is merely a proposal to limit the power by requiring that before it shall have any force or effect it shall be submitted to the Congress to act upon.

Mr. MADDEN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. I yield.

Mr. MADDEN. Does not this bill as it stands now without the amendment of the gentleman from Mississippi propose to give the commission the power, subject to the approval of the President? The gentleman's amendment proposes to transfer that power to the Congress.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Oh, indeed not. This certainly adds to it—that it shall have the approval of the Congress as well as of the President. The amendment offered by the gentleman from Mississippi does not disturb the provision requiring the approval of the President. The President must approve it twice—in the first instance when the settlement is made, and then the President must approve it when he signs the law that shall be passed by the Congress, approving its terms.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. Does not the gentleman believe that the first approval, according to the terms of the bill, is a finality and is a confirmation?

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Yes; and it is the desire to limit it.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. Then, if it comes back to that, the effect of the gentleman's amendment is to restore the existing situation itself—that is, that now there can be negotiations with these foreign representatives and there can now be submitted as the result of those negotiations a plan to Congress which can then be acted on by the Congress and approved by the President and become a law.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I do not think the gentleman is quite right about that. I have argued that the Secretary of the Treasury has authority now to proceed under existing law to settle this indebtedness, except as to about $700,000,000 pointed out heretofore; but this is a plan to change the law. Is it possible that a construction can be given here upon a bill which is not designed to raise a dollar of revenue and which will not raise a single dollar of revenue, that this power is to be invoked which has never been applied except to bills defined by the Constitution as bills raising revenue, which will absolutely limit the Congress of the United States upon other than a revenue bill in exercising its power? I can not think so.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is ready to rule. This character of question is very often a difficult one to determine. It can not be determined by the definition of germaneness, the Chair would suggest to the gentleman who first addressed the Chair, because of the fact that the rule itself under which the Chair must act does not use the word "germane" at all. The language under which the Chair must decide this proposition is as follows:

and no motion or proposition on a subject different from that under consideration shall be admitted under color of amendment.

That language, of course, is subject to very wide points of view in interpretation. When is a subject different from that under consideration? The mere fact that a bill relates to loans does not make every amendment relating to loans within the rule. It has been decided many times that the mere fact that an amendment offered which is related to the same subject matter of the bill did not make it germane. What, then, is the point of difference? Where is the line to be drawn? The Chair will say that from his examination of the authorities he has been led to believe that there is none other than the good judgment of the Chair which passes on the question. A great many precedents could be cited on both sides of the case. A great many precedents could be shown that would be very, very close to the proposition that we have before us. Let us take the proposition cited, I think, by the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. SANDERS] in his able presentation of the point of order:

To a proposition to pay a claim an amendment proposing to send the claim to the Court of Claims was held to be not germane.

Could that be considered as a precedent in the matter that we have before us? No; because this bill is what? This bill is to provide a method for the adjustment and funding of certain outstanding claims due the Government of the United States. What does this amendment propose to do? It proposes to do this: It says the establishment of a commission for that purpose shall be modified, changed, and limited by another provision. That merely says that after action by such commission their action shall be submitted to the Congress and shall not be valid until the action of the commission is approved. It has been held time and time again that a limitation of this character is germane—a limitation placed upon a thing itself that was to be done, which is not itself outside of the scope of the subject matter, that is not itself transferring the consideration of the proposition to something else. So, it seems, that this is simply a limitation. The Chair thinks he would be going very far, indeed, to hold that it is not germane.

For that reason the point of order is overruled.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, is the matter open to debate?

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, it has not been debated yet.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will recognize the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. COLLIER].

Mr. COLLIER. Mr. Chairman, I do not desire to debate this any further, because all of the debate on Friday and this morning on one side has been on this proposition. I understand the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. OLDFIELD] desires five minutes.

Mr. OLDFIELD. Mr. Chairman, I do not want to take up the time of the committee unless some one on the other side desires to do so. [Cries of "Vote!"]

Mr. FORDNEY. Mr. Chairman, I move that all debate upon this amendment and all amendments thereto be now closed.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. OSBORNE. Mr. Chairman, may we have the amendment again reported?

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the Clerk will again report the Collier amendment.

There was no objection, and the Clerk again reported the Collier amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Mississippi.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. COLLIER) there were—ayes 71, noes 117.

Mr. COLLIER. Mr. Chairman, I demand tellers.

Tellers were ordered, and the Chair appointed Mr. COLLIER and Mr. FORDNEY to act as tellers.

The committee again divided, and the tellers reported—ayes 98, noes 135.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. HAWLEY. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. HAWLEY: Page 1, lines 9 and 10, after the word "that," strike out the following: "the commission created by section 1, with the approval of the President," and insert in lieu thereof the following: ", with the approval of the President, the commission created by section 1."

Mr. HAWLEY. Mr. Chairman, all this amendment does is to change the position of two clauses. As the language reads at present it says "That the commission created by section 1 with the approval of the President," apparently limiting the approval of the President to the creation of the commission. The change proposed makes the approval of the President apply to every phrase of the paragraph in the bill.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. Mr. Chairman, in his remarks on the pending bill the distinguished gentleman from Tennessee, my friend of many years, Mr. GARRETT, for whom I entertain a high regard as one of the alert intellects and as minority leader, one of the most useful Members of the House, made a statement to which I wish briefly to reply.

He said:

It is necessary by reason of some things that have been said here—as it would be proper under any circumstances—to briefly recite the history of these loans. I have never heard before to-day the allegation, or, so far as I can remember, even the intimation, that the Secretary of the Treasury who happened to be then in office, in complying with the authority given by Congress to make loans to the foreign nations, had violated the act of Congress. Not until to-day, when it was intimated by the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. FORDNEY] and by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. LONGWORTH] that they believed Mr. Secretary McAdoo had violated the spirit if not the letter of the law, have I ever heard even a suggestion to that effect.

Now, it must be, Mr. Chairman, that the gentleman from Tennessee was absent from the Chamber when those loans were under discussion in September, in the year 1917. For if he will consult the RECORD of September 5 of that year he will find the report of an interesting debate in which over and over it was strongly intimated that the then Secretary of the Treasury, Mr. McAdoo—a man for whose personal character we all have entire respect—had violated the spirit and the letter of the law in making those loans. I have in my hand and will read from a copy of the RECORD of the 5th of September, 1917. Mr. KITCHIN, the brilliant leader of the Democracy on the floor at that time, was addressing the House:

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?
Mr. KITCHIN. Yes.
Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Is the gentleman free to state, or does he feel that he is justified in stating publicly to the House, how many million dollars were loaned to the provisional government under Kerensky through Ambassador Bakhmeteff?

Remember that Kerensky's government was a revolutionary government, a sort of government on horseback, which lasted only a few months.

Mr. KITCHIN. A credit was established with this Government for the Russian Government up to $275,000,000.
Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Established how?
Mr. KITCHIN. They had a tentative agreement that they might allot that much to the Russian Government. The tentative agreement was such that if the circumstances warranted it we would loan the Russian Government up to $275,000,000; but under the actual circumstances we afterwards issued them only $87,500,000——
Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. What did we take, bonds?
Mr. KITCHIN. We took a certificate, practically a demand note, from the representatives of the Russian Government here as we did from the representatives of the British and French Governments when we made loans to them.
Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Then the security which was taken for this $87,500,000 loaned to the Kerensky government consists of what is in legal effect a promissory note?
Mr. KITCHIN. Practically that.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. I ask unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes.

Mr. PARKS of Arkansas. Mr. Chairman, I object.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. I hope the gentleman will not object.

Mr. PARKS of Arkansas. Reserving the right to object, I am not going to do so now. I simply want to say that, so far as giving information pertaining to this most important measure is concerned, I should not object, but if gentlemen are going back into the past and dig up politics, I shall object in the future.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. I am not digging up politics. I beg the gentleman from Arkansas not to forget that I prefaced what I am saying by quoting from the statement of your distinguished Democratic leader [Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee]; that he thought it proper and necessary to recite the history of these loans.

Mr. KITCHIN said that we took what was "practically a demand note."

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Signed by whom?
Mr. KITCHIN. Signed by the representative of the Russian Government here.
Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. The ambassador?
Mr. KITCHIN. The duly accredited representative of that Government, of course.
Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Was it signed by anybody except Ambassador Bachmeteff?
Mr. KITCHIN. No. I think that is about all we ought to go into that matter.

For some reason Mr. KITCHIN thought that we should not further inquire about the loan to the Kerensky government.

A little later in the same debate occurred the following dialogue with Mr. Moore, a member of the Committee on Ways and Means:

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Did not the law require, not the handing over of a demand note by the accredited representative but the transfer of bonds at the time the cash was paid out of the Treasury of the United States?
Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I will repeat what I read a moment ago from the testimony of the Secretary of the Treasury as to these obligations taken at the time the credit is given. I read:
"Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. They are preparatory to the delivery of their bonds?
"Secretary MCADOO. They are short-time or demand obligations, which will be converted into bonds."

And yet, although the war ended three years ago, not one of the Kerensky demand notes, nor of any other of the war-loan demand notes of foreign Governments, has been converted into bonds. Our Government has ten billions of demand notes of those Governments—nothing more.

The first two billions of these loans, including the Kerensky-Bachmeteff loan of $87,500,000, were made under the authority of section 2 of the act of April 24, 1917.

That section I will read:

SEC. 2. The Secretary of the Treasury, with the approval of the President, is hereby authorized, on behalf of the United States, to purchase, at par, from such foreign Governments then engaged in war with the enemies of the United States their obligations hereafter issued, bearing the same rate of interest and containing in their essentials the same terms and conditions as those of the United States issued under the authority of this act.

It is perfectly clear that the only power granted by that section was the power to loan money to foreign Governments, and in return to accept obligations containing terms and conditions essentially like those of the obligations of the United States issued under authority of the same act. Now, the obligations of the United States issued under that act were the first Liberty bonds. But who ever saw a Liberty bond in the form of a mere demand note? Does a demand note contain "essentially" the same terms and conditions as a Liberty bond? Did any person ever hear of a bond of the United States with no provision in the bond itself definitely fixing the date or dates on or before which principal and interest would become due and payable?

Now, to show, beyond dispute, just what was the intention of Congress as to the obligations the Secretary must take when he paid out the money, I will read the proviso of section 2 of the act of April 24, 1917.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Mr. Chairman, I ask for five minutes to complete my statement.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. I invite the careful attention of the House to the proviso of section 2 of the act of April 24, 1917. Here is the plain, unmistakable language of the proviso showing the intent of Congress:

Provided, That the authority granted by this section to the Secretary of the Treasury to purchase bonds from foreign Governments, as aforesaid, shall cease upon the termination of the war between the United States and the Imperial German Government.

Mark that language. This proviso expressly declared that the Secretary of the Treasury was granted power to "purchase bonds"—not demand notes, but "bonds."

But the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. GARRETT] said that the law of September 24, 1917, changed all this. But, in my judgment, it did not. I voted for all of the Liberty loan bills, and I can not believe that Congress ever intended to provide or did provide by the act of September 24 that money belonging to our Government could be loaned to foreign Governments on demand notes. Be that as it may, however, it is important to remember that $87,500,000 in money had been advanced to the Kerensky government, and hundreds of millions more to other governments on demand notes before the law of September 24, 1917, was enacted. The total thus advanced before September 24 was about $2,000,000,000.

And yet, as the gentleman from Michigan and the gentleman from Ohio have suggested, there was no authority to loan the money of the United States Government to foreign Governments on demand notes.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Under the leave granted by the House, I desire again to refer to the transactions with Mr. Boris Bakhmeteff, the so-called ambassador representing Russia. The facts about these transactions are set forth in a voluminous official report now before the Senate Judiciary Committee, a report compiled by the committee's counsel, Don M. Hunt, from the official Treasury Department records.

From this report it appears, among many other things, that a total of $187,729,750 in money was advanced to the provisional government of Russia, all on Bakhmeteff's or his assistant's demand notes.

Moneys from this fund raised from Liberty loan drives and taxation for prosecution of the war, and authorized to be loaned to foreign Governments then at war with the enemies of the United States, went, with the approval of the Treasury Department, to the aid of three separate de facto governments in Russia, namely, the Kerensky government, the Kolchak government, and the Wrangel government.

Some interesting facts about the unbusinesslike manner in which the Russian affairs were administered by this Government are shown by the fact that the War Department of the United States Government purchased from the provisional Russian government, after its fall, war munitions which had been contracted for by that government to the extent of $11,000,000. Instead of paying that $11,000,000 into the United States Treasury and crediting that sum as a payment on the Russian loan, the $11,000,000 was paid into the National City Bank—to the credit of Mr. Bakhmeteff.

New York—

At the time of the fall of the Kerensky government there was approximately $56,000,000 in the National City Bank to the credit of that government.

In conclusion, referring again to the statement of the gentleman from Tennessee that never prior to the speeches of the gentleman from Michigan and the gentleman from Ohio had he heard even so much as an intimation that the advancing of money on these loans had been in violation of the act of Congress, I direct attention to the fact that four years ago in the House debate it was not only intimated but also distinctly asserted that there had been such violation of the law. This is shown by the following from the RECORD of September 5, 1917:

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Where the statute says that he can purchase only obligations of these belligerent countries bearing the same rate of interest and containing in their essentials the same terms and conditions as those of the United States issued under authority of this act, it strikes me that in taking the promissory note he has not complied with the plain letter of the law.

Mr. FORDNEY. Mr. Chairman, I move that all debate on this section and all amendments thereto be now closed.

Mr. TINKHAM. Mr. Chairman, my amendment is pending.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. I think the gentleman ought to give me a chance to reply to the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. COOPER].

Mr. TINKHAM. Mr. Chairman, I have an amendment that is pending. I want to speak for five minutes.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I would like to have five minutes in which to reply to the vicious attack of the gentleman from Wisconsin. [Laughter.]

Mr. FORDNEY. Mr. Chairman, I move that all debate on this section and amendments thereto close in 20 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Michigan moves that all debate on this section and all amendments thereto shall close in 20 minutes.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. GARRETT] is recognized. [Applause.]

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I was present four years ago when the debate to which the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. COOPER] has made reference occurred. I had not thought of it for some time, until he refreshed our memory by reading it in extenso here to-day. I may have been dense at the time, and I may be dense yet; but I certainly never understood from that debate at the time, and do not understand from anything that was in the debate at the time, as was read here to-day, that there was any purpose of charging that the Secretary of the Treasury violated the law, either on the part of the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. COOPER] or on the part of the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. KITCHIN]. But if the gentleman from Wisconsin did intend to charge that at that time the Secretary of the Treasury, Mr. McAdoo, violated the law, of course I am ready to assume that I did not understand him correctly.

But I dispute the fact. Now, gentlemen, I ask you to read for yourselves all of section 2 of the act of April 24, 1917. Five different times, as I now remember it, it provides that the Secretary of the Treasury invest—I do not remember the exact expression—in obligations of these foreign Governments. Not once does it use the word "bonds" except as it refers to bonds of the United States. It must have been the manifest intention of the Congress. I have read it very carefully since we had the debate the other day. You used "bonds" in the proviso. Not once, until you get down to the proviso, does it use the word "bonds." What is the proviso? Why, that after the war is over he should not buy bonds.

The war was not over when we were making these loans. We took obligations. Do you know that at the time the Secretary of the Treasury was taking these obligations the Government of the United States had not itself executed its own bonds that it was to sell to its citizens? You remember the first Liberty loan. It was months after we subscribed before we got our bonds.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Yes.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Will the gentleman permit me to direct his attention to the phraseology of the proviso? It was this:

Provided, That the authority granted by this section to the Secretary of the Treasury to purchase bonds from foreign Governments as aforesaid.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Oh, certainly. He had the right at that time to purchase bonds. But he was not limited to bonds. He could take obligations. And if a note of hand, or an I O U, or a due bill is not an obligation, according to the gentleman from Wisconsin, then the next time he wants to borrow money from me I want him to bring a bond. [Laughter and applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Tennessee has expired.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. I have no more time.

Mr. STAFFORD. Oh, yes; the gentleman has. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois rose.

Mr. TINKHAM. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry. What is pending before the House?

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Oregon [Mr. HAWLEY].

The amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. TINKHAM] is recognized.

Mr. TINKHAM. Mr. Chairman, may I ask that my amendment be read?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. TINKHAM] offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. TINKHAM: Page 2, line 1, after the words "or both," insert the words "but in no event to extend the time of payment of interest beyond two years from the date of the passage of this act."

Mr. TINKHAM. Mr. Chairman, my amendment proposes that no current interest or interest upon the debt to be funded shall be postponed further than two years from the passage of this act. This amendment is not offered because there is the slightest distrust of either the Secretary of the Treasury or of the commission proposed to be established by the bill. It is not offered even as a condition or restriction upon powers of the commission. It is offered to give the commission a power, in my opinion, which to-day under the bill as drawn they do not possess.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TINKHAM. I can not in my five minutes.

The amendment gives the commission power to say to the emissaries of any country seeking refunding of its debt and desiring to postpone interest payments which possibly it would be fair to require paid, "The Congress of the United States has put a limitation upon our power of postponing interest."

There will be great pressure brought to bear upon the commission from the international bankers and the various nations to postpone interest payments—by the bankers, so that their loans and commitments may be given priority and added security; by the various nations, in order that they may expend the money which might be devoted to interest payments to the United States to other purposes, even to financing departments having to do with trade competitive with like departments of ours, not to mention the addition to naval and other equipment. If my amendment is accepted a great power will be given to the commission if they can point to the direction of Congress, which says that they shall not postpone interest payments further than two years. That does not mean that we are going to insist that those nations which can not in fairness pay shall be compelled to pay, but gives the commission a power to be used diplomatically and fairly. At the end of the two-year period if there are nations who can not pay interest upon their debt, then the Secretary of the Treasury can report to the Congress that an amendment concerning further postponement of interest should be made and why that should be done. It would neither be undignified nor improper for him or for the commission to do so.

Mr. FESS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TINKHAM. Just one moment. There has been no evidence or testimony before any committee of this House or of the Senate, either by word of mouth or written communication, that any arrangement concerning payment of interest, tentative or otherwise, has been made or suggested. The only really official statement that there has been was made by the English chancellor, Mr. Chamberlain, last spring. I have in my hand the parliamentary debates of Monday, April 25, 1921, from which I desire to read the said statement, and what was then suggested England might do in relation to the interest upon the debt owed by her to the United States. On page 75, under the heading "National debt," the English chancellor said:

The total debt is £7,573,000,000, of which treasury bills and ways and means advances account for £1,275,000,000, and external debt, at par of exchange, £1,162,000,000. The first observation I would make is that it is obviously desirable that we should redeem as much debt as we can while prices, though lower than they were, still remain above the level which we expect them to reach in a comparatively short time and to maintain over future years.

And then he made the further statement:

We have to provide next year (that, is 1922 and 1923) for one considerable item not included in this year's estimates, namely, interest on our debt to the United States of America, which at par exchange amounts to over £40,000,000 a year. It is possible that we may not require to provide more than half of the whole year's interest on our debt to the United States Government in 1922–23. Even so, the starting point on the expenditure side on the present basis is not likely to be less than £950,000,000. Clearly that is too high and it must be reduced.

There has been propaganda, I might call it, both in the Committee on Ways and Means and in this House, that already there is an item in the present budget bill to pay some interest upon our debt. I do not know how this rumor arose or for what purpose it has been circulated, but the fact is that there is no such item, as I understand it. The Committee on Ways and Means objected to the amendment which I have now offered upon two grounds. The committee's first objection was that if the amendment was adopted all the nations would take advantage of it and postpone their interest payment for two years after the passage of the bill, and that they were informed that some of the nations were ready to pay interest now or before the two-year period. England is the most sovereign of all nations, and her proposal, which I have read, is that she does not pay the interest until substantially two years have passed. There are no other proposals, I am officially informed, pending from any other nations concerning the payment of the interest upon the debt.

This would therefore seem to dispose of the first objection. The second objection is that there are countries like Austria, Armenia, Poland, and other countries which can not pay interest within two years. That objection is met, it seems to me, by the suggestion that at the end of the two-year period any countries which can not pay shall be reported by the commission to the Congress and proper treatment given to the situation as it may then appear.

The Secretary of the Treasury before the Ways and Means Committee for diplomatic reasons could not, of course, do anything but oppose mildly the suggestion which is contained in my amendment; but this House is not bound by diplomacy and is here for frank and unrestricted expression. We are merely trustees of this great fund of foreign indebtedness and in a spirit of fairness and equity to our debtors should always hold in mind the superior obligations we owe to those whom we represent whose money is involved. In the public interest and in the exercise of a very high duty I believe that my amendment should be adopted and the hands of our commission strengthened and given adequate power.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Massachusetts has expired.

Mr. TINKHAM. Mr. Chairman, may I ask for five more minutes?

The CHAIRMAN. The committee has ordered otherwise. The Chair does not remember whether that was by unanimous consent or by motion. The Chair understands it was by motion. The gentleman from Massachusetts asks unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes more. Is there objection?

Mr. CHANDLER of Oklahoma. I object.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois rose.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois is recognized.

Mr. TINKHAM. Mr. Chairman, may I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks?

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the gentleman's request?

There was no objection.

The CHAIRMAN. Would the gentleman like to have his amendment proposed now?

Mr. TINKHAM. Yes.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. TINKHAM].

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. GRAHAM] is recognized. The amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois will be read by the Clerk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois: On page 2, lines 18 and 19, after the word "has," in line 18, strike out "or hereafter may have."

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. Gentlemen of the committee, I am not sure that I am right about this, and if at the conclusion of my five minutes the members of the committee have convinced me that I am wrong I shall be glad to withdraw my amendment. But this is about the only opportunity I have had to find out about the meaning of this language. As I understand it this proposition is for the purpose of settling certain advances that were made to foreign countries, which are set out in the report. They are on account, first, of proceeds of advances made under the Liberty loan acts. Now, surely no further amount can be advanced under the Liberty loan acts, for by the express language of those acts the power to do so is now terminated. Second, proceeds of sale of surplus war materials by the Secretary of War and the Secretary of the Navy.

That is all over and settled and done with, through the work of the American Liquidation Commission.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. Yes.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Does not the gentleman appreciate that the striking out of those words would prevent our getting any really good security for this debt—all that we now have? Does the gentleman desire to exclude that?

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. No; if I am correct about this the words refer back to the antecedent "all claims"—all claims which the United States now has or hereafter may have.

Mr. LONGWORTH. "Not now represented by bonds or obligations, which the United States of America now has or hereafter may have." To strike out those words will defeat the purpose of the bill.

Mr. HAWLEY. Will the gentleman yield to me?

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. First let me ask a question, and then I will yield. This language reads:

And to adjust and settle any and all claims, not now represented by bonds or obligations, which the United States of America now has or hereafter may have against any foreign Government and to accept securities therefor.

"All claims which the United States may hereafter have." Does not the gentleman think it ought to be limited to the claims which we now have?

Mr. HAWLEY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. Yes.

Mr. HAWLEY. In the course of the inquiry it developed that there are some disputed matters between our Government and some of the foreign Governments relative to the transportation of our troops, and no balance has been struck yet, and it has not been determined whether there are certain amounts they ought to pay or whether there are amounts that we should assume the payment of. These are claims that are not presented yet. They may be claims on our part against a foreign Government, and we do not know yet whether they are or not, and so this language is put in there to take care of such a situation as that.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. That is what I am afraid of. I do not believe that is right. I believe this act ought to be limited to the things set out in the report—the advances made under the Liberty loan acts, the sale of surplus war materials, and obligations incurred through the United States Grain Corporation and the American Relief Administration. If there is anything else to settle in the disputed accounts between us and other countries, I believe we had better do that in another way.

Mr. HAWLEY. We understand that the foreign Governments are willing to have all the claims that may be payable by them to us incorporated in this legislation and settled at one time.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. Does the gentleman think that is wise?

Mr. HAWLEY. I can see no objection to it.

Mr. STAFFORD. Why would not the commission have that authority with the clause stricken out as proposed by the gentleman from Illinois? It is a claim we have against that foreign Government.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. We have the claim spoken of by the gentleman from Oregon now. This language refers to claims arising in the future. If you have a claim at all, you have it now. So why put in language to cover claims that we may have in the future?

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Illinois has expired.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. I offer a substitute for the amendment of the gentleman from Illinois.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Tennessee offers a substitute for the amendment of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. GRAHAM], which substitute the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 2, line 16, after the word "America," strike out the remainder of the section.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair feels that he should recognize the gentleman from New York [Mr. FAIRCHILD] if he desires, and that would preclude debate by the gentleman from Tennessee on his substitute.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. May I call the Chair's attention to the fact that the motion of the gentleman from Michigan, as I understood it, was to close debate on the Tinkham amendment and all amendments thereto.

The CHAIRMAN. No; it was to close debate on the section and all amendments thereto.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Very well.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment by way of substitute offered by the gentleman from Tennessee for the amendment of the gentleman from Illinois.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee) there were—ayes 35, noes 107.

So the substitute was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The question recurs on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. STAFFORD. May we have the amendment again reported?

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment by Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois: Page 2, lines 18 and 19, after the word "has," in line 18, strike out the words "or hereafter may have."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois) there were 56 ayes and 117 noes.

So the amendment was lost.

Mr. FAIRCHILD. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. FAIRCHILD: Page 1, line 11, after the word "authorized," strike out the words "from time to time"; page 2, lines 3, 4, and 5, after the word "America," strike out the words "or any obligation of any foreign Government hereafter received by the United States of America"; page 2, line 9, after the word "and," strike out the words "from time to time"; and on line 12, after the word "now," strike out the words "or hereafter."

Mr. FAIRCHILD. Mr. Chairman, the purpose of this amendment is not to change at all the intent of the bill as reported by the committee.

Mr. FORDNEY. Mr. Chairman, has not the 20 minutes been occupied in debate?

The CHAIRMAN. There have been only three speeches of five minutes each.

Mr. FAIRCHILD. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. FREAR] in his address the other day called attention to the fact that in the committee, as an amendment to the original draft of the bill, section 4 had been adopted limiting the time in which the commission could act to three years. When that amendment was adopted in committee they should have gone back to section 2 and changed the phraseology of section 2 in order to conform with the amendment which they adopted and reported to the House. The expressions that my amendment proposes to eliminate are expressions that relate only to a continuing commission, which could act forever. The bill as drafted in the Treasury Department provided for such a perpetual commission, and therefore the expressions "from time to time" were included in the authorization to refund. The commission could refund the existing indebtedness, and 10 years later they could refund again, and 30 years later they could refund again. It was a continuing commission, and therefore, as provided in the Treasury Department draft of the bill, section 2 contained such expressions as "from time to time" in the authorization to the commission to act. From "time to time" the commission was authorized to refund. On page 2, lines 3 and 4, it says, "or any obligation of any foreign Government hereafter received by the United States of America." "Hereafter received." There is one of the expressions appropriate only to a continuing, perpetual commission. My amendment simply eliminates such expressions as "from time to time" and "hereafter" in order to make section 2 conform to the intent of the bill as reported by the committee and to section 4 of the bill.

Mr. TEMPLE. Does not section 4 limit that altogether, that it must be limited to three years? Section 4 says that all powers exercised must be discontinued at the end of three years.

Mr. FAIRCHILD. These expressions should be eliminated.

Mr. TEMPLE. Two years from now would be hereafter.

Mr. FAIRCHILD. It is not the purpose to give authority to the commission to accept any further refunding after the commission has once refunded. The authorization is to refund the existing obligations, and when refunded the authority of the commission as to such obligations should cease.

Mr. FORDNEY. Mr. Chairman, I hope the amendment will be voted down.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York [Mr. FAIRCHILD].

The question was taken, and the amendment was lost.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 3. That this act shall not be construed to authorize the exchange of bonds or other obligations of any foreign Government for those of any other foreign Government, or cancellation of any part of such indebtedness except through payment thereof.

Mr. FISH and Mr. COLLIER rose.

Mr. FISH. Mr. Chairman, I have an amendment which I desire to offer.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will recognize the gentleman from Mississippi, a member of the committee.

Mr. COLLIER. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. COLLIER: Page 2, line 25, after the word "thereof," strike out the period and insert a comma and the words "in full."

Mr. COLLIER. Mr. Chairman, I do not care to debate this at length. This amendment is simply for the purpose of making clear that any cancellation or payment or any part thereof must be in full. It makes it clear and precludes any authority to accept a partial payment or a percentage of the payment.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. It would be true, would it not, that if they should agree to take 10 cents on the dollar it might be construed as a payment?

Mr. COLLIER. Exactly, and it would be a payment if they agreed on any sum. I do not care to debate it any more.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, this amendment makes some provision for what the bill does not provide. On line 24 it is clearly the intention of the committee that this commission shall have the power to waive all interest due from the foreign Governments, and I imagine that that is not the intention of the committee, which if it does it is very unfortunate to say the least. The reading of the section so provides as it now stands. In this connection, and that is what I took the floor for more than anything else, I want to read just this statement:

Congressional caution is eminently called for. The fervor and energy with which this refunding legislation is sought to be accelerated, the unique insistence that Congress shall abdicate its powers and functions to one man, the heralding of a compromise by which the one-man power is to be replaced by a commission of five, which, however, is the identical "one-man power" in only slightly different guise—together with all the circumstances of visits of foreign diplomats, the threats coming from across the sea, warning us that if we do not cancel the $11,000,000,000 debt they will demonetize our heap of gold—all these clouds upon the horizon make it a necessary virtue in Congressmen to be circumspect. If they remain on guard we may proceed calmly, undaunted, and unafraid, treating every nation with our accustomed generous justice.

It is clear, as presented, that this is a yielding of the power of Congress to control its affairs to a commission for the purpose of adjusting that which is certain, as provided by the bill, and as provided in section 3, a compromise to waive all of the interest due the United States, and that question should be determined by the Congress whose duty has been fixed by the Constitution to determine the way in which property shall be disposed of, what property shall be given away and to whom.

Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAKER. Yes.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. I wish the gentleman would point out to the House the language in section 3 that he took for the text of his speech.

Mr. RAKER. Anyone who will read it will immediately know that they refer to the indebtedness as the original obligations, and on line 24 of section 3 it relates to the cancellation of any part of such indebtedness, using the word "indebtedness" to differentiate between the interest now due and to become due on the "indebtedness."

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. If the gentleman were a judge and an action of account were brought before him, would he hold the interest a part of the debt?

Mr. RAKER. That would depend. I would rely upon what the law of the State was and what the contract provided; also the precedents on the questions involved. Even then, in many instances it would be difficult to determine whether or not interest was or was not to be collected; hence was an incidental part of the "original indebtedness." That same question may be involved in these foreign loans and debts, as the bill provides "any obligations," and, further, "to adjust and settle any and all claims" now or hereafter held by the United States of America.

As covering my views on this question presented by this bill, I shall insert the "Appeal to Congress to conserve the property of the United States and $11,000,000,000 of obligations of foreign Governments," by Albert E. Henschel, which is as follows:

APPEAL TO CONGRESS TO CONSERVE THE PROPERTY OF THE UNITED STATES IN $11,000,000,000 OF THE OBLIGATIONS OF FOREIGN GOVERNMENTS.

(By Albert E. Henschel.)

ELEVEN BILLION DOLLARS FOREIGN DEBT REFUNDING BILL UNCONSTITUTIONAL AS DELEGATING POWER BELONGING TO CONGRESS—SUGGESTIONS FOR RELIEVING UNEMPLOYMENT AND PROMOTING PROSPERITY.

The rights of the United States to the moneys loaned to foreign Governments, pursuant to acts of Congress, are fixed by the several acts under which the loans were authorized. These acts can not be repealed or amended except by Congress. Congress can not, directly or indirectly, delegate its powers to repeal or amend its statutes to any other department or authority. It can not abandon or shift to other shoulders the trust and responsibility imposed upon it by the Constitution.

MINOR INCIDENTALS MAY BE LEFT TO DISCRETION OF SECRETARY OF THE TREASURY.

The acts under which the foreign loans were authorized did not delegate to the Secretary of the Treasury nor to anyone else the powers of Congress, whether of a legislative nature or those coupled with the trust to guard and control the public property. Every matter of substance—such as rates of interest, limits of dates of maturity, the price at which the foreign obligations were to be purchased, the requirement that the conditions of the foreign obligations shall be essentially the same as those of our own bond issues, from the proceeds of which these foreign loans were made, all things protective of the public interest—was distinctly and definitely expressed in the acts, leaving only minor administrative details to the discretion of the Secretary of the Treasury, subject to the President's approval.

The guarding of the public interests at every point was taken care of by Congress. There was no surrender of constitutional powers vested exclusively in Congress. There was no suggestion that in case of failure to pay interest or principal that anyone may remit the same and make a gift of it to the defaulting debtor. Such a provision would have been an attempt to delegate a trust power belonging exclusively to Congress and therefore unconstitutional.

ONLY CONGRESS CONTROLS UNITED STATES PROPERTY.

If any gifts are to be made, if any national property rights are to be sacrificed Congress itself must do so, expressing its own immediate will. If made at all the gifts must be made by the representatives of the people to whom the property belongs. Nor can any substitution of securities held in trust for the people be made except by a decision of Congress defining with the same protective punctilio what the substituted securities shall be, as were fixed in the acts providing for the purchase of the original securities.

The law on the subject is abundant and clear, as appears more at large in the appendix.

CONGRESS CAN NOT DELEGATE ITS CONSTITUTIONAL POWERS.

The United States Supreme Court in Van Brocklin v. State of Tennessee (117 U. S., 151, 168), said:

"Congress under the power conferred upon it by the Constitution 'to dispose of and make all needful rules and regulations respecting the territory or other property of the United States' has exclusive right to control and dispose of (its public and unoccupied lands) as it has with regard to other property of the United States."

The United States Supreme Court in United States v. Grimaud (220 U. S., 506, 521) said:

"That Congress can not delegate legislative power to the President is a principle universally recognized as vital to the integrity and maintenance of the system of government ordained by the Constitution." (Field v. Clark, 143 U. S., 649, 692.)

Our Government is based upon the principle of the separation of the executive, legislative, and judicial departments, so that neither may encroach upon the province of the other.

Jefferson said: "If these three powers maintain their mutual independence of each other our Government may last long, but not so if either can assume the authorities of the other." He looked for the safety of the Republic "to the broad representation of the people in Congress."

Justice Cooley, in his Constitutional Law (2d ed.) page 100, said:

"No legislative body can delegate to another department of the Government, or to any other authority, the power, either generally or specially, to enact laws. The reason is found in the very existence of its own powers. This high prerogative has been intrusted to its own wisdom, judgment, and patriotism, and not to those of other persons, and it will act ultra vires if it undertakes to delegate the trust, instead of executing it."

FUNDING BILL UNCONSTITUTIONAL.

From these expositions of the Constitution by our highest court and legal authority, as well as from those appearing in the appendix, it follows that legislation to vest the Secretary of the Treasury, or a commission, however constituted, or any other authority, with power to change the rights of the United States, in their foreign securities, as the same are now fixed by law, would be unconstitutional and void.

MONEY AFFAIRS OUGHT TO BE IN CHARGE OF THE PEOPLE'S REPRESENTATIVES.

Also on the merits, it would seem that Congress is the only body sufficiently representative of the public interests in a matter of such staggering bulk as $11,000,000,000.

In this view I am supported by Dr. Franklin's expression in the constitutional convention, "That it was always of importance that the people should know who had disposed of their money, and how it had been disposed of. It was a maxim that those who feel can best judge. This end would be best attained if money affairs were to be confined to the immediate representatives of the people."

Lord Bryce, in a recent lecture, expressed himself similarly, saying: "A democracy is not consistently democratic if it leaves its fortunes in the hands of a few persons who pledge it before they have consulted it."

The representatives of the people in Congress assembled are as competent and trustworthy to protect the public interests as any that have been suggested. They will command all the aid and information at the disposal of the executive department.

The property and revenues of the United States should be held and applied, primarily, as prescribed by the Constitution, "to pay the debts and provide for the common defense and general welfare of the United States."

DO NOT FORGET THE RIGHTS OF THE AMERICAN PEOPLE.

So far as our foreign debt legislation is concerned we are naturally moved by kindly considerations for our debtors and shall grant them a reasonable time within which to start their interest payments and facilitate them, as far as may be consistent with justice to our own people.

In accommodating our debtors we must reflect also upon our own needs.

It is a fact that the American people are bowed with an overwhelming national debt—almost entirely imposed for nonproductive purposes of the war. Taxation is onerous. Incomes are on the wane. Lack of employment is a national problem, and in this supreme difficulty we find ourselves strained not only to meet our own obligations but to pay interest upon the interest which our foreign debtors are temporarily unable to meet. If they would only curb their military zeal they would soon return to normal standards. It is entirely proper that they should pay interest on the postponed interest because by their failure we are forced to borrow on Treasury notes to pay this interest for them.

PUBLIC PROPERTY A PUBLIC TRUST.

Their postponed interest already mounts up to a billion dollars, which at 6 per cent means $60,000,000 a year, which the American people are taxed to pay, to make good the default of our debtors. Common honesty requires that such burden should not fall upon the American people.

If Congress keeps its eye and its grip on the $11,000,000,000 of foreign obligations in our Treasury there is strong assurance that the property rights of the people will not be menaced or sacrificed, but will be protected and maintained.

EFFORTS FOR CANCELLATION OF ELEVEN BILLION DEBT.

Congressional caution is eminently called for. The fervor and energy with which this refunding legislation is sought to be accelerated, the unique insistence that Congress shall abdicate its powers and functions to one man, the heralding of a compromise by which the one-man power is to be replaced by a commission of five, which, however, is the identical "one-man power" in only slightly different guise—together with all the circumstances of visits of foreign diplomats, the threats coming from across the sea, warning us that if we don't cancel the $11,000,000,000 debt they will demonetize our heap of gold—all these clouds upon the horizon make it a necessary virtue in Congressmen to be circumspect. If they remain on guard we may proceed calmly, undaunted, and unafraid, treating every nation with our accustomed generous justice.

WE SHALL NOT SURRENDER OUR RIGHTS.

We shall not be panic stricken by mysterious threats, whisperings, or fears, as stirred President Wilson to reverse his party platform, to recede from his campaign pledges, to implore Congress to undo its legislation on the tolls of the Panama Canal.

We know we have an honest title to this 11,000,000,000 of securities. We shall not delegate anybody to give it up.

Every American Representative dealing with European relations is struck with the aptness, sagacity, and love of America displayed in Washington's Farewell Address. The following excerpts may be profitably heeded at this time.

WASHINGTON NOT OBSOLETE IN AMERICAN HEARTS.

Our truest and dearest friend, Washington, warns against the spirit which "opens the door to foreign influence and corruption which finds a facilitated access to the Government itself through the channels of party passion. Thus the policy and will of one country are subjected to the policy and will of another." He also warns against undue attachments to favored nations by concessions and privileges denied to others. "It gives to ambitious, corrupt, or deluded citizens who devote themselves to the favorite nation facility to betray or sacrifice the interests of their own country without odium; sometimes even with popularity." He continues:

"As avenues to foreign influences in innumerable ways, such attachments are particularly alarming to the truly enlightened and independent patriot. How many opportunities do they afford to tamper with domestic factions, to practice the arts of seduction, to mislead public opinion, to influence or awe public councils! * * * Against the insidious wiles of foreign influence, I conjure you to believe me, fellow citizens, the jealousy of a free people ought to be constantly awake, since history and experience prove that foreign influence is one of the most baneful foes of republican government."

THE GENTLE ART OF MELLIFLUOUS LYING.

Our financial and other property interests may be safely committed to the wisdom of Congress, because it is in touch with the people of every part of the country and because it is not in direct contact with the subtle influence of old-line European diplomats, whose usefulness to European interests is frankly measured by their efficiency in the game of bluff, their skill in camouflage, and their mastery in the gentle art of mellifluous lying.

LET US HAVE BILLIONS OF "PROSPERITY LOANS."

While the discountenancing of unconstitutional and ill-advised legislation is the main object of this appeal, I desire to present some ideas of a constructive nature.

There is nothing unusual or unexpected in protracted business depression following a great war. What is the remedy?

Must we stand idly by and wait for time to work its inevitable healing, or may we control events by quick and appropriate action? I believe there is a simple, direct way to restore confidence and prosperity.

A debt incurred for constructive uses largely becomes self-extinguishing by the new wealth it creates and by its many other compensations.

Let us consider with what speed and promptitude billions were raised and spent for purposes of war. Why should we not be as generous to prosper the labors and benefits of peace? We could soon banish unemployment if we borrowed several billions a year for great national undertakings—for doubling the width and multiplying the public roads, utilizing our great water power, constructing bridges and canals, arranging to burn coal near the mine, transferring heat, light, and power on high-tension electrical lines, double-tracking our great railroads, providing necessary rolling stock, depots, and stations.

THE VALUE OF FORESTS.

Forestation is of highest public interest and importance. That alone would keep a large army of men indefinitely at work.

Reliable estimates indicate that the United States needs the cultivation of 400,000,000 acres with 675 trees to the acre. If we put our financial power behind this gigantic work and make it a success, we would be able in the fifty-first year to gather in our results by cutting down 2 per cent—8,000,000 acres of trees. If we make allowance of 400,000,000 trees as dead or unmarketable, we shall still have 5,000,000,000 trees every year as long as the harvested area is immediately replanted. If we assume that a 50-year-old tree will represent a cash value of only $5—plus harvesting and replanting expenses—the United States would develop from this source alone a permanent income of $25,000,000,000 a year. And even higher benefit would accrue by the mere growing of the trees, giving shade and comfort, yielding fruit, preventing floods, and saving the soil from destructive erosion.

We are annually losing large areas of fertile soil on the banks of our great rivers because of a lack of proper forestation.

If only a part of the public works here suggested could be undertaken, there would be work enough for everybody.

STAND BY THE CONSTITUTION.

All this work comes within your powers under the Constitution.

I hope and trust that, though our old Constitution has of late received many wounds and bruises, you will still cling to it with love and reverence as the citadel of our institutions and the guardian of our liberties and rights.

I believe you will prove true to its principles and resist the influences seeking to unload upon us, to the extent of their power, the entire monetary burdens of the war.

Respectfully submitted.

ALBERT E. HENSCHEL,

NEW YORK, October 18, 1921.

APPENDIX.

LEGAL AUTHORITIES.

Distinction between delegating power to make the law and conferring authority or discretion as to its execution.

St. Louis Merchants Bridge Terminal Co. v. United States (188 Fed. Rep., 191, p. 195), Sanborn, circuit judge:

"4. A legislative body may delegate the power to find some fact or situation on which the operation of a law is conditioned, or to make and enforce regulations for the execution of a statute according to its terms. (Cases cited.)

"5. But it can not delegate its legislative power, its power to exercise the indispensable direction to make, to add to, to take from, or to modify the law. 'The true distinction,' said Judge Ranney for the Supreme Court of Ohio, in Cincinnati, Wilmington & Zanesville Railroad Co. v. Commissioners of Ohio State (77, 78) * * * 'is between the delegation of power to make its law, which necessarily involves a distinction as to what it shall be, and conferring authority or discretion as to its execution, to be exercised under and in pursuance of the law. The first can not be done. To the latter no valid objection can be made.'" (Cases cited.)

Justice Lamar (U. S. v. Grimaud, 220 U. S., 506), at page 514:

"From the beginning of the Government various acts have been passed conferring upon executive officers power to make rules and regulations—not for the government of their departments, but for administering the laws which did govern. None of these statutes could confer legislative power. But when Congress had legislated and indicated its will, it could give to those who were to act under such general provisions 'power to fill up the details' by the establishment of administrative rules and regulations." * * *

(P. 518.)

"But in making these regulations the officers did not legislate. They did not go outside of the circle of that which the act itself had affirmatively required to be done or treated as unlawful if done. But confining themselves within the field covered by the statute they could adopt regulations of the nature they had thus been generally authorized to make in order to administer the law and carry the statute in effect."

Mr. Chief Justice Waite (Morrill v. Jones, 106 U. S., 466), at page 467:

"The Secretary of the Treasury can not by his regulations alter or amend a revenue law. All he can do is to regulate the mode of proceeding to carry into effect what Congress has enacted. * * * In our opinion the object of the Secretary could only be accomplished by an amendment of the law. That is not the office of a Treasury regulation."

DELEGATION OF LEGISLATIVE POWER.

(Black's Constitutional Law (3d ed.), p. 287.)

It is clear that Congress can not pass any law subjecting the Government to the influence or ascendancy of any foreign power. * * * Nor can it renounce or surrender any of the powers granted to it by the Constitution, whether to the other branches of the Government, the States, or private parties. * * * Nor can it delegate the powers confided to it, or authorize their exercise by any other body or any person.

(P. 377.)

Delegation of legislative power to the people at large, from whom it was derived, is just as much against the spirit of the Constitution as a delegation of it to one citizen. Nor can the legislature be allowed to shirk the responsibility of deciding upon the laws which should be made.

(Cooley's Constitutional Limitations (7th ed.), p. 163.)

DELEGATING LEGISLATIVE POWERS.

One of the settled maxims in constitutional law is that the power conferred upon the legislature to make laws can not be delegated by that department to any other body or authority. Where the sovereign power of the State has located the authority, there it must remain; and by the constitutional agency alone the laws must be made until the Constitution itself is changed. The power to whose judgment, wisdom, and patriotism this high prerogative has been intrusted can not relieve itself of the responsibility by choosing other agencies upon which the power shall be devolved, nor can it substitute the judgment, wisdom, and patriotism of any other body for those to which alone the people have seen fit to confide this sovereign trust.

(Lewis's Sutherland Statutory Construction (2d ed.) sec. 87.)

The legislative power can not be delegated. The power to make laws for a State vested in the legislature is a sovereign power, requiring the exercise of judgment and discretion. It is a delegated power—delegated in a Constitution by the people in whom inherently are all the powers. On common law principles, as well as by settled constitutional law, it is a power which can not be delegated.

(Locke on Civil Government, sec. 142.)

These are the bounds which the trust that is put in them by the society and the law of God and nature have set to the legislative power of every Commonwealth in all forms of government: * * * Fourthly. The legislature neither must nor can transfer the power of making laws to anybody else or place it anywhere but where the people have.

(Hare's Am. Const. Law, p. 633.)

A legislative body can not so part with or delegate its powers as to preclude the resumption of them or their exercise whenever the public interest requires. It is an agent or trustee for the people and has no right to place the trust irrevocably in other hands than its own.

(Clark v. The Corp. of Washington, 12 Wheat, 54; the Presbyt. Church v. N. Y., 5 Cowen, 542; Phila. v. Fox, 64 Pa., 169, 181; Parker v. the Commonwealth, 6 Barr, 507.)

(P. 634.)

The legislature could not alienate any part of the legislative power which the Constitution vested in a general assembly annually convened. (Parker v. the Commonwealth, Pa., 507.)

CERTAIN TREATIES TO BE OPERATIVE MUST HAVE THE SANCTION OF AN ACT OF CONGRESS.

(4 Hinds' Precedents, sec. 1528.)

Attention is called to report of J. Randolph Tucker, chairman of the House Judiciary Committee, March 3, 1885, culminating in the offer of a resolution, viz:

Resolved, That the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, can not negotiate treaties with foreign Governments by which the duties levied by Congress can be changed or abrogated, and such treaties to be operative as law must have the sanction of an act of Congress.

RUFUS CHOATE ON THE DUTIES OF THE EXECUTIVE.

On June 14, 1844, Mr. Rufus Choate, from the Committee on Foreign Relations, to whom had been referred the convention with Prussia and the other States of the German association of customs and commerce, reported the same adversely. In the report the committee says: "The convention which has been submitted to the Senate changes duties which have been laid by law. It changes the ex directo and by its own vigor, or it engages the faith of the Nation and the faith of the legislature through which the Nation acts to make the change. In either aspect it is the President and the Senate who, by the instrumentality of negotiation, repeal or materially vary regulation of commerce and laws of revenue which Congress had ordained. More than this, the executive department places it beyond the power of Congress to exceed the stipulated maximum of import duties for at least three years, whatever exigency may intervene to require it.

"In the judgment of the committee the legislature is the department of government by which commerce should be regulated and the laws of revenue be passed. The Constitution, in terms, communicates the power to regulate commerce and to impose duties to that department. It communicates it, in terms, to no other. * * * The committee believes that the general rule of our systetm is indisputable that the control of trade and the function of taxing belong, without abridgment or participation, to Congress. They infer this from the language of the Constitution, from the nature and principles of our Government, from the theory of republican liberty itself, and from the unvaried practice, evidencing the universal belief of all, in all periods, and of all parties and opinions. They think, too, that, as the general rule, the Representatives of the people sitting in their legislative capacity, with open doors, under the eye of the country, communicating freely with their constituents, may exercise this power more intelligently, more discreetly, may acquire more accurate and more minute information concerning the employments and the interests on which this description of measures will press, and may better discern what true policy prescribes and rejects than is within the competency of the executive department of the Government.

"To follow, not to lead; to fulfill, not to ordain the law; to carry into effect, by negotiation and compact with foreign Governments, the legislative will when it has been announced upon the great subjects of trade and revenue; not to interpose with controlling influence, not to go forward with too ambitious enterprise—these seem to the committee to be the appropriate functions of the Executive. If Congress thinks the proposed arrangement a beneficial one, it is quite easy to pass a law which shall impose the rates of duty contemplated by it, to take effect when satisfactory information is conveyed to the President that the stipulated equivalents are properly secured."

Mr. FORDNEY. Mr. Chairman, I move that all debate on all amendments to section 3 now close.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. FISH) there were—ayes 111, noes 22.

Mr. FISH. Mr. Chairman, I demand tellers.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York demands tellers. Those in favor of ordering tellers will rise and stand until counted. [After counting.] Nine Members have risen, not a sufficient number, and tellers are refused. The question now is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Mississippi.

Mr. COLLIER. Mr. Chairman, I ask that it again be reported.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the amendment will be again reported.

There was no objection, and the Clerk again reported the amendment offered by Mr. COLLIER.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. COLLIER) there were—ayes 33, noes 114.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. FISH. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. FISH: Page 2, after line 25, add a new section, to be known as section 4 and to read as follows:

"That the commission is hereby directed to set aside all interest paid on various loans made by the Government of the United States to foreign Governments during the war as a separate fund for the purpose of providing adjusted compensation for the veterans of the World War, and any surplus shall be used for the purpose of redeeming Liberty bonds."

Mr. FORDNEY. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order against the amendment. It is entirely foreign to the matter contained in the bill. I am very much in favor of a soldier's bonus, but not at this time. I shall do my utmost to have this Congress consider a bonus bill during the regular session next winter.

Mr. FISH. Will the gentleman reserve the point of order?

Mr. FORDNEY. I withhold the point of order.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Regular order. I make the point of order—— [Cries of "Vote!"]

Mr. FORDNEY. I reserve the point of order.

SEVERAL MEMBERS. Regular order!

Mr. FISH. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, I am somewhat impatient with the attitude of certain Members of this House on the question of the generosity of the American people and the Congress of the United States in regard to the help rendered our allies in the World War. We spared no sacrifice of treasure or of blood to help win the war, and, as you know, we asked for no reparation, we asked for no indemnities, we asked for no territory; and we got just what we asked—nothing at all. Therefore I do not think it is right or fair to question our generosity and to ask that those Governments that are able to pay the interest on their debts should be relieved from that payment, the just payment of interest on the war loans. If Great Britain, which owes us approximately 40 per cent of the $11,000,000,000, would cease her enormous expenditure for naval construction involving four superdreadnaughts at $40,000,000 each, she would be in a sound financial position to pay her just debts at the present time.

The British Government, without making any real effort to pay the interest on the five billions owed the taxpayers of this country, has quietly proceeded to gain control of the commerce and trade of the world and to buy up the oil supply of Rumania, Galicia, Persia, and Mesopotamia.

Furthermore, with the very money we loaned Great Britain she paid adjusted compensation averaging from $140 to $7,290 to her ex-service men, whereas the United States plead poverty to escape a like obligation. She also paid standard unemployment wages for 12 weeks to discharged soldiers. Are not our ex-service men entitled to the same consideration for land settlement, home aid, vocational training, and insurance? Could we not well afford to issue interest-bearing debenture certificates, having a prior lien on the British war loan, to fulfill our obligation to our ex-service men, which has been recognized and fulfilled by every one of the allied countries and largely by good American dollars? In other words, England treated her soldiers properly with our money. Why should we consider the cancellation of any part of the British loan while she continues to build a powerful navy by means of money owed to America? She owes our taxpayers half a billion in back interest alone, yet her Government officials recently loaned fifty million to the Argentine Republic, to foster her trade relations with that country to our disadvantage.

I call your attention to this fact that adjusted compensation has been paid by every single allied nation to their soldiers partially with this very money loaned by our Government, and yet all that the Government of the United States has done for its soldiers is to give them the measly sum of $60. You have not provided for one cent more, and now you have an opportunity to provide that the interest on this debt shall go where it belongs, to those men who served their country in time of war and made the payment of the debt possible. It is practically impossible to raise several billion dollars by increased taxation or the issue of new bonds to fulfill this obligation, whereas the payment through the interest on the allied loans should be acceptable to all classes of business men and also to the veterans of the World War and to the general public. I believe that if you will accept this amendment and withdraw your point of order you will facilitate the payment by the Allies of the interest, because at the present time there is an extensive propaganda in England, in France, and other allied nations for the nonpayment of the interest and cancellation of the debt, and by calling attention of the allied soldiers to the fact that the American soldiers have not received one red cent of adjusted compensation you will facilitate the payment by those Governments of their just interest. It is self-evident, Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, that if this fact is brought to the attention of the allied soldiers they themselves will squelch the propaganda that is going broadcast throughout Europe to-day, while we are sitting here doing nothing for our own ex-service men.

Mr. FORDNEY. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that the gentleman is not discussing the point of order at all. I shall have to insist on making the point of order that the gentleman is not discussing the point of order. The amendment is not germane to the bill and the gentleman is not discussing the point of order.

Mr. FISH. Mr. Chairman, I would like to be heard on the point of order. [Cries of "Rule!"]

Mr. FISH. Can I be heard on the point of order?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will hear the gentleman on the point of order. Let the Chair ask the committee to be quiet in order that we may facilitate proceedings.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. I made the point of order, and I was informed five minutes ago that the gentleman would be heard on the point of order.

Mr. KELLEY of Michigan. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry. How much time has the gentleman from New York consumed?

The CHAIRMAN. There is no time to be disposed of. The Chair recognized the gentleman on the point of order, and if the gentleman proceeded out of order the gentleman or anybody else could have stopped him.

Mr. FISH. Mr. Chairman, I desire to address myself purely to the point of order. This amendment has to do simply with the dispensing of the interest through a separate fund to our ex-service men, the surplus to be set aside to redeem the Liberty bonds. The fundamental purpose of your bill is to provide for the payment of the interest. We all know, every Member of this House knows, that the allied countries are unable now and will be unable to pay the principal for many years. The bill under consideration provides for the funding of the loans, which means the payment of interest at regular maturing dates, and my amendment provides how to dispose of that interest. I submit that it is logical, that it is appropriate, that it is relevant, that it is akin, that it is germane, and, furthermore, I submit that if you incorporate this amendment you facilitate what you are trying to do—secure the payments of the interest in spite of the propaganda which covers a large part of Europe—and therefore my amendment has a very distinct bearing upon the bill. It will serve to notify the soldiers of France, England, and Italy who may be opposing the payment of interest——

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that the gentleman is not confining himself to the discussion of the point of order.

Mr. FISH (continuing). That this money will go as adjusted compensation to the soldiers of America, their comrades in arms. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is ready to rule.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, if the Chair will allow me, in addition the amendment is clearly an appropriation, and an appropriation can not be made on this bill. The gentleman from New York [Mr. FISH] makes a curious argument, not on the point of order but in support of his amendment, that as the Allies can not pay the interest on what they owe us, that we propose to turn over what they can not pay to the soldier boys. When we come to provide a bonus we will provide a more substantial bonus than something that can not be paid. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is ready to rule.

The Chair, from a consideration of similar cases, recognizes the fact that there is only one thing the Chair can do, and that is to sustain the point of order. It has been held several times that to a provision providing funds, or for the organization, or for the securement, or for a settlement of a claim, an amendment providing for its disposition shall not be in order. This, of course, is under the general rule which provides that no motion or proposition that is different from that under consideration shall be permitted under color of an amendment. This bill provides for the funding of an outstanding indebtedness. The amendment provides that the proceeds of the debts thus funded shall be used in a certain way; provides, in effect, for the payment or appropriation of such funds. The question, therefore, is whether or not the provision for the payment of a fund is germane to a provision for its securement or for its funding or for its settlement. Of course, that is another question. It is clear that to provide for the payment of a fund is not germane to provisions for its securement. This has been held in many cases. The Chair will only cite two cases, as indicative of their general character.

It was held by Speaker Clark as late as June, 1914, in the Sixty-third Congress, that—

To a proposition to sell two battleships and build a new battleship with the proceeds, a proposition to devote the proceeds to building wagon roads was held not germane.

In other words, the disposition of the funds other than in the way provided in the bill was not germane to the question under consideration.

Under a decision rendered by Chairman Fitzgerald, not so very long ago, during the same Congress, the decision of Mr. Fitzgerald held out of order as not germane a proposition to amend a bill providing that funds resulting from the sale of coal, phosphate, oil, gas, potassium, or sodium lands should be paid into the reclamation fund and disposed of in a certain way, by providing that the proceeds should be used to constitute a "national good-roads fund." That, of course, is almost directly in point. Certain funds are provided by the terms of the bill, and an amendment was offered to provide for the disposition of the funds in a certain way, which was held not to be germane. In this case outstanding indebtedness of the United States is refunded under certain provisions of the bill. It is proposed by the amendment to say how the proceeds of this funding operation, of these outstanding debts, when they are funded and paid, shall be made. The Chair holds that the objections raised are well founded, and that the amendment is not in order.

The Clerk will read.

The Clerk concluded the reading of the bill.

Mr. FORDNEY. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise and report the bill to the House with an amendment, with the recommendation that the amendment be agreed to and that the bill as amended do pass.

The motion was agreed to; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. TOWNER, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill H. R. 8762 and had directed him to report the same to the House with an amendment, with the recommendation that the amendment be agreed to and that the bill as amended do pass.

Mr. FORDNEY. Mr. Speaker, on that I move the previous question.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Michigan moves the previous question on the bill and amendment to final passage.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, and was read the third time.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the passage of the bill.

Mr. COLLIER. Mr. Speaker, I make the motion to recommit.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Mississippi moves to recommit. The Clerk will report the gentleman's motion.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. COLLIER moves to recommit the bill to the Committee on Ways and Means with instructions to report the same back forthwith, with the following amendment: Page 2, at the end of section 2, insert: "Provided, That no agreements so entered into with respect to any matters herein authorized shall be deemed to have been completed nor to have force and effect until it shall have been submitted to the Congress of the United States and embodied in a law passed by Congress."

Mr. COLLIER. On that, Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the motion to recommit.

The question was taken, and the Speaker announced that the noes appeared to have it.

Mr. COLLIER. Mr. Speaker, I call for the yeas and nays.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Mississippi calls for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The SPEAKER. As many as are in favor of the motion to recommit will, when their names are called, answer "yea"; those opposed will answer "nay."

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 132, nays 185, answered "present" 2, not voting 112, as follows:

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment as amended.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will report the next amendment passed over.

The READING CLERK. On page 38, line 13, the committee proposes to strike out the word "taxpayer" and the semicolon and insert the word "taxpayer," a colon, and the following proviso:

Provided, That in the case of returns made for the taxable year 1921 or 1922 there shall be allowed as a deduction interest paid or accrued during such taxable year and before January 1, 1922, on indebtedness incurred or continued to purchase or carry obligations of the United States issued after September 24, 1917, even though the interest therefrom is so wholly exempt.

The pending amendment is the amendment to the amendment offered by the senior Senator from Nebraska [Mr. HITCHCOCK], to strike out in line 19 the words "even though the interest therefrom is so wholly exempt."

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment to the amendment.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

Mr. TRAMMELL. I desire to offer an amendment to the amendment.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will report the proposed amendment.

The READING CLERK. On page 38, line 15, after the word "deduction," insert the following:

An amount equal to the difference between such interest upon obligations of the United States as is exempt from taxation and the amount of—

So the line will read:

There shall be allowed as a deduction an amount equal to the difference between such interest upon obligations of the United States as is exempt from taxation and the amount of interest paid or accrued.

And so forth.

Mr. TRAMMELL. Mr. President, as I construe the amendment proposed by the committee, it provides for a deduction of interest paid on account of indebtedness incurred for the purchase of obligations of the United States. The amendment in its present form allows that total deduction without taking into consideration the amount of interest received in return from the investment in the obligations of the United States. I can not believe that it is the purpose of the committee that the entire amount of interest so paid should be deducted regardless of the fact that the investor receives back from the Government on account of the interest upon the Government securities a certain amount of interest equal to as much as one-half in some instances and even more than one-half in other instances of the amount of interest paid out.

The purpose and object of my amendment is to have deduction apply only to the difference between the amount of interest that is paid on account of the indebtedness and the amount received from the Government on account of the obligations held by the investor. It seems to me this is a very plain proposition and one that should commend itself. If we permit the committee amendment to stand in its present form, then we allow a deduction of the entire amount of interest paid on account of investment, and also under other provisions of the bill permit to be tax free the interest received upon the Government securities. Certainly it was the purpose and object of the committee to do that, but in the present form of the bill that would be the consequence. For that reason I propose this amendment.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment to the amendment offered by the Senator from Florida.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, I should like to ask some member of the majority of the Finance Committee whether they agree to the statement made by the Senator from Florida?

Certainly if it is true that the taxpayer is allowed a deduction on interest received upon his bonds, and is allowed a deduction of the total interest that he may pay for the money which he borrows to purchase the bonds, he will have two deductions of interest. If he paid 6 per cent on the money borrowed and his bonds carried 4 per cent interest, he would have a deduction of 10 per cent, according to the contention of the Senator from Florida. I should like to ask some Senator on the other side of the Chamber, representing the Committee on Finance, whether the committee admit that contention?

Mr. SMOOT. No, Mr. President; we admit it only as to bonds on which there is no tax whatever imposed; in other words, the 3½ and 3¾ per cent bonds were issued and were sold to the American people free from all forms of taxation; in that case, and in that case only, the statement made by the Senator from Florida could apply; but as to all the other Government bonds which are taxable it does not apply.

While on my feet, Mr. President, I wish to say that we shall ask for a reconsideration of the vote whereby the amendment offered by the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. HITCHCOCK] was just agreed to. We might just as well strike out the entire provision as to strike out the words that have just been voted to be stricken out by the Senate. There was so much confusion in the Chamber at the time action was taken on the amendment that no Senator knew what the amendment was. The amendment was not discussed in any way, and I doubt whether there were half a dozen Senators in the Chamber who knew that it was the pending amendment.

Mr. PENROSE. Mr. President, I wish to confirm what the Senator from Utah now states. I was sitting here in my seat, and by some kind of mysterious maneuvering at the desk the amendment was passed without my realizing or knowing what was done.

Mr. SMOOT. I will ask the Senator from North Carolina if the statement which I have made was satisfactory to him?

Mr. TRAMMELL. Mr. President——

Mr. SIMMONS. Just one moment.

Mr. TRAMMELL. Will the Senator from North Carolina yield to me for one moment?

Mr. SIMMONS. Yes.

Mr. TRAMMELL. In the case as stated by the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT], would not my amendment still be applicable?

Mr. SMOOT. No.

Mr. TRAMMELL. If the bonds are taxable, then there would only be such deductions made from the amount of the indebtedness incurred on account of the borrowed money as the difference between the amount received from the bonds and the amount expended in interest on account of the money borrowed for the investment. That is the plain wording of my amendment.

Mr. SMOOT. No; the Senator's amendment goes further than that. The Senator's amendment applies to all 3½ and 3¾ per cent bonds which have been issued by the Government free from all forms of taxation. The object of the committee amendment is to allow deductions—on indebtedness incurred or continued to purchase or carry obligations of the United States issued after September 24, 1917.

The Senator's amendment includes all obligations of the Government; and I certainly do not believe that he would intend such a thing or even offer such an amendment if he knew what the effect of it would be. I will say to the Senator that when the 3½ per cent bonds and the Liberty bonds bearing 3¾ per cent interest were issued free from all forms of taxation it was understood that there would be no tax imposed upon them in any way, shape, or form. This committee amendment simply allows as a deduction the interest which is paid in order to carry those bonds for the years named; in fact, it merely amounts to a notice that the purchaser of bonds under such circumstances shall not be allowed the deduction hereafter; that the interest upon all such obligations—that is, the bonds bearing 3½ and 3¾ per cent interest—shall hereafter be taxable and the deduction can not be made as it has been made in the past.

Mr. REED. Will the Senator from Utah pardon me if I ask a question?

Mr. SMOOT. I yield to the Senator for that purpose.

Mr. REED. The amendment, like many other clauses in the pending bill, can not be understood except by some one who has been administering the tax laws—and I do not say that to criticize at all—but does the Senator from Utah understand that the effect of the amendment is, if I bought a thousand dollars' worth of Government bonds and went down to the bank and borrowed the money to pay for those bonds, that I should be allowed a deduction on account of the interest and be exempted from any tax on my income on those bonds, even though they are bonds that may be subject to taxation?

Mr. SMOOT. Under the committee amendment as it was originally agreed to, even though the interest on the bonds is wholly exempt from taxation, I will say to the Senator, the amount of interest which he would pay to the bank in order to carry those bonds might be deducted in the way of an exemption.

Mr. REED. From my other income?

Mr. SMOOT. From the Senator's other income or from the income from the bonds.

Mr. REED. Now, let us follow that for a minute merely for the sake of clarity. I think we shall get along better in this way than by making speeches about it. I buy $10,000 of Government bonds; I do not have the money to complete the purchase, and I go down to the bank and borrow $10,000 and pay 6 per cent interest upon the loan. When I come to make my income-tax return I put in all the items of my income, and then it is proposed that I shall be allowed to deduct the 6 per cent interest that I paid to the bank for the money to buy these bonds.

Mr. SMOOT. Tax-exempt bonds?

Mr. REED. Tax-exempt bonds, but not other bonds.

Mr. SMOOT. No; other bonds are not included in the provision.

Mr. REED. So that we have this kind of a situation: I have my bonds; I get 3½ per cent interest on them; and I do not have to count that as part of my income.

Mr. SMOOT. No. I will say to the Senator that the interest from a tax-exempt bond is not included as a part of the income for the purposes of taxation.

Mr. REED. Very well. I put in my pocket the $350 which I receive as interest on the $10,000 of 3½ per cent bonds, and then I am allowed to deduct from my income the $600 interest that I paid to the bank at the rate of 6 per cent on the $10,000 which I borrowed to pay for the bonds. So that I have an exemption, first, of my bonds that are nontaxable, and then I have in addition to that a credit against the remainder of my income for all the interest that I paid to the bank to carry the bonds. Is not that almost equivalent to giving me a double exemption?

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, it would be a double exemption provided the man could go to the bank and borrow the money at 3½ per cent, but no one can borrow money from a bank at 3½ per cent; on the contrary, it is necessary sometimes to pay as high as 8, 9, or 10 per cent, particularly in the case of a man who purchased 3½ per cent bonds.

Mr. REED. Let me follow that for just a moment further. What is proposed is this: Say that the 3½ per cent bond, which already is the highest rate of interest on tax-free Government bonds, except some of the old bonds that were issued before the war——

Mr. SMOOT. Interest of 3¾ per cent is the highest rate on Government bonds which are absolutely tax exempt.

Mr. REED. That is the highest rate except in the case of some of the old bonds that have special privileges. The proposition is to add to the privilege which those bonds already have the privilege to borrow money upon them for the purpose of carrying them.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. No, Mr. President; the Senator has got that wrong. I think if he will let me set forth the facts he will agree with me. In the first place, this controversy relates only to the year 1921. Heretofore any man in making his income-tax return has had the privilege of deducting all interest that he paid on all indebtedness.

Mr. SMOOT. Up to January 1, 1922.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Let me finish—the taxpayer has had the right to deduct all interest that he paid on any indebtedness. Under that situation the House felt that he ought not to deduct the interest that he paid on a debt secured by a tax-free bond, and so the House provided that he should not hereafter be allowed to deduct interest on a tax-free bond. The Senate Committee on Finance thought that would be unfair to those who have already been borrowing during the current year on tax-free bonds under the expectation that they could deduct their interest. So the Senate committe provided that the prohibition should not go into effect until next year, but that the old law should continue during the present year. The amendment which I proposed was to strike out the words "even though the interest therefrom is so wholly exempt." Probably the effect of my amendment is to kill the amendment of the Senate committee.

Mr. SMOOT. It does kill it, as I have already said.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I think it does kill it. So that, if nothing else is done, the House provision will remain, and anyone who has borrowed money during the current year on a security of a tax-free bond will not be allowed to deduct the interest which he has paid.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, ought he in any case to be allowed to deduct the whole of the interest? He has his tax-free bond drawing, we will say, 3½ per cent interest. Now, he borrows money with which to pay for that bond. He has to pay 6½ per cent for the money which he borrows. The 3½ per cent which he gets from the bond will offset 3½ per cent of the 6½ per cent; and it seems to me that it would be all of the concession that we ought to make if we allowed him to have free of taxation the difference between the interest upon his tax-free bond and the interest which he had to pay to borrow the money with which to purchase the bond. I suggest that to the Senator from Utah. That, it seems to me, would be the correct principle.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, the existing law gives the same credit up to January 1, 1922. Under the existing law that right exists now, and the provision in the bill simply gives notice that after January 1, 1922, the deduction shall not be allowed. The bondholder, however, has made his loan under existing law and has been carrying the obligations in order to hold his bonds. The interest upon the bond is 3½ per cent, and he has been paying, perhaps, 8 per cent on the loan. Next year we give him notice that we want him to know that he has got to change his obligations as they are now or else he will not be allowed to get credit for what the law allows him to-day; that is all there is to it. It seems to me no more than fair that the American people should have some notice in relation to the change in the law affecting loans which they have made for the purpose of carrying United States obligations. I can not make it any plainer than that.

Mr. SIMMONS. As I understand the Senator from Utah now, he bases the justice of this matter upon the fact that notice has not been given that the law would be changed.

Mr. SMOOT. That is a part of it.

Mr. SIMMONS. But I am asking the Senator if he does not think that the real concession ought to be the difference between the interest received on the tax-free bonds and the interest he is required to pay upon the money which he borrowed? Why should he be entitled to more than that? It is true that during the war we seemed to have allowed him more than that. Then we were dealing with this subject in a very liberal spirit; we were trying to encourage the purchase of Government bonds.

Mr. SMOOT. And the holding of Government bonds.

Mr. SIMMONS. But we are now three years away from the war. Most of these bonds were sold two or three years ago, and I assume that the great bulk of the obligations assumed for their purchase has been paid off. As the Senator suggests to me, probably all of them, or certainly a large part of them, have passed into the hands of men of wealth, who do not have to borrow the money with which to buy them; but undoubtedly there are some still outstanding. Now, we have reached the point when we can consider this matter from the standpoint of what is fair, what is just, and what is equitable. I can not see for the life of me, if you look at the matter from that standpoint, why we should allow the purchaser of those bonds an exemption on the interest which he pays when he borrows the money of any greater amount than the difference between the interest which he receives on the tax-free bond and the interest which he pays. If the Senator can conceive of any reason why there should be a greater exemption, I should like very much to have him discuss that phase of the matter.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I will say to the Senator that I think that if we were doing fairly we would not only go further than we have in this matter but we would follow out just the plan that is suggested by the Senator from North Carolina, and after the year 1922 we would allow the owner of these bonds a credit for the difference between the interest that he pays and the rate of interest upon the bonds; but we do not do that. We say, "You shall not have any credit after the year 1922"; but the object of it is to say to these people who are borrowing money to carry these obligations of the Government, "You must arrange your affairs now so that after the year 1922 there shall be no credit given you for the interest paid upon money borrowed to carry Government bonds." Of course this applies entirely to tax-exempt bonds.

I think that notice ought to be given, and I will join the Senator from North Carolina in an amendment to this part of the bill stating that after the year 1922 the owners of these bonds shall be given credit for the difference between the interest they pay and the interest on the bonds which they are carrying. That would be the fair proposition, but that is not what we are going to do. We are going to change the law and provide that after the year 1922 no credit at all shall be given, no matter if the interest is 7 or 8 or 9 per cent; it makes no difference; the money borrowed to carry those bonds shall not be deducted from their net income. I can not see anything in it but what would be perfectly fair and just.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, if the Senators who are interested in studying this matter will take the bill, on page 37, at line 21, they will get the context, which makes the proposition we are discussing reasonably plain. I will read it:

SEC. 214. (a) That in computing net income there shall be allowed as deductions—

Now turn over to paragraph (2) on page 38:

All interest paid or accrued within the taxable year on indebtedness, except on indebtedness incurred or continued to purchase or carry obligations or securities, the interest upon which is wholly exempt from taxation under this title as income to the taxpayer.

That was the House text; and under that if a man went to the bank and borrowed money on ordinary securities, when he made his income-tax return he would credit himself with the interest he had paid out. If he went down and borrowed on 4¼ per cent bonds, or if he borrowed on ordinary collateral of any kind, or if he borrowed on the 3¾ per cent bonds, he deducted the entire interest that he had paid out except in the case of the 3¾ per cent bonds. In that case, under the House text, as I understand, he was not allowed to deduct anything. He got 3¾ per cent for his bonds tax free; he was entitled to that; but he borrowed money upon those bonds at 6 or 7 or 8 per cent; and he was entitled in equity, I think, to a credit of the difference between the interest he paid and the interest that he received on the tax-exempt securities.

Now, however, it is proposed to add this language:

Provided, That in the case of returns made for the taxable year 1921 or 1922 there shall be allowed as a deduction interest paid or accrued during such taxable year and before January 1, 1922, on indebtedness incurred or continued to purchase or carry obligations of the United States issued after September 24, 1917, even though the interest therefrom is so wholly exempt.

That means that if a man has possession of a block of the nontaxable bonds he can take them to the bank and borrow money upon them, and he is exempt from any taxation upon the interest on the bonds, and then it is proposed to give him a credit for all of the interest he pays to the bank, although his net payment to the bank is in fact the difference between the interest the bank exacts and the interest he gets on the bonds. It is admitted that that ought not to continue; but it is said that it should be continued this year because people have been dealing with an understanding that it would be permitted.

Mr. President, that does not appeal to me. The Government made a contract with the purchaser of these bonds. That contract was perfectly plain. They were to have these particular bonds tax free. We keep that contract when we allow them to hold the bonds in great or in small amounts and not return as a part of their income any interest charged upon them. That has already given to those bonds such an advantage in value that although they bear a less rate of interest than the bonds subsequently issued they sell at a higher rate in the market. What contract did we make with the purchasers of those bonds which obligated us to say: "We will give to those bonds an additional advantage, namely, if you go and borrow money upon them we will allow you, first, to exempt the interest upon the bonds and then to credit yourself with the interest upon the money you borrowed to carry the bonds." That is giving to them an additional and artificial advantage.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, if the Senator will yield, in answer to the Senator I want to say that the Government of the United States not only made a contract by the passage of the law that gave the citizen that right, but in every circular that was issued by the Treasury Department of the United States appealing to the people of the United States to purchase these 3¾ per cent Victory bonds they pointed out specifically that not only could the purchaser go and borrow money upon the bonds to carry them, but he would have whatever interest was paid upon his loan by way of a deduction or an exemption from the amount of his income.

Mr. REED. If the Treasury sent out a circular of that kind, I should like to see it. I should like, first, though, to see the thing we can get at, and that is the clause of the law. If that is the law, it has escaped my attention.

Mr. SMOOT. I will get a copy of the circular, and I ask that it be put in the RECORD at this time.

Mr. REED. Very well; but is there a clause in the law to that effect?

Mr. SMOOT. The law is that way to-day.

Mr. REED. Oh, no; the law to-day, the law that we passed with reference to the sale of these bonds, was that the bonds should be issued tax free; but that does not mean that you can borrow money upon them tax free, and that the interest you pay for the money you borrow to carry them shall be credited upon your income.

Mr. SMOOT. Why, Mr. President, the law specifically states that whatever interest is paid shall be deducted from the income. Here is what it says——

Mr. REED. The law that was passed at that time?

Mr. SMOOT. Yes; I will read the law.

Mr. REED. I am not familiar with it.

Mr. SMOOT (reading):

All interest paid or accrued within the taxable year on indebtedness, except on indebtedness incurred or continued to purchase or carry obligations or securities (other than obligations of the United States issued after September 24, 1917), the interest upon which is wholly exempt from taxation under this title as income to the taxpayer, or, in the case of a nonresident alien individual, the proportion of such interest which the amount of his gross income from sources within the United States bears to the amount of his gross income from all sources within and without the United States.

Mr. REED. What is the date of that law?

Mr. SMOOT. This is the act of 1918.

Mr. REED. And these bonds were sold when—before that law was passed?

Mr. SMOOT. The Liberty bonds? Let me see if this is the act of 1918. I will see just the date of this law.

Mr. REED. I meant that as an inquiry. It sounds like an assertion in the record, but I meant it as an inquiry.

Mr. SMOOT. I will say to the Senator that this is the act of 1918, passed in February, 1919.

Mr. REED. Is it the Liberty loan act?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Oh, no.

Mr. REED. Is that the act under which these bonds were issued and sold?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Absolutely, no.

Mr. SMOOT. Why, no.

Mr. SIMMONS. No; this is the revenue act.

Mr. REED. A subsequent act?

Mr. SMOOT. Yes.

Mr. REED. I am talking about the contract with the man who bought the bonds. The Government came to the people of the United States on a certain day and said, "We must have money. Buy these bonds, and they will be tax free." The citizen bought them. The Government is under a solemn obligation that those bonds shall remain tax free, and we must not violate that contract; but if a law was subsequently passed which gave the man who was going to pay the income tax the right to put those bonds up with a bank, and then have his interest deducted, which was our contract, and then have a credit upon his income tax of the amount of money he borrowed to carry the bonds, that is not a contract; that is a benefaction subsequently conferred upon him by the law.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for just a moment?

Mr. REED. I yield to the Senator from Wisconsin.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I want to remind the Senator that that is one of the provisions which was put into the law of 1918 as the result of a controversy. Contention was made that it ought not to go in. It was in and out a number of times during the passage of that bill through the House and the Senate. It was put in in the interest of speculators, and to give an added advantage to the holders of those bonds, and it is proposed by this provision still further to extend it.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I would like to ask the Senator from Missouri a question.

Mr. REED. Certainly.

Mr. WILLIAMS. And I direct the question also to the Senator from Utah. I ask it simply for my own information. Do I understand that what is being contended for is that if a man has a tax-exempt bond upon which he draws 3½ per cent interest, he may carry that bond to somebody and borrow money at 6 per cent on it, and that then he will be allowed to exempt that 6 per cent from taxation in addition to the 3½ per cent?

Mr. SMOOT. No; not in addition to the 3½ per cent.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Wait a minute. Leaving out the words "in addition," because there might be an argument, do I understand the proposition is that if I hold, as I happen to do, some of those first bonds, if I go to a bank and borrow money and pay 6 per cent interest upon that, I am to exempt my 6 per cent as a substitute for the exemption of the 3½?

Mr. SMOOT. No; not as a substitute for it.

Mr. REED. You get both of them exempted.

Mr. WILLIAMS. If it is not an addition or a substitute, I still am allowed an exemption in some way?

Mr. SMOOT. The interest upon the bond itself is exempted from taxation, as well as the interest on the money you borrow, no matter whether it was upon the obligation or not.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Is it possible under this proposed law for me to have an exemption from an income tax upon 6 per cent that I am paying on the money I borrowed on the bonds upon the ground that the original bond which was floated at 3½ was exempt from taxes?

Mr. SMOOT. If the Senator has paid any interest upon any money borrowed for that purpose, I think that in making up his income tax return he has deducted it from his income in the past, under the law of 1918.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Of course, that is purely a personal question. I have not done so, because I did not know I had a right to do it. I probably would have done it if I had known I had the right to.

Mr. SMOOT. The experts who made out the Senator's return should have told him that.

Mr. WILLIAMS. In making out my income tax returns, I have simply failed to give any account to the Government of my income upon United States exempt bonds. I have simply stated that I held a certain number of them which were exempt, but I never have claimed as a deduction or an exemption, in any way, anything I borrowed upon the bonds, mainly because I never borrowed anything on them.

Mr. SMOOT. I thought that was probably the case.

Mr. WILLIAMS. But I would not have thought of it. I would not have known it was the law, if it is the law, and I would have considered it a very unfair thing to do. Of course, I have not paid an income tax upon that part of my income which has proceeded from the interest upon Liberty bonds, and the only way I can think of in which you would avoid paying would be by not returning them as subject to taxation. I have named them, but have claimed that they were not subject to taxation, and have deducted the interest on them from my general income.

If we are going to have a state of things under which a man can claim exemption of the 3½ per cent he gets on a Government bond, and then can also claim a reduction from his general income of the amount of money which he has paid as interest to a bank when he has borrowed money from the bank upon the strength of the bonds as security, that would seem to be eminently unjust.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, the Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED] is entirely right about this matter. This exemption is not a part of the contract. This exemption, as I said a little while ago, is a mere concession to the purchasers of these bonds. It was put into the act of 1918. In 1917, while the war was on, while our expenses were heavier than at any other period of our venture, we floated an enormous quantity of bonds. We had floated some the year before. Those bonds, it was represented to the committee, were, in the first instance, taken as a rule by the banks of the country and sold by the banks to their customers on the installment plan, the banks agreeing that they would sell so many of these bonds, and advising their depositors, for the purpose of inducing them to purchase them, that if they would purchase them they would lend them the money with which to pay and allow them to pay it back in installments.

It was said, "These installments have not been paid. The banks and the purchasers of these bonds were trying to help the Government out, and we ought to be as generous with them as possible under the circumstances." The act of 1918 was passed for the purpose of relieving what you might call that emergency situation, because it was said that if those gentlemen were forced to pay up their indebtedness to the banks right away they would have to surrender their bonds, and their efforts to help the Government would result in loss to them. We did not scrutinize it very closely.

Mr. SMOOT. Will the Senator yield?

Mr. SIMMONS. I yield.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, in looking at this amendment more in detail I see that it is simply to carry out just exactly what I said I thought would be perfectly fair after 1922. I have no objection to accepting the amendment just as the Senator from Florida has offered it and letting it apply even to the year 1921.

Mr. SIMMONS. I think that is all they can ask at this time.

Mr. SMOOT. I am perfectly willing to accept it in that way. I do not want to give these men one single penny's advantage, not a penny's advantage.

Mr. PENROSE. Let us accept it and dispose of it.

Mr. SMOOT. I am perfectly willing, if the Senator is.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment to the amendment.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. TRAMMELL. Mr. President, I desire to propose a further amendment to this section of the bill.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will state the amendment.

The ASSISTANT SECRETARY. After the numerals "1917," in line 19, page 38, the Senator from Florida proposes to insert the following proviso:

Provided, That no deduction shall be allowed for interest on such indebtedness so incurred or continued for the purchase of or to carry obligations of the United States where the taxpayer did not pay par or more than par for the said obligations of the United States.

Mr. SMOOT. Does the Senator desire to speak on his amendment?

Mr. TRAMMELL. If the Senator from Utah desires to speak first, I will follow him.

Mr. SMOOT. No; I will not speak now, except to say that we could not accept that amendment.

Mr. TRAMMELL. As I understand the object and purpose of this amendment as proposed by the committee, allowing the deduction of interest paid upon indebtedness incurred for the purchase of United States obligations, it is that those patriotic citizens who came to the rescue and the support of the Government during the war shall be allowed the exemption of interest upon money which they borrowed for the purpose of assisting the Government through purchasing those obligations. The citizen who purchased the obligations of the United States paid par for those obligations. If we desire to allow him the deduction, and I think it is very proper, where, as a patriotic duty, although he did not have the funds with which to purchase the bonds, he went and borrowed the money with which to make the purchase, he should be allowed the deduction. We will, under my amendment, reach that class of American citizens. My amendment provides that if a man purchased the bonds at par he shall be allowed this deduction.

If we do not write into this provision a clause of this kind, what will be the result of the committee amendment in its present form? Every speculator who has gone into the bond market since the war, or who is now in the bond market, purchasing bonds at the ridiculously low price at which they are selling, if he uses borrowed capital for that purpose, will be allowed that as a deduction. He will be rewarded for his speculation in bonds at a ridiculously low price, just the same as the patriotic citizen who paid par will be recognized for purchasing those bonds during the crucial hours of the Government.

I think it is proper to treat with the citizen who borrowed money to buy bonds for the purpose of assisting his Government, as the amendment proposes; but I think it is highly improper for the Government to throw its protection around and to give its encouragement to bond speculators by saying to them, "If you borrow money to purchase Government securities, we will deduct from your income all the money you use for the purpose of borrowing that money; and, furthermore, you will be allowed the privilege of the governmental exemption on those bonds, and we also give you, as a little inducement as a speculator or as a bond shark, a credit of the money you borrowed for the purpose of carrying the investment."

I seek to have that prevented under the provisions of this bill. That is the purpose and object of the amendment.

Mr. SMOOT. Just one word, Mr. President. If the amendment was carried out, it would be a burden upon hundreds of thousands of people, I suppose, in the United States who bought these bonds originally in good faith.

I know of a man who purchased $100,000 worth of the 3½ per cent bonds. I know he signed a note with another party at a New York bank——

Mr. REED. What did he pay?

Mr. SMOOT. I will tell what he paid. He signed a note with another party, and a demand was made by the bank upon the party, and I know that man had to sell his bonds to meet that note, and I know that the man purchased the same amount of 3½ per cent bonds about six months afterwards to replace them.

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. Who is the man?

Mr. SMOOT. I am not saying who the man is. I know he again purchased the same amount of 3½ per cent bonds, and I know that in that six months he lost in the deal, and he is carrying in the 3½ per cent bonds exactly the amount he had originally. The amendment of the Senator would cut him out entirely, and I know many men and women have been forced to sell their obligations for some special reason, and in every case of that kind, if the Senator's amendment were put into operation, there would be an absolute violation of the contract entered into between the purchaser and the Government of the United States when the bonds were purchased.

Mr. TRAMMELL. Does not the Senator also know that under the provisions of the amendment, as proposed by the committee, the speculators and the bond sharks of the country will be protected and have exemption of the interest on money that they may have borrowed for the purpose of going around and buying up the bonds at a ridiculously low price, and will also get an exemption of the interest as provided in the committee amendment?

Mr. SMOOT. No; the committee have accepted the amendment of the Senator from Florida that equalizes the difference between 3½ per cent or 3¾ per cent on the bonds and the amount of interest that the taxpayer paid, and that is ample.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, that does not meet the question at all. By way of preliminary, repeating in part what the Senator from Florida just said, when the Government appealed to the people of the country to buy these bonds and the patriotic people came forward with their money, or if they did not have money went to the banks and borrowed it, they all paid par for their bonds. The amendment of the Senator from Florida proposes to allow those people who did pay par for their bonds to have the right to borrow money to carry them and to have a credit for the difference between the interest they receive on the bonds and the interest they are obliged to pay to carry them if they bought at par.

After those bonds had been sold and the people of the country had taken them at par they began to be bought up at a discount by speculators. For a time, at least, the bonds were so greatly discounted that the interest paid by the Government of 3 and 3¾ per cent enabled the discount purchaser to realize upon his investment approximately 5½ to 6 per cent. They were bought in enormous quantities by two classes of people. One class was the bond speculator and the other was the individual who purchased the bonds because they were tax exempt and he wanted to get his money into something that did not bear any taxes. He was the man with the very large income or the very large estate.

The proposition as it now stands in the bill will allow the individual who bought the bonds at par and who had to borrow the money to collect his interest on the Government tax-free bonds and to have a credit upon his income of the difference between the interest he receives from the Government and the interest he pays the bank for carrying the bonds if he bought at par, and that would leave him so that he would come out of the transaction whole. But if he bought those bonds so that he realizes in fact a net return from the Government bonds of 5 or 6 per cent because he got them at so low a price, then that speculator is still given an advantage by the bill as amended, for he will get his 6 per cent from the Government, he will not turn in a cent of it, because it is all tax exempt, and then he will get an exemption upon the interest he paid the bank minus the 3¾ per cent interest that the bonds bear upon their face.

Now, that is not fair. The amendment of the Senator from Florida covers that kind of a case. The Senator from Utah spoke pathetically of somebody who bought these bonds and afterwards had to sell them at a discount. The man who had to sell his bonds does not have his bonds to borrow money on.

Mr. SMOOT. He does if he purchases them back.

Mr. REED. If he goes and purchases them back, of course.

Mr. SMOOT. I know of hundreds of people who did that.

Mr. REED. If he purchased them back and he did so at a discount. The way this will work out will be as follows: A man takes $9,000 and purchases $10,000 worth of bonds. He gets from the Government $350 of interest and he credits that to himself and pays no tax on it. He borrows $9,000 from the bank to carry the transaction at 6 per cent, which is $540, and he deducts from that the $350 of interest he got from the Government and he is ahead in the transaction.

Now, what is there wrong about saying to the man who speculated in those bonds and who got them at a discount, "If you did that, you can not charge up an exemption. We will extend the exemption to the man who patriotically borrowed money to buy bonds from the Government and bought them from the Government at par. We will not extend it to the man who went into the market and got the bonds and took whatever advantage he could in the market of the man who had bought them from the Government. We will not give him the advantage of this exemption."

I say that the amendment of the Senator from Florida is not only wise and proper, but it is consistent with the spirit of the very amendment we have adopted.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. President, the amendment offered by the Senator from Florida makes a very strong appeal to a certain sentiment which I can understand and comprehend, but I think before we pass on it we ought to view it from a broader standpoint than that related by the Senator from Florida and the Senator from Missouri.

This apparently is an attempt to discriminate between the holders of bonds. The holder or purchaser in the first instance is to enjoy a certain privilege, but if another citizen happens to be a purchaser in the second instance of the same bond, the Government will say to him, "You shall not enjoy that same privilege." Great emphasis is placed upon the terms "speculation" and "speculator."

Mr. TRAMMELL. Will the Senator permit a question?

Mr. WADSWORTH. Certainly.

Mr. TRAMMELL. If he paid par or more for those bonds subsequently, he is allowed a deduction just the same as the original purchaser.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Yes; but the fact is that scarcely any of the second or third purchasers paid par. If the bonds were not worth par, why should he pay par?

We are trying to cure an unfortunate situation resulting from a decline in the value of Liberty bonds by inserting in the tax law a discrimination between those who paid par in the first instance and those who did not pay as much as par in the second instance. I am not sorry for those who paid less than par. The person I have in mind, who should be protected under the law so far as the law can do it in consonance with sound finance, is the original purchaser. The original purchaser paid 100 cents on the dollar. The law is going to permit him to get an exemption on the money which he put up, which he borrowed to pay for that bond at the rate of 100 cents on the dollar.

The time has often come in the past, and it may often come in the future, when he is compelled to sell. If the bond market will not bring him 100 cents on the dollar, of course, he must sell at less than par. He goes to the prospective purchaser and wants to sell his bonds. The purchaser will say to him, "I can not give you as much as I could before Congress passed that law the other day, because when I buy these bonds I can not get any exemption for the money that I borrow to pay for them; therefore I will give you less than ever for the bonds for which you paid originally 100 cents on the dollar."

I fear that this will tend to decrease the value of bonds still in the hands of those who paid 100 cents on the dollar, and those are the people whom I would like to see protected.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, if the Senator from New York came to me to sell me a bond and the amendment now proposed had been adopted and was the law and I proposed to shave that bond, he would immediately say to me, "If you do not shave this bond you can go down and borrow the money and you can have a full credit for the interest that you paid to get the bond, but if you do shave the bond you can not have that advantage, and therefore you had better pay me par." So I think the argument of the Senator and the situation he states will work exactly the reverse of the way he suggests.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Yes; if the market was a seller's market, but suppose the market is a buyer's market; then the holder is helpless.

Mr. REED. Certainly he is helpless. Let us see where we end with the Senator's argument. The Senator's argument, if it is a correct one, ought to be applied not to this year, but it ought to continue throughout in order to give value to the bonds for the benefit of the poor seller. But it is not proposed to do that in the bill. It is proposed that this advantage given to these bonds shall cease at the end of a year, so that at the end of that time the poor seller will be in the very situation of which the Senator speaks as being one which he thinks might be unfortunate. His argument, if it be sound, ought to result in continuing the present law, which was passed, of course, for the benefit of those who were dealing in these bonds.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Does the amendment of the Senator from Florida apply only for a year?

Mr. REED. The whole amendment of the committee as it now stands. The committee itself proposes to end this in a year. The question now before us is what we are going to do during that year.

Mr. WADSWORTH. During the remainder of the year.

Mr. REED. Yes; the remainder of the year.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I am discussing the matter entirely from the standpoint of the principle involved, and if the principle of the Senator's amendment is sound for six weeks or two months, it is sound indefinitely. I do not like to see any discrimination made even for that short period.

Mr. TRAMMELL. Mr. President, is not the same true of the amendment proposed by the committee? If it is sound for six weeks or six months, is it not sound indefinitely? Why does the committee propose to terminate after 1922 the policy carried in the amendment? So far as my amendment is concerned, my amendment will not be necessary after 1922, because the special privilege and favoritism which is sought to be given to these money borrowers and speculators by the provisions of the committee amendment will terminate in 1922. Then they will not be allowed any deduction on account of the borrowed money.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Irrespective of the merits of the committee amendment, at least it is not guilty of discriminating between bondholders.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, I do not think it can be logically contended that there is discrimination between classes of bondholders in the amendment offered by the Senator from Florida [Mr. TRAMMELL]. This concession was granted for the benefit of the original purchasers and to induce the purchase of these bonds. The reason for granting it does not apply to a subsequent purchaser who purchases for less than par; indeed, the reason does not apply to the subsequent purchaser at all. When the reason for a law ceases to operate, then the law should cease to apply.

It seems very clear to me that, while the original purchaser of such bonds was justified in asking that concession from the Government under the circumstances which existed at the time, the purchaser of those bonds to-day, when some of them are selling in the market from 10 to 15 per cent less than their par value, certainly has no right in law, in equity, or in conscience to come to Congress and say, "You should permit me to deduct from my taxes interest that I paid upon money with which to buy these bonds at 15 per cent below par."

Mr. President, if that principle is to be recognized and this gratuity of the Government is to be granted to that class of taxpayers, it will mean that we offer an inducement to men to buy such securities at 15 per cent less than par, borrowing money for the purpose, as a means of escaping taxation, the purchaser to escape to the extent of the entire interest which he pays upon the borrowed money after having made a profit of 15 cents on the dollar upon the transaction.

I think the Senator from Florida needs to safeguard his amendment in that respect; I do not think the Senator's amendment in its present form quite safe in that particular; that is, it does not provide that the man who is denied this exemption should be some one other than the original purchaser. I suggest to the Senator that he modify his amendment by striking out the language in lines 4 and 5 and inserting in lieu thereof the words "when held by a taxpayer who purchased them for less than par." Then such relief would only extend to the original purchaser, or to a purchaser who has purchased bonds at full par value; and none of them are now being sold for par.

Mr. TRAMMELL. Will the Senator from North Carolina be kind enough again to state the modification which he proposes to my amendment?

Mr. SIMMONS. I will read the Senator's amendment as it would stand with the modification I propose:

Provided, That no deduction shall be allowed for interest on such indebtedness so incurred or continued for the purchase of or to carry obligations of the United States when held by a taxpayer who purchased them for less than par.

Mr. TRAMMELL. I think that covers the object that I had in view. I have no choice of phraseology as to the amendment. It seems to me that the modification of the amendment proposed by the Senator from North Carolina is all right, although I think my amendment also very thoroughly covers the point.

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. Mr. President——

Mr. SIMMONS. Just one word further, and I will yield to the Senator from Georgia.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. SPENCER in the chair). Does the Senator from Florida accept the suggestion of the Senator from North Carolina as to a modification of his proposed amendment?

Mr. TRAMMELL. I will hear the further explanation of the Senator from North Carolina before I accept his modification of my amendment, Mr. President.

Mr. SIMMONS. I was not going further to explain the modification of the Senator's amendment which I had proposed. I was merely going to submit a further observation.

Mr. TRAMMELL. Then, I will say that the modification of my amendment which has been proposed by the Senator from North Carolina is agreeable to me, Mr. President.

Mr. SIMMONS. Now, Mr. President, I yield to the Senator from Georgia [Mr. WATSON].

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Florida [Mr. TRAMMELL] as modified to the amendment of the committee.

Mr. TRAMMELL. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. I thought I was recognized by the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The absence of a quorum is suggested. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Assistant Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Seventy-three Senators have answered to their names. There is a quorum present. The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Florida [Mr. TRAMMELL] as modified to the amendment reported by the committee.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, I desire to consume about from three or five minutes in uttering a thought that occurred to me upon yesterday and that I would have uttered then had it not been for Senatorial obstruction.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, I ask for order in the Chamber.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Mississippi will suspend until the Senate is in order. [A pause.] The Senator from Mississippi will proceed.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, I never intended by malice prepense to offend the Senate so far as to insist upon its being in order. I never would myself have called it to order. The natural state of the Senate is disorder, of course, and I so frequently share in that disorder that I never call the Senate to order.

I want to say something that I thought of yesterday and was prevented from saying, and I want to say it especially to my side of the Chamber. I think the country is tired of this endless Senatorial talk about this bill. The bill is a misbirth. It is pretty nearly an abortion. I doubt if there is a single Member of this body who would say upon his honor that he approved of this bill, either in its present shape or in any past shape that it hitherto has held; but at the same time, Mr. President, the American people have a right to know under what revenue laws they are going to live, right or wrong, wise or foolish, stupid or otherwise; and as one of the American people, I am getting tired with them of this constant and everlasting talkativeness about things that nearly everybody has made up his mind about.

I know, almost with vivid distinctness, how I am going to vote upon almost every proposition that has been suggested, and upon nearly every one that could be suggested. I think every Republican knows and every Democrat knows and every Independent, if there be any, knows and every Progressive—whatever that means—knows that much. I want to make an appeal to both sides of the Chamber to go to more voting and less talking, and to let the American consumers and the American taxpayers find out where they are. It seems to me that we are not only uselessly consuming time, but we are disgusting the American people with their authorized parliamentary body, with their authorized representative voice. They are tired of hearing every day little discussions between Senator A and Senator X concerning something that is the difference betwixt tweedledum and tweedledee, and they are also tired—although that reflects upon the honor of the people rather than upon this body—of hearing discussions of right and wrong. It is a pity that the American people are tired of hearing discussions concerning right and wrong in connection with taxation matters, but they are. They are as a Nation—this "incalculable Yankee Nation," as Tom Carlyle called them—people who are seeking their business interests of some description. They ought not to be that sort of people, but they are, and, being that, they are tired of this whole thing; and although I do not agree with them in their materialistic measurement of public questions, I am tired of it, too.

I want to make an appeal, therefore, to all the Members of this body to get down to voting upon all these amendments and upon this bill, and get it out of the way, not only out of the Senate's way but out of the Nation's way, and not only out of the Nation's way but out of the civilized world's way, because all of the business earth is awaiting, to a certain extent, upon what we are purporting to do or alleging to do or pretending to do or doing, one or the other, I hardly know which.

All of this I wanted to say yesterday afternoon for the purpose of urging the Senate to "accelerate itself," as a distinguished New York politician said when he confessed that he received $10,000 "for the purpose of accelerating public opinion." I should like to see the Senate act. Let us get through and go home and try to learn something from the people, if we are capable of learning anything from them, which is doubtful, or if they are capable of teaching us anything, which is still more doubtful; but let us get rid of the bill, get it out of the way, be done with it. We have discussed it now about three months, I believe, and I, for one, am tired of it. I am homesick, want to see my grandchildren and the flowers before the latter fade.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, I have heard it frequently said, not only in this Chamber but on the outside, that never before has a discussion upon a great bill in the United States Senate resulted in such a change of sentiment, all looking toward the improvement of the bill as originally presented.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, will the Senator permit an interruption?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from North Carolina yield to the Senator from Mississippi?

Mr. SIMMONS. I do.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I agree perfectly with that. I think the discussion has amended this bill very much, and I think that all of us can meet it in its amended form now with votes.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, on yesterday we had discussion. We voted yesterday upon several very important amendments. This morning we opened with the presentation by the Senator from Florida [Mr. TRAMMELL] of an amendment which, when it was first presented, had in the eyes of members of the majority of the committee no merit; but after not prolonged discussion—not irrelevant discussion, but direct discussion—Senators on the other side who had originally opposed it conceded the justice of the proposition and accepted the amendment. Now we are discussing another amendment. We have devoted only a few minutes to it, and I am quite sure that as the result of the discussion Senators on both sides of the Chamber see this matter with reference to the second amendment in a different light from that in which they saw it in the beginning.

The discussions on these amendments must take place when the amendments are offered. Nobody knew that the Senator from Florida was going to offer this amendment. In this particular instance I knew it; he showed it to me; but as a general rule Senators did not know it until he presented it, and there was no opportunity to discuss it until its presentation.

Mr. TRAMMELL. Mr. President, will the Senator yield? I will state in that connection for the information of the Senator that I sent both of these amendments to the desk and had them printed, including the one presented this morning, on October 11; but this is the first opportunity we have had to reach them.

Mr. SIMMONS. That is true. There are a number of amendments on the Clerk's desk that not five Senators in this body have seen. They know nothing about them until they are presented on the floor of the Senate. They are not in order until they are reached. The amendment that the Senator now offers was not in order until this morning. No unnecessary time has been occupied in its discussion, and as we go on with this bill amendments will be offered; not only the amendments of the committee but individual amendments will be offered upon the floor of the Senate. If the amendments have merit, if the amendments present questions of dispute, surely we ought to discuss them not in a desultory way, not in an irrelevant way, but directly, and I think that is all we have been doing.

Of course, a great bill like this can not be considered without many irrelevant things being injected. Senators have the right when any bill is under consideration to get up and speak upon any subject they want to, and nobody can restrain them. I think nobody wants to restrain them.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, did the Senator ever see them stick closer to a bill than this one?

Mr. SIMMONS. I never have in all my life; and it is not our purpose and it has not been our practice here to give more than proper discussion to these matters that have been under consideration by the Senate. The discussion has resulted, first, in the majority members of the Finance Committee going into their rooms in secret and adopting forty-odd new amendments and bringing them in here. It has resulted in the majority members of the committee presenting to the Senate propositions with reference to the vital things in this bill wholly different and very much better than the propositions originally presented. I have never known a bill to be so radically changed, and we are not half through with the amendments. We are not half through with the committee amendments yet. I have never known a bill of this consequence to be so radically changed as the result of the discussion on both sides of this Chamber as this bill has been changed, and the changes in every instance have been in the interest of the people.

Under those circumstances for a Senator to stand up here and say that this discussion has been idle and futile it seems to me must be attributed to the fact that he probably has not been aware of what has been going on or has not kept up with it.

Mr. HEFLIN and Mr. WILLIAMS addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Alabama.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. President, this is a very important amendment. It affects very vitally hundreds and thousands of people in the country who have bought bonds at par. Those who came in the time of their country's peril and purchased these bonds for the purpose of supplying to the Government the money necessary to carry on the war are entitled to consideration at the hands of the Congress. They ought to be aided by the provision suggested in the amendment of the Senator from Florida [Mr. TRAMMELL].

I appreciate the solicitude of the distinguished Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT] for these small bondholders, suggesting that some of them had to borrow money to pay for their bonds and finally lost their bonds. There are thousands and tens of thousands who came up from their homes in good faith and bought bonds—some of them mortgaged their homes to secure money to buy bonds—to help win the war. They were told, as I said on yesterday, that those bonds would always be at par, that they were as good as gold, that if they needed money on them they could borrow money at the banks, and there would be no trouble about it. They responded nobly and purchased the Government bonds. They supplied the necessary sinews of war, and then retired to their homes in the various sections of the country. Then what did we see, with your party in power in both branches of Congress? We saw a Federal Reserve Board that controls the money supply and credit of the country inaugurate a deflation policy that drove the bonds out of the hands of the small bondholder.

I believe that the Federal Reserve Board proceeded with that deflation policy in part for the benefit of the bond sharks of Wall Street. That is a pretty severe term to apply to them, but I am applying it. They knew what effect that policy would have; and what happened? The poor little fellow who held a bond could not borrow money on his cotton. He could not borrow money on his cattle, and he could not borrow money on his grain; and what did he do? His good wife said to him, "John, I believe I would borrow some money on your Liberty bond. You have a $500 bond. Go down to the bank and see what you can do with it." He went down to the bank with the gilt-edged security of this Government, a gold bond, and presented it, where he was told when he purchased it that he could present it and obtain money; and what did they tell him?

They said, "The Federal Reserve Board will not allow us to lend money on Government securities. They have stopped that."

He said, "I have got to have some money. I do not want to sell my produce. It is selling now in the market for less than it cost me to produce it, and that will kill my business, and I do not want to do that if I can help it. Can you not help me get some money on my bond?"

They said, "We would be glad to, but we are tied up with loans. All the money we have is tied up, and the Federal Reserve Board has established a deflation policy which stops money from coming, and we just haven't got it. If they would let us have it we would let you have it on your cotton and your cattle and your grain, but they will not let us have it."

"Will you not lend it to me on my bond?"

"We would if we had it, but they will not let us have it on Government bonds."

Then he said, "Well, I will have to sell it."

They said, "We don't want to buy your bond. We haven't got any money to buy your bond. But there are several men in Wall Street who will buy it, and I will see what I can do for you."

So they took the matter up with them, and the Wall Street sharks sent down their statement to the effect that they would pay only $85 on the $100. Senators, think of that. Some of them sold for $84 on the $100. So those fellows whom the provisions of this bill would protect are the cruel and merciless bond sharks who already have bought those bonds for nearly $20 on the hundred under par and are now seeking to escape through the tricky and confusing provisions to be found in this mysterious tax bill which has been brought into this Chamber.

Mr. President, I am condemning the Federal Reserve Board. I am condemning its bold and brazen robber scheme which resulted in the loss of billions of dollars to the South and the West, and I do not propose to be a party to their crime by putting a premium on their inexcusable conduct, and that is what you are doing when you let the Wall Street bond sharks escape through this provision. The legislative body is putting the stamp of its approval upon what the Federal Reserve Board did; you are hugging that board to your bosom to-day, I repeat, after it is discredited before the eyes of honest business men all over the South and West.

Now you come in and ask us to let the provision which you brought in here shield their coconspirators, the bond sharks. Do you know how it will work? These bond scalpers, or bond sharks, have already made $16 on the hundred, as the Senator from Florida [Mr. TRAMMELL] suggested, in buying these bonds.

They waylaid the poor bondholders of the country, thousands and hundreds of thousands who helped with their means to win the war.

They said, "Do you not want to buy some bonds, Mr. Bond Shark?"

He said, "No; I will tell you what I am going to do. I got a tip that they are going to inaugurate a deflation policy a little later on, and these little fellows can not hold the bonds they are buying, they are going to be forced to throw them on the market, and I am going to stand there and gather them in, not at par, but I will buy them for about $80 on the $100. That is when I will buy bonds."

The vulture watching a starving animal in a drouth-stricken section waits until the power of resistance is gone out of the animal and then pounces down upon him and feeds and fattens upon the flesh and blood of the poor unfortunate and helpless animal. That is just what these Wall Street bond sharks did to the small, patriotic bondholders of the country. They were far from the battle front in time of war waiting for the day when they could, with the aid of the Federal Reserve Board, pounce down upon the small bondholders and finding them helpless feast upon their misfortune. And here you are seeking to permit them to escape taxation.

Mr. President, the amendment of the Senator from Florida is proper and it ought to be placed in this bill.

But some Senators seem to want to hurry us along. My good friend from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS] wants to see the thing voted on. I do not desire unnecessarily to delay a vote, but I want the light turned on this bill; I want the objectionable and very obnoxious provisions of this bill held up to the American people so that they, whose Government this is, will know what sort of job is being put up on them by the Republican Party, now in power.

Senators, it is well for us to take the time to discuss these propositions and try to improve the bill and do our utmost to defeat its oppressive and unfair provisions.

Mr. President, if we had sat here with folded arms and sealed lips, as the Washington Post editorial of yesterday suggested and as some others here are suggesting, and allowed the majority to drive this thing through under whip and spur you would have had this thing on the statute books, you would have unloaded the tax burden upon the common man and common woman with small capital and moderate means, upon the necessities of life, and the profiteers and the big millionaires would have all escaped. You are going to accomplish that in the end, anyhow, it seems, but not without the people knowing just what you are doing.

It is all right and proper to protest; it is our duty to protest and to fight to the death a bill which we know is a mean, bad bill. Shall we remain silent because the advocates of the bill do not want its defects exposed to the American people? Shall we remain silent and permit this tax monstrosity to be imposed upon the people of the United States?

Here is a little poem I want to read for the benefit of all who are becoming nervous and irritable about debate, and especially for the benefit of my good friend from Mississippi:

> To sin by silence when we should protest
> Makes cowards out of men. The human race
> Has climbed on protest. Had no voice been raised > Against injustice, ignorance, and lust,
> The Inquisition yet would serve the law,
> And guillotines decide our least disputes.
> The few who dare must speak, and speak again,
> To right the wrongs of many.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, that concluding sentence attracts my imagination, "The few who dare." In connection with this immediate discussion, it means the few Senators who dare talk. I have never found that they were few, and I have never found that it took very much courage to talk, either.

The Senator pays a distinguished tribute to "protest." Mr. President, protest is one thing. Everybody ought to protest against anything wrong, and I protest with all my being against this iniquitous, abnormal, and foolish revenue bill.

But protest is one thing, and endless gabbling is another, and endless repetition of just exactly what was said by somebody else the day before does not amount to the dignity of protest. It ought to be called repetition, and we have gotten to about the point where we are just coming to repetition of things previously said anent this bill, and nothing else.

The Senator says "if we sit here with folded arms" we consent.

He has not folded any arms, and his constant unfolding of the only two arms he has gives denial to that sort of contention. I have not folded mine, either, to any appreciable extent, and do not intend to fold them. I think this is about the most iniquitous bill that ever was offered to any legislative body, and I think there is behind it more private strategic wealth movement than ever was behind any bill with which I have been acquainted.

I am not going to allow the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. SIMMONS] to assume that he has a right, either by mental superiority or superiority of service, or by official position, to lecture me. So far as I know he has no right to do it.

Mr. SIMMONS. Nothing was further from my thoughts than to lecture the Senator from Mississippi.

Mr. WILLIAMS. O Mr. President, but the Senator did lecture me, and he lectured me in a very ex cathedra and "Sir Oracle" style—"Sir Oracle," whom nobody dares deny.

The Senator has made a mistake, and a fundamental mistake. He is speaking about my "unawareness," as he calls it, of what is going on. The Senator seems to think that a man can not have any awareness concerning a public question unless he has learned it in a committee room within the last six months. I have spent a large part of my life becoming aware of the meaning and intent of public measures. Since I was an 11 or 12 year old boy I have not done much else, and I do not have to have red-headed or black-headed or blue-eyed or black-eyed or brown-eyed experts to inform me as to the rightfulness or the wrongfulness of an amendment coming before this body in connection with a revenue bill.

My "unawareness," as he calls it, may turn out to be an awareness unsuspected by him but very much superior, by previous training, to any recent awareness he now pretends to have, and I think it will, when the people come to consider what has been done in connection with this bill.

Mr. President, I decline to be put in the position of wanting to put this bill over without discussion.

Mr. PENROSE. Mr. President, I desire to ask the Senator a question.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator yield to the Senator from Pennsylvania for the purpose of asking a question?

Mr. WILLIAMS. I will yield in a moment. I have never taken the position of wanting to put this bill over without discussion. The Senator from Alabama [Mr. HEFLIN] had no right to try to put me in that attitude. The Senator from North Carolina had no right to try to do it, and they both tried it, and unsuccessfully.

I want discussion of every public measure. But after discussion has been full, after there has been enough of it, there should be a cessation. Mr. President, there is an end to everything, even life. There is an end to everything, even national institutions, and there ought to be somewhere, somehow, an end to debate, especially when it has ceased to be debate and has become mere talk.

I am not saying that there can not be a great many more things very useful to the hearers still to be said upon this bill, nor did I mean, when I addressed the Senate a moment ago and urged that we proceed as rapidly as we could to vote, that we should cease to discuss anything. I never said so. There are amendments to this bill which ought to be discussed, which ought to be discussed as a representative body of a free governing people ought to discuss everything, with a view of arriving at the truth.

The Senator from North Carolina does not exceed me one particle in his conviction that the discussion of this bill up to this date has resulted in practical good to the common people of this country. I know it as well as he does, and perhaps I know it better; but whether I do or not, he can not originate any discussion with me upon that subject.

The bill when it came in here was, if such a thing be possible, even worse than it is now. We have improved it, and we are going to improve it some more. Most of us know how we are going to improve it. I had not intended to say that I wanted an immediate vote before discussion upon every question that came up, but I do protest that I am tired and that the American people are tired of useless verbosity, and there has been a great deal of it, and there threatens to be more of it. Senators stand here as if they thought the only object of existence was to give them a chance to talk. Senators stand here and spend hours defending fundamental Adam Smithian principles that are known to every intelligent human being on the earth and that are denied by nobody except men who want to make their pocketbooks plethoric in consequence of legislation. What is the use of all that?

Mr. President, I merely repeat what I said at first. I plead with this body to waste as little time as possible, to proceed as rapidly as we can to a vote between conflicting opinions concerning the amendments to the bill and to the bill itself.

I am a partisan Democrat. I am one of the men who never apologize for being a Democrat. I took my politics as I took my religion, by inheritance and from Thomas Jefferson. But underlying every democracy in the world is the idea that the majority party must govern if it has brains enough to govern. Wherever there is a real democracy there is a parliamentary executive which, when it shows an inability to do things, must get out of power. In our limited democracy, which is not a complete democracy because we have not full parliamentary government, we can not tell whether a man is going out of power or not until the expiration of the limited term for which he serves.

I will venture the assertion right now that if the Senator from Pennsylvania were American premier in an American House of Commons—representative on the other side—and representing this bill, he would have had to resign three or four times when the bill has been amended and will be further amended contrary to his opinion and perhaps his convictions.

But all the same, Mr. President, the Republicans are in power. They are responsible to the people. They are going to do what they are going to do. Our duty is to oppose. That is the duty of an opposition party. Our duty is to protest. But after we have opposed and after we have protested, then ordinary common sense as well as ordinary political honesty demands that we shall not uselessly consume time.

That is all I have tried to say. That is all I wanted to say upon yesterday. It would not have taken me three minutes to have said it, and upon yesterday I would not have heard any reply then from North Carolina or Alabama made to what I had to say. I am very sorry to have heard it. Nobody admires the "eloquence" of the Senator from Alabama [Mr. HEFLIN] more than I do, and nobody admires the superior "expert wisdom" of the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. SIMMONS] more than I do, and when I am sought to be "sat upon" by both of them I did feel very exceedingly small for a short while, but when I began to think just a little bit afterwards about what I know about them and what I know about public affairs I do not feel quite as small as they perhaps imagine I do.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Florida [Mr. TRAMMELL] to the committee amendment.

Mr. TRAMMELL. I ask that the amendment to the amendment be reported.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment to the amendment will be read.

The READING CLERK. On page 38, line 18, after the numerals "1917," insert the following proviso:

Provided, That no deduction shall be allowed for interest on such indebtedness so incurred or continued for the purchase of or to carry obligations of the United States when held by a taxpayer who purchased them for less than par.

Mr. REED. On that I call for the yeas and nays.

Mr. TRAMMELL. Let us have the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the reading clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. FLETCHER (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the Senator from Delaware [Mr. BALL]. Being unable to obtain a transfer, I withhold my vote.

Mr. HALE (when his name was called). I transfer my pair with the senior Senator from Tennessee [Mr. SHIELDS] to the junior Senator from Maryland [Mr. WELLER] and vote "nay."

Mr. HARRIS (when his name was called). I have a pair with the junior Senator from New York [Mr. CALDER]. Being unable to obtain a transfer, I withhold my vote. If permitted to vote, I would vote "yea."

Mr. HARRISON (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the junior Senator from West Virginia [Mr. ELKINS]. I transfer that pair to the junior Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH] and vote "yea."

Mr. KING (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from North Dakota [Mr. MCCUMBER]. In his absence I am compelled to withhold my vote. If at liberty to vote, I would vote "yea."

Mr. RANSDELL (when his name was called). I have a pair with the junior Senator from Delaware [Mr. DU PONT]. He is absent and therefore I withhold my vote.

Mr. STERLING (when his name was called). I transfer my pair with the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. SMITH] to the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. LADD] and vote. I vote "nay."

Mr. HEFLIN (when Mr. UNDERWOOD's name was called). My colleague [Mr. UNDERWOOD] is paired with the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE].

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. SUTHERLAND (after having voted in the negative). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON]. I transfer that pair to the junior Senator from Arizona [Mr. CAMERON] and let my vote stand.

Mr. EDGE (after having voted in the negative). Has the senior Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. OWEN] voted?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That Senator has not voted.

Mr. EDGE. I transfer my general pair with that Senator to the junior Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. CROW] and allow my vote to stand.

Mr. MCLEAN (after having voted in the negative). I transfer my pair with the Senator from Montana [Mr. MYERS] to the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. COLT] and allow my vote to stand.

Mr. CURTIS. I wish to announce that the Senator from Washington [Mr. JONES] is paired with the Senator from Virginia [Mr. SWANSON].

Mr. LODGE (after having voted in the negative). I transfer my pair with the senior Senator from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] to the junior Senator from Idaho [Mr. GOODING] and allow my vote to stand.

So Mr. TRAMMELL's amendment to the amendment of the committee was rejected.

Mr. TRAMMELL. I desire to reserve the right to have a separate vote on this amendment in the Senate.

Mr. HARRIS. Mr. President, we often hear criticism in this Chamber of public officials. Some of it is deserved and some is not. I believe in commending faithful public officials and condemning only those who have been derelict in their duties. I agree with what the Senator from Alabama [Mr. HEFLIN] has said about the deflation policy of the Federal Reserve Board, which has cost the farmers and live-stock raisers of the South and West billions of dollars. I believe I was the first Senator to criticize the action of this board, but I rise to-day to praise the action of able, practical, and conscientious men serving as Secretary of Agriculture and Director of the Census. Those men have saved the farmers and other people of the South millions of dollars by the reports which they have to-day sent through the press relative to the cotton crop. Ordinarily the ginning report at this date shows that about half the cotton crop in the South is ginned. Those of us living in the South and in touch with conditions know that at least four-fifths of it is ginned at this time. If the ginners' report of the Census Bureau had been sent out without a statement from the Agricultural Department as an estimate of the crop unginned, the "bears," as we call them, the gamblers on the New York Cotton Exchange, would have depressed the price of cotton 2 or 3 cents a pound and that would have cost the people in my section many millions of dollars.

Mr. President, the boll weevil, the heavy rains at times, continued drouth, and the small amount of fertilizers used has reduced the amount of cotton raised this year more than one-half. The estimate of the Department of Agriculture on October 3 was 42.2 per cent of a normal cotton crop, the lowest ever reported, the forecast being 6,537,000 bales. As there will be no other estimate of crop conditions by the Agricultural Department until the early part of December, those of us interested in cotton realized that the Census Bureau report would be misleading, as ideal weather conditions for gathering the crop has enabled the farmers to gather the crop in half the time usually required. Several days ago I took this matter up with the Secretary of Agriculture and Director of the Census. Senators HEFLIN, RANSDELL, CARAWAY, SHEPPARD, and DIAL joined me, and after explaining conditions as to the cotton crop to these officials, they granted our request to issue statements from both departments so as to show actual conditions. Had they not done so the price of cotton would have gone down after the Census Bureau report to-day, but due to their diligence this has been prevented and cotton advanced many points.

I ask, Mr. President, to place in the RECORD the statement of the Census Bureau and also that of the Secretary of Agriculture. Recently during a visit to my State I made about 40 speeches to the farmers; in all these speeches I praised the splendid work of the Secretary of Agriculture and the Director of the Census, and I am glad to say they have demonstrated to the satisfaction of everyone that they have the interest of the people of this country at heart and are not bound down by red-tape methods.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. If there is no objection, the request of the Senator from Georgia will be granted.

The statements referred to are as follows:

COTTON CROP OF 1921—ESTIMATE OF DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE.

The Department of Agriculture on October 3, 1921, estimated that the condition of the cotton crop on September 25 was 42.2 per cent of a normal, the lowest condition ever reported, which forecasts a total production of about 6,537,000 bales of 500 pounds gross. Reports indicate that the crop is mostly gathered.

CONSUMPTION, STOCKS, IMPORTS, AND EXPORTS—UNITED STATES.

Cotton consumed during the month of September, 1921, amounted to 484,647 bales. Cotton on hand in consuming establishments on September 30 was 1,016,032 bales, and in public storage and at compresses 4,309,893 bales. The number of active consuming cotton spindles for the month was 33,898,415. The total imports for the month of September, 1921, were 6,362 bales and the exports of domestic cotton, including linters, were 522,839 bales.

WORLD STATISTICS.

The world's production of commercial cotton, exclusive of linters, grown in 1920, as compiled from published reports, documents, and correspondence was approximately 18,810,000 bales of 500 pounds net, while the consumption of cotton (exclusive of linters in the United States) for the year ending July 31, 1921, was approximately 15,520,000 bales of 500 pounds net. The total number of producing cotton spindles, both active and idle, is about 155,000,000.

(Press service, United States Department of Agriculture. Release for afternoon papers Tuesday, Oct. 25, 1921.)

STATEMENT OF SECRETARY OF AGRICULTURE IN REGARD TO COTTON-CROP CONDITION.

Concerning the cotton situation, Secretary Wallace said to-day:

"The cotton ginned to October 18, as shown by the census report, namely, 5,477,397 bales, running weight, is 83.8 per cent of the October 3 forecast of total production by the Department of Agriculture, which was 6,537,000 bales of 500 pounds weight.

"So far as our records go, the highest percentage of cotton ginned to October 18 was 64.3 per cent in the year 1916, when the crop was a small one. The smallest percentage ginned up to October 18 was 37.7 per cent in 1903.

"Our people in the department who are qualified to judge of such matters say that there can be no reasonable doubt that this year's cotton crop is more largely ginned to date than ever before. In the first place, the crop is a very small one, and under such conditions the percentage ginned to date would naturally be large. In the second place, the season has been unusually forward, and reports from practically all sections of the cotton belt indicate that picking has been practically completed. In Texas both picking and ginning is much further advanced than usual and about completed, except in the northwestern part of the State. In Georgia the cotton is practically all gathered. In South Carolina picking is finished, except in the northwest corner of the State. In North Carolina rapid progress in picking has been made. In Alabama picking is finished in most southern and central sections and is elsewhere well advanced, with ginning progressing rapidly. In Mississippi picking and ginning has made rapid progress. In Arkansas the cotton is all picked in some localities and three-fourths picked in other localities. In Oklahoma picking is reported as having progressed rapidly."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the adoption of the committee amendment on page 38, beginning in line 13, as amended.

Mr. REED. Just one moment. [A pause.] I have no objection to that amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT] desire to move a reconsideration of the vote whereby the amendment of the Senator from Nebraska to the committee amendment was agreed to?

Mr. SMOOT. No; let the amendment be agreed to as amended.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the adoption of the amendment as amended.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will state the next amendment passed over.

The next amendment passed over was, on page 38, line 22, to strike out the words "States or any of its possessions or of any foreign country and" and to insert "States, (b) so much of the income, war-profits, and excess-profits taxes imposed by the authority of any foreign country or possession of the United States as is."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment passed over was, on page 39, at the beginning of line 2, to strike out "and (b)" and to insert "(c)."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the amendment is agreed to.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I do not say this in any criticism at all, but we must have time before the vote is declared to grasp the meaning of the language of amendments. I hope the Presiding Officer will be not quite so prompt in declaring amendments agreed to, for it is necessary that Senators should have time to understand them.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will proceed with the statement of the next amendment passed over.

The next amendment passed over was, on page 39, line 3, after the word "property," to strike out the word "assessed" and the semicolon, quotation marks, and the period and to insert "assessed, and (d) taxes imposed upon the taxpayer upon his interest as shareholder or member of a corporation, which are paid by the corporation without reimbursement from the taxpayer."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, on behalf of the Committee on Finance, I desire to offer the following amendment:

On page 39, line 7, after the word "taxpayer" and before the semicolon, insert a period and the following:

For the purpose of this paragraph estate, inheritance, legacy, and succession taxes accrue on the due date thereof, except as otherwise provided by the law of the jurisdiction imposing such taxes.

I will say that the amendment simply fixes a definite date on which estate and other such taxes shall accrue.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, I ask the Senator from Utah what is the meaning of the language which is found in the amendment, "provided by the law of the jurisdiction imposing such taxes"? That is rather a new expression to me and I do not quite understand it.

Mr. SMOOT. Some persons claim that the taxes referred to accrue on the day of the death, some claim that they accrue on the date on which the tax is paid, while others claim that they accrue when the tax is due. This amendment simply makes certain when the tax accrues for the purposes of this section. That is all there is to it.

Mr. BROUSSARD. It seems to me that the last clause of the proposed amendment makes the date when the tax accrues uncertain. Why not have it apply equally to all estates and provide that the tax shall accrue on the day of death?

Mr. SMOOT. Each State may have its own law.

Mr. BROUSSARD. But we are not legislating for the States; we are legislating for the United States.

Mr. SMOOT. That is true, too, but the proposition is not to interfere with State laws if there be any State whose laws specifically provide when such a tax accrues.

Mr. BROUSSARD. I do not know what is the purpose of the committee in offering an amendment of this kind. Probably no Senator here knows what the law is in any State other than his own; and certainly we are not called upon to fix a date upon which the taxes referred to in the amendment shall accrue in such a manner that the date in one State may be different from that in another State. I think that there should be uniformity in this matter. We are not legislating for the States, nor are we proposing to legislate in conflict with the laws of any State in connection with the imposition of this Federal tax. The date, in my judgment, should be definitely determined.

Mr. SMOOT. The Internal Revenue Bureau to-day has a most difficult task, and there is a great deal of objection on the part of the citizens of the various States. This amendment simply provides that whenever the date of the law as to the accrual of these taxes is fixed in the State, that law shall be conformed to in the administration of this provision in the collection of taxes by the Internal Revenue Office.

As I have before stated, some claim the tax accrues upon the date of the death, others that it accrues when due, and others when it is paid. This amendment simply clarifies the situation so that the Federal law will conform to the laws of the States.

Mr. BROUSSARD. May I inquire what is the present law on this subject?

Mr. SMOOT. There is no present law at all on the subject. In the past each case has come up to the Internal Revenue Bureau for decision, and now that bureau thinks Congress should specifically state just what course that bureau shall follow.

Mr. BROUSSARD. What I am claiming is that Congress is not making a specific provision by the amendment now proposed. That amendment provides that the tax shall accrue "on the due date thereof," or at such time as the respective States shall determine.

Mr. SMOOT. That is according to the laws of the States. I do not know how it is possible to express it in any simpler form than it is here stated. Whatever the law of a State is, the Government of the United States, as here provided, is going to follow it.

Mr. BROUSSARD. Why not say?—

For the purposes of this paragraph estate, inheritance, legacy, and succession taxes shall accrue on the date of the death of the decedent.

That would make it specific.

Mr. SMOOT. If we did that it might interfere with the laws of half of the States, and we do not desire to attempt to interfere with the laws of the States.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, it is a mere matter of practical convenience. We can not change the laws of the States as to inheritances. Their probate laws and inheritance laws are their own, and we can not make a universal law on the subject. Under present conditions great inconvenience is caused administrators and executors in the settlement of estates because of the conflict in dates. It would be a very great help in every State to adopt some such provision as that now proposed. I know of a number of cases in my own State where it would be very helpful to have the dates determined by the Federal Government in accordance with the law of the State. It is, I repeat, a mere matter of convenience. Many cases have been brought to my attention where it would be a very great convenience if the matter could be arranged as now proposed.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the adoption of the amendment offered by the Senator from Utah.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, I wish to say for myself in reference to this amendment that, while I had no part in the committee in framing it, I am rather inclined to think that it is an improvement upon the present system of fixing the date when the Federal inheritance tax shall accrue.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Utah.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. President, before the next amendment which has been passed over is acted upon, may I call the attention of the Senator in charge of the bill to the fact that at the bottom of page 40 there is a committee amendment which has been agreed to. Upon a prior occasion I called attention to an exactly similar amendment on page 86. Both amendments have to do with the writing off of bad debts. At that time I stated that when this amendment was again reached I would bring the question up, either in connection with the amendment on page 40, which has been agreed to, or the amendment on page 86, which has not been agreed to as yet, but which is exactly like the amendment on page 40. It seems to me we might as well settle the principle involved now. For that reason I ask unanimous consent that the vote by which the committee amendment at the bottom of page 40 was agreed to may be reconsidered.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered. The question recurs on agreeing to the amendment.

Mr. FLETCHER. One of the amendments referred to by the Senator from New York applies to individuals and the other to corporations.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Yes; they are exactly alike. If I am not permitted to bring the question up here I will bring it up when we reach page 86.

Mr. FLETCHER. The Senator thinks that the same principle ought to apply to individuals as to corporations?

Mr. WADSWORTH. Exactly; I can see no difference.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, if the Senator will pardon me, my attention was diverted for a moment. I understand he is discussing the amendment on line 20, page 40?

Mr. WADSWORTH. Yes.

Mr. SIMMONS. I should like to say a few words with reference to that amendment.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I should like, first, to inquire whether the motion to reconsider the vote by which the amendment was agreed to has been adopted?

Mr. SIMMONS. I have no objection to that.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The request to reconsider has been agreed to. The question now is on agreeing to the amendment of the committee.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, I was apprehensive when we acted upon this matter before that the language—

Or, in the discretion of the commissioner, a reasonable addition to a reserve for bad debts—

Might possibly result in much abuse; but after more thorough consideration of it I am impelled to change my request at that time, and I shall not make any opposition to the amendment.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. President, I addressed the Senate briefly on a former occasion, and I do not desire to do so again if there is no objection to rejecting the committee amendment.

Mr. SMOOT rose.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Utah desire to address himself to this matter?

Mr. SMOOT. No; that is the course I should like to have followed.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the committee.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. SMOOT. Now, Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the Senate may take the same course with regard to the amendment on page 86, lines 13 to 16. That language applies to corporations the same rule that is applied to individuals.

Mr. FLETCHER. The amendment on page 86 was passed over, I think.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the immediate consideration of the matter on page 86? The Chair hears none. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was rejected.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will state the next amendment passed over.

The READING CLERK. The next amendment passed over is on page 41, after line 11, to insert the following:

(9) In the case of buildings, machinery, equipment, or other facilities, constructed, erected, installed, or acquired, on or after April 6, 1917, for the production of articles contributing to the prosecution of the war against the German Government, and in the case of vessels constructed or acquired on or after such date for the transportation of articles or men contributing to the prosecution of such war, there shall be allowed a reasonable deduction for the amortization of such part of the cost of such facilities or vessels as has been borne by the taxpayer, but not again including any amount otherwise allowed under this title or previous acts of Congress as a deduction in computing net income. At any time before March 3, 1924, the commissioner may, and at the request of the taxpayer shall, reexamine the return, and if he then finds as a result of an appraisal or from other evidence that the deduction originally allowed was incorrect, the income, war-profits, and excess-profits taxes for the year or years affected shall be redetermined; and the amount of tax due upon such redetermination, if any, shall be paid upon notice and demand by the collector, or the amount of tax overpaid, if any, shall be credited or refunded to the taxpayer in accordance with the provisions of section 252.

This amendment was passed over on the request of the junior Senator from Utah [Mr. KING].

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry. Was the amendment on page 41, lines 1 to 6, agreed to?

The VICE PRESIDENT. It was; and the amendment in lines 7 to 11 was agreed to. The question is on agreeing to the amendment beginning after line 11 on page 41.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I desire to offer an amendment to that in behalf of the committee—amendment No. 10. On page 41, line 20, after the word "allowed," I move to insert a comma and the following:

for any taxable year before March 3, 1924 (if claim therefor was made at the time of filing return for the taxable year 1918 or 1919).

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Utah to the amendment of the committee.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SMOOT. I will say to the Senator from North Carolina that that is the amendment that my colleague, the junior Senator from Utah [Mr. KING], desired to have inserted, so that no new claims could be made.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment as amended.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

The READING CLERK. The next amendment passed over is on page 48, passed over at the request of the senior Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE], where it is proposed to strike out lines 1 and 2 and to insert:

(a) The amount received as dividends (1) from a domestic corporation other than a foreign trade corporation, or (2) from a foreign corporation when it is shown to the satisfaction of the commissioner that more than 50 per cent of the gross income of such foreign corporation for the three-year period ending with the close of its taxable year preceding the declaration of such dividends (or for such part of such period as the corporation has been in existence) was derived from sources within the United States as determined under the provisions of section 217;

(b) The amount received as interest upon obligations of the United States and bonds issued by the War Finance Corporation, which is included in gross income under section 213.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, there must be an amendment to this language. On line 4, I move to strike out the words "other than a foreign trade corporation." That is necessary to conform to the amendment that was disagreed to by the committee on page 5 of the bill in reference to the term "foreign trader."

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment to the amendment will be stated.

The READING CLERK. On page 48, line 4, it is proposed to strike out the words "other than a foreign trade corporation."

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, before that is left, does the Senator propose to leave in the bill the language "from a foreign corporation"?

Mr. SMOOT. Yes; certainly. They have to pay their taxes under existing law.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment as amended.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

The READING CLERK. The next amendment passed over is on page 48, section 221, beginning with line 17, down to and including line 7 on page 49, passed over on the request of the senior Senator from North Carolina [Mr. SIMMONS].

Mr. TRAMMELL. Mr. President, I desire to offer a substitute for this subdivision or paragraph of the bill.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Florida offers an amendment, which will be stated by the Secretary.

The READING CLERK. On pages 48 and 49, it is proposed to strike out all of subdivision (c) and to insert in lieu thereof the following:

(c) That where 75 per cent or more of the income of the taxpayer is received from the labor or personal service of the taxpayer, in the case of a single person, the amount of the personal exemption shall be $1,500; or, in the case of the head of a family or a married person living with husband or wife, the amount of the personal exemption shall be $3,000, unless the net income in the case of a single person is more than $3,500, in which case the personal exemption shall be $1,000, or unless the net income in the case of the head of the family or a married person living with husband or wife is more than $6,000, in which case the personal exemption shall be $2,000. That where 25 per cent or more of the income of the taxpayer is derived from sources other than from his or her personal labor or services, in case of a single person the amount of the personal exemption shall be $1,000; or, in the case of the head of the family or a married person living with husband or wife, the amount of the personal exemption shall be $2,500, unless the net income is in excess of $5,000, in which case the personal exemption shall be $2,000. A husband and wife living together shall receive but one personal exemption; such exemption shall be the amount heretofore set forth. If such husband and wife make separate returns, the personal exemption may be taken by either or divided between them. That the personal exemption herein provided shall not apply in the case of a single person whose net income is $8,000 or more, nor shall the said personal exemption apply in the case of the head of a family or a married person living with husband or wife where the aggregate net income of such husband and wife is $15,000 or more.

Mr. PENROSE. Mr. President, this amendment is practically an effort to revive the proposition of the earned and unearned incomes, and I hope the Senate will not agree to it.

Mr. TRAMMELL. Mr. President, that is in a measure the object of the amendment. I take the position that the returns from a person's labor and personal services should not be taxed until he has at least received a sufficient part of his income free of taxation to give him and his family, in the event that he is a married man, a reasonably comfortable support; and if he is a single man, as the result of his labor and his energies he should have exempt from taxation a sufficient amount upon which to live in comfort, and to try to prepare himself for the duties and responsibilities of life.

The amendment as it is proposed by the committee allows an exemption of only $1,000 to a single person, regardless of the amount of compensation received. In most of the cities of the country $1,000 is not sufficient upon which a person can exist. It will not pay for board, clothing, and a modest incidental expense account. That is true here in the city of Washington; it is true in almost all sections of the country, yet the Government seeks to tax the salary of a single person before the income has reached a sufficient amount upon which that person can maintain himself or herself. Two thousand dollars, in case the income is over $5,000, is the sum exempt to a married person or the head of a family. Two thousand five hundred dollars is the amount exempt if he is the head of a family or a married person where his earnings do not amount to $5,000. My amendment seeks to have a greater exemption to a certain limited amount where the income is the result of personal labor or services rendered by the taxpayer. It provides that where 75 per cent or more of the earnings of the taxpayer is compensation for personal labor and personal services the exemption shall be, in the case of a married person or the head of a family, $3,000, and in the case of a single person, where at least 75 per cent of the income is the result of personal labor and personal services, he shall have an exemption of $1,500.

The further provisions of my measure seek to throw around these features of it safeguards, in that it is provided that if the income of a single person is more than $3,500 per annum his exemption shall be only $1,000; in the case of a married person or the head of a family, where the aggregate income of the husband and the wife is $6,000 or more, then the exemption shall be only $2,000. It further provides that the exemption shall not apply in the case of a single person where his net earnings are more than $8,000 per annum. It also provides that the exemption shall not apply at all in the case of a married person or of the head of a family where his net earnings are more than $15,000 per annum. In this way I seek to recoup the revenue that will be lost on account of a more liberal consideration being extended under the other provisions of the amendment to the taxpayer in making a liberal exemption of earnings that he receives from his personal services.

The policy of the amendment as presented by the committee is that when the income reaches the sum of $5,000 the exemption shall be reduced. In the case of a married person it is reduced from $2,500 to $2,000, showing plainly that the committee recognized as a proper policy a lessening of the exemption in the event that the income reaches the substantial sum of $5,000 or more.

I have written that policy into the amendment presented by me, except that I have carried it to the extent of providing that after a single man's income reaches $7,500 or more per annum he will not be allowed any exemption at all, and that in the case of a married person or the head of a family, when his income reaches $15,000 or more per annum he shall not receive any exemption; in other words, he would be allowed only $2,000 exemption, and with an income of $15,000 net per annum there is no particular reason why the Government should exempt him to the extent of $2,000 at the rate of 4 per cent, which would be only $80.

I see no reason why, where a person's net income is $15,000 or more per annum, you should exempt him $80, the same amount as you would exempt the person with an income of only $3,000. A single man with a net income of $8,000 per annum, a married person with a net income of $15,000 or more per annum, neither needs nor requires an exemption amount to $80 per annum.

I embraced this feature in the amendment with the hope and with the object in view of trying to recoup whatever revenue may be lost on account of being more lenient and more generous with the taxpayer in dealing with his earnings received from personal service and personal labor.

Mr. KING. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. CAPPER in the chair). Does the Senator from Florida yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. TRAMMELL. Certainly.

Mr. KING. Has the Senator made any computation with a view to ascertaining what, in the aggregate, would be the loss or the gain if his amendment should prevail, over the loss or gain under the amendment tendered by the committee?

Mr. TRAMMELL. No, Mr. President; I have not had an opportunity to make an investigation of that subject. I dare say the loss would not exceed very much, if at all, the amount of gains, because the fact that incomes of more than $8,000, in the case of a single person, are not subject to the exemption of $1,000, and in the case of married persons that incomes of $15,000 per annum and more do not enjoy the $2,000 exemption, would in a substantial measure make up for the reduction on account of the enlarging of the exemption on account of personal services and personal labor.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, my recollection of the returns of individuals under the income-tax provision is that they amounted to about $4,400,000 for 1918, and about $5,246,000, as I recall, for 1919, and recalling, as I do, the tremendous number of those under the smaller brackets, if I may be permitted the expression, it occurs to me that the amendment of the Senator would entail a good deal of loss. I want to inquire of the Senator whether he has considered the administrative features and difficulties which might result from his amendment?

Mr. TRAMMELL. Mr. President, I do not think the administration under my amendment would be any more difficult than almost any administrative feature of the entire bill. The amendment for which I ask to have this substituted provides a system that is just about the same as that provided in the amendment presented by me.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, while the Senator from Florida is conferring with the expert for the purpose of ascertaining what, if any, change will be made in the revenue to be obtained under this provision, in the event his amendment is adopted, I shall occupy the floor.

I do not perceive any serious administrative difficulties in his amendment, although there are some objections to applying different rates of taxes to the same fund. However, any application of the system of graduation is subject to the same criticism. The objection, of course, is not important enough to prevent the application of the principle of graduation where the interest of the people would be subserved and when justice results. There is a disposition (and it is a proper one) to exempt from the burdens of taxation those whose incomes are scarcely adequate for the support of individuals and their families.

But there are those who have urged that no matter how small the income of an individual might be, a small contribution by him to his Government is proper, because he would feel that he was a part of the Government and that his material contribution aided in its maintenance.

I have often felt that that condition of society would be the best in which all the people enjoyed sufficient income that they might make direct contribution to the expenses of their Government. Unfortunately human governments have never developed a social and industrial condition of that standard of perfection. The question of taxation has always proven a most difficult one with which to deal. It has made and unmade political parties and lost monarchs their crowns. Perhaps no hard and fast rule can be laid down as a basis for the laying of taxes; and no concrete formula has ever been suggested that will meet the mutations of time and the changes in the economic and social conditions of the people.

The great philosopher of India many centuries ago proclaimed, in substance, that taxes should be borne by those who were best able to bear them. Perhaps no better formula could be devised than that embodied in the words of Manu. It is not always an easy process to apply this rule to tax measures, and the difficulties are somewhat increased where the industrial life of the people is varied and the commerce and business interests are complex; and in preparing a Federal tax bill cognizance must be taken of the States and the municipalities and the very heavy burdens which rest upon them. The tax imposed by the Federal Government is not the only tax which the people are compelled to bear; indeed, the burdens of the Federal Government should be lighter than those imposed by the States and the political subdivisions therein. The responsibilities and the activities of the States, in so far as they relate to the lives of the people, are broader and deeper and more important than those resting upon the Federal Government. The Federal Government is invading the fields of taxation enjoyed by the States, and the heavy exactions of the Federal Government constitute a genuine burden upon the people.

Removed, as we are, from the war period by three years we are still bearing war burdens. Appeals for economy fall upon deaf ears, and the expenditures made by the Federal Government continue with slight diminution. The party in power made many promises before the election to inaugurate financial reforms and enact a comprehensive and scientific revenue law. It led the people to believe that the burdens of Federal taxes should be lightened and that a simplified tax measure would be enacted. Taxes have not been diminished, and the promised tax reforms find their only fulfillment in this incongruous, jumbled, and mosaic bill reported by the Finance Committee. The bill before us is unsatisfactory to the people, and it is meeting with derision from the members of the majority party in the Senate. It will confound the Republican Party when understood by the people and be a strong factor in bringing to power the Democratic Party.

A tax measure which would be suitable to a purely pastoral people can not be justified in an industrial and commercial nation, and where its industries and activities are so varied as those found in this Republic; and in those States where a large part of the wealth is concentrated in the hands of comparatively few a revenue measure, if it be fashioned along the lines of justice and equity, must carry provisions not found in tax systems where property is widely distributed and owned.

Corporate holdings in the United States are stupendous. The corporate gross income for 1918 exceeded $80,000,000,000, whereas the personal gross income for the same year returned by those whose earnings exceeded $1,000 was but slightly in excess of $15,000,000,000. There are many individuals in the United States who have very limited holdings and whose earnings are less than $1,000 per annum. In 1918 the individuals who made returns to the Government were approximately 4,400,000, and in 1919 the number of persons making income returns was 5,332,760. There are in the United States perhaps 40,000,000 of individuals who are wage earners. Of that number there were but 5,332,760 who earned in 1919 more than $1,000. In 1919 the earnings of the people of the United States perhaps were greater than in any other year. It is quite clear that for the year 1921 the earnings of the people of the United States will be very much less than they were in 1920 or 1919 or 1918. These figures demonstrate that the great majority of the people of the United States earn less than $1,000 per annum. With the high prices of all commodities, includng rents and everything that enters into the lives of the people, it is apparent that there must be want and suffering in many parts of our land; and though there are millions whose annual earnings are perhaps around $500, there are four or five millions of men who are out of employment.

All these facts must be taken into account in framing a revenue bill. We must not lose sight of the fact that the productive wealth of the country, aside from the farms, is controlled by corporations, and that the corporations are receiving the profits. I grant that corporate profits have been greatly reduced and that many corporations for the current year will show reduced earnings and many will show losses. But we come back to the proposition: By whom can the burdens of taxation most easily be borne? Can we impose them upon the consumer—upon the great mass of the people, whose earnings are so limited?

Manifestly, not. Many of these persons whose earnings are less than $1,000 have small homes upon which heavy taxes are imposed by the States and the municipalities in which they reside. The State governments rely for their support largely upon the small holdings of the masses of the people. We ought not to place further burdens upon those who are unable to bear them. It is a difficult task so to adjust taxes as not to do injustice either to the individual or to the State.

In approaching this question there should be no hysteria, no prejudice against wealth, and no feeling to penalize or punish any section or any class or any business. The important question is: What is right; what is just; how can we best meet the obligations of the Government; what are most conducive to the public welfare and to the happiness and prosperity of all the people? There must be no confiscation of property, and socialism must not be enthroned by the use of the taxing power. There are some who would destroy all property through the taxing power of the State. There are some who would repel the suggestion that they were Socialists or that they desired to destroy the private ownership of property, but who would be willing to impose such heavy taxes as to be tantamount to the confiscation of property.

Business corporations which absorb the productive wealth of the country and which enjoy annual earnings of large proportions must expect to furnish the greater part of the taxes required by the Government. The income tax must remain as a fundamental part of our taxing system. A graduated income tax should, in my opinion, always remain with us. Those who enjoy great incomes must be expected to make large contributions to the Government; and I am unable to perceive any reason why excess profits, or, as the phrase is employed by President Wilson in a message to Congress, "undue profits," should not bear a portion of the expenses of the Government.

I am opposed to the Government limiting the profits of those engaged in private enterprises, and I regard it as an impediment to proper economic development for the Federal Government to place business in a strait-jacket. A free and fair field should be opened to all individuals. The Government should play no favorites. The poor boy of to-day should feel that he has an even chance with the rich man's son to achieve commercial or financial success in life. Rewards should be held out for the provident, the thrifty, the energetic, and those possessing courage and genius.

With broad fields for activity and American genius, wealth will be produced. The history of our country is a demonstration of the wisdom of our political and economic policies. No country has exhibited such material progress as this Republic has. The door of opportunity has been opened to the humblest as well as to the rich; and the men to-day who control the great financial institutions of the country, with but rare exceptions, are those who began their careers upon the farms or in the humblest walks of life. When wealth is produced by individuals, or as a result of corporate control and management, and the earnings therefrom are important, the Government has the right to ask that from those earnings the Government shall receive contribution for its maintenance. Unfortunately, too often the men of wealth have been selfish and have sought to evade taxation. They have threatened to invest their savings and their capital in tax-exempt securities, and to refuse to make those investments essential for the industrial growth of the Nation. There are many business men in our country who are more concerned with achievement and in creating wealth than in the mere saving of wealth. They are satisfied to know that their efforts develop industry, build factories, construct railroads, and add to the general wealth, and therefore to the general prosperity of all.

During the war there were too many profiteers. Profiteers were not alone in the ranks of wealth but many in all positions of life seized every opportunity within their grasp to obtain personal aggrandizement, even at the expense of their country. Combinations were formed to maintain high prices, and associations in towns, villages, and hamlets, as well as in the centers of population, operated for the purpose of destroying competition and of maintaining high price levels.

The profits made were stupendous. Excess profits were the rule in many lines of industry. The Government acted prudently and justly in laying the strong hand of taxation upon excess profits. It is axiomatic that taxation should not destroy the fountains of production or neutralize the initiative of individuals or curb the legitimate ambitions of those who engage in industry and seek the material advancement of the country.

The bill which is now before us discourages the unemployed and those of limited resources. It will bear oppressively upon them and it will lighten beyond any standard of justice the burdens which wealth, particularly great wealth, should bear. This tax bill protects wealth and exempts it from taxation. It is not a bill suited to the times; it does not meet the economic and industrial needs of the people—and all tax bills directly relate to economic and industrial conditions—nor will it care for the demands of the Treasury, in view of the enormous appropriations which the party in power have made. This measure should be redrafted along lines of simplification and in the interest of the general good. It has been greatly improved by amendments which have been offered; it will perhaps be further improved before it leaves the Senate.

In my opinion there should be embodied in the bill a provision for a tax upon undue profits. The time has not come when enormous profits should go untaxed. It is no opposition to wealth that calls for the taxation of wealth; inordinate profits are a legitimate source of taxation. The party in power will make a great mistake, for which they will be held accountable by the people, if they enact a tax law which embodies all the imperfections and vices found in the measure before us.

Mr. FLETCHER. May I interrupt the Senator with reference to two propositions he has raised. One is the question whether revenue shall be reduced, or not as much raised, under this amendment as under the committee proposition. That, of course, is largely a question for experts. Otherwise without the information from that source we merely have to guess at it and form our best opinion about it.

I take it we desire to vote for those proposals which we consider just and fair and proper without paying too much regard to the question of how much revenue is going to be raised by a particular amendment that may be offered. For instance, with reference to the point the Senator raised as to the difficulties of administration, I take it the Senator will agree that it will not be difficult for the department to ascertain what income is derived from personal services. That is a fact which can be easily ascertained from the investigation which the department may make and it will be shown by the return which the taxpayer will have to make; it will all appear on his return how that income is derived. So I can not see any difficulty of administration under the proposed amendment. The fact whether the income is derived from personal services or not would not be a very difficult matter to determine. It will be established just like the fact of being married or single.

Then the other suggestion which the Senator made was that he believes every citizen ought to contribute something to the support of the Government. Even the poor people, as they are sometimes designated, who are not called upon to pay direct taxes under this provision, do not escape the indirect taxes. Everybody has to pay indirectly something for the support of the Government, so that if those people whose incomes are less than the amount designated here should escape direct taxation, that does not mean they are not contributing to the support of the Government; but we must keep in mind the indirect taxes which they must pay.

I submit these observations for the Senator to consider in connection with his inquiry made of my colleague with reference to this particular amendment. I feel that there is merit in the claim that every man earning 75 per cent of his income by personal services would require something more than $1,000 a year income, proposed to be raised to $1,500 a year, in order to maintain himself, and that the proposed exemption is entirely reasonable. It would rather encourage individual effort and provide against the possible embarrassment that the taxpayer might otherwise encounter. Then where a citizen who is the head of a family, having a wife and children to support, is earning from $3,000 to $6,000 a year, 75 per cent of which is derived from his personal efforts, it seems to me that it is not an unreasonable position to take that he ought to be allowed an exemption for the support of his family of $3,000, 75 per cent of which comes from his own labor. He will require at least that much for the purpose of taking care of his family and educating his children. I think that the amendment is a very important one and a very meritorious one.

As to the suggestions which come to the mind of the Senator, I believe upon reflection he will admit that if the amendment is adopted the law could be very easily administered, without any complication or difficulty, and that it does not relieve from taxation those who are allowed the exemptions provided, except only to the extent and in the respect provided. Those allowed these exemptions as to their income taxes will have other taxes which are quite burdensome enough to pay.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I did not intend to convey the idea, though perhaps my words gave that implication, that I regarded the administrative difficulties as insuperable or, indeed, important. I suggested the inquiry to the junior Senator from Florida whether or not there were any administrative difficulties. Generally speaking, it would be better if we could have flat rates rather than irregular and graduated ones. But that is found impossible if the line of justice is followed in framing tax laws. When I made the inquiry as to the administrative problems involved I did not mean to infer that they were so important as to warrant us in refusing to accept the amendment if otherwise it commended itself to our judgment.

I further expressed myself as being in sympathy with any provision of the law that would deal fairly and justly with those of small means. I agree entirely with the Senator from Florida that those of moderate means and those who come within the category of the poor, whom, as the Bible says, we always have with us, are burdened by indirect taxation. It has been the device of the wealthy always to impose indirect burdens upon the people rather than direct taxation. If the burdens which the great mass of the people from time to time have been compelled to bear under the guise of indirect taxation had been presented to them in the form of direct taxation they would more often have been led to revolution. So far as possible there should be direct taxation, but indirect taxation will always appear.

I repeat what I stated in the beginning—that I should like conditions to be such that all can make contributions to the expenses of the Government. There is something in the thought that those who pay taxes or aid their Government in a direct way feel a personal interest in the Government and that it is their Government.

The thought has been elaborated in many admirable essays that a small contribution paid by even the poorest to a cause seems to identify them with the cause and they take a greater interest in it by reason of such act. But I support the view that all taxation must have in mind the ability of the people to pay.

As I have heretofore said, the faculty theory of taxation has been accepted by us, theoretically at least, as the fundamental theory upon which to rest our tax system. The ability of the people to meet the burdens of government must be the basis of exactions imposed by the Government. Wealth, which is deriving benefits and protection from the Government, must now as in the past bear the burdens of taxation.

Mr. President, the Senator from Florida has returned to the Chamber, and I will not detain the Senate longer. I hope he has sufficient data to explain fully to the Senate the result of his amendment. Permit me to say in conclusion that the criticisms which I have made of this bill have not been in a partisan spirit. I feel that it is the duty of the Democrats to aid in every possible way to formulate a wise and just tax law. I regret that our Republican friends have exhibited such extreme partisanship. They have repeatedly declared that they were responsible for the Government and for legislation, and that they would pass legislation regardless of the views of the minority. This bill was framed in the House by the majority without the aid of the minority; it emerged from the Finance Committee of the Senate with the seal of the majority upon it; it was prepared by the majority, not by the minority; and the views of the minority were not sought in drafting any part of it from the beginning to the end. The bill with all its infirmities must be laid at the door of the Republicans and they will have to bear the obloquy which will attach to it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. ASHURST in the chair). The question is on the amendment proposed by the junior Senator from Florida to the amendment of the committee.

Mr. TRAMMELL. I ask the acting chairman of the committee if he will allow this paragraph to go over until to-morrow so that my amendment may be printed, and also in order that some other Senators may have an opportunity to read it and give it some consideration.

Mr. SMOOT. If the Senator desires to withdraw his amendment at this time and allow the amendment of the committee to be acted upon, that will not preclude him from offering his amendment in the Senate. I will say to the Senator that we have already voted upon the same principle. We want to get through with the bill some time or other.

Mr. TRAMMELL. I prefer not to withdraw my amendment. I will suggest the absence of a quorum and take a vote upon the amendment, and then I will reserve the right to have further action when the bill reaches the Senate.

Mr. SMOOT. As I remember the Senator's amendment, it strikes out the House text of the bill. Of course, if that is the case, it is not in order at the present time.

Mr. TRAMMELL. It seems to me that the entire paragraph is open to amendment, a part of the paragraph being the amendment proposed by the committee to the House text.

Mr. SMOOT. I will say to the Senator that committee amendments are now being considered.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair understands the junior Senator from Florida suggests the absence of a quorum?

Mr. TRAMMELL. I suggest the absence of a quorum, Mr. President.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will call the roll.

The principal legislative clerk called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst	Harrison	Moses	Smoot

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Sixty-two Senators having answered to their names, a quorum is present.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, a number of Senators are now in the Chamber who probably have not heard the discussion on the pending amendment. I simply wish, before the Senate votes on this matter, to have the proposed amendment stated.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, the amendment is out of order at this time. We are now considering committee amendments, and the Senator's amendment proposes to strike out the whole of subsection C, which is a part of the House bill. Under the agreement heretofore reached by the Senate, an amendment of that kind is not in order at this time. I do not think, therefore, we ought to take the time of the Senate again to read the amendment. The Senator will have an opportunity to offer the amendment later. I believe that we ought to proceed in order and the amendment is not in order at this time.

Mr. TRAMMELL. Mr. President, is it the idea of the Senator from Utah to dispose of the amendment as reported by the committee, and that it will then be in order to offer a substitute?

Mr. SMOOT. No. Later on, after we get through with committee amendments, it will be in order.

Mr. TRAMMELL. After we shall have concluded the consideration of committee amendments?

Mr. SMOOT. Then the Senator from Florida may again offer his amendment as a substitute for this amendment.

Mr. TRAMMELL. Then, with that understanding, I will send the amendment to the desk and let it lie on the table and be printed, so that it may be considered later.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That order will be entered. The next amendment passed over will be stated.

The next amendment passed over was, on page 48, line 25, after the word "personal," to strike out the words "exemption, which shall be computed on their aggregate net incomes; and in case they," and to insert "exemption. The amount of such personal exemption shall be $2,500, unless the aggregate net income of such husband and wife is in excess of $5,000, in which case the amount of such personal exemption shall be $2,000. If such husband and wife"

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I wish to offer an amendment on behalf of the Committee on Finance. On page 50, line 20, after the letter (A), I move to strike out "interest received from foreign traders or foreign trade corporations, (B)"

Mr. KING. May I inquire of my colleague whether that amendment is not tied to the proposition for which the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE] was contending?

Mr. SMOOT. It is designed to perfect the bill according to the action of the Senate in striking out paragraphs 4 and 5, on page 5 of the bill.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, of course, in view of the action of the Senate with respect to the amendment offered by the Senator from Wisconsin, he having asked for a separate vote on the amendment, I presume that I ought to ask for a separate vote in this instance, unless——

Mr. SMOOT. I repeat, the amendment is to conform with the action of the Senate in adopting the amendment offered by the Senator from Wisconsin. The Senator from Wisconsin asked that the amendment be agreed to to conform with the amendment which was agreed to as offered by him the other day.

Mr. KING. My recollection was——

Mr. SIMMONS. If the Senator will pardon me for a statement, this amendment is made necessary by reason of the action of the Senate in adopting the amendment offered by the Senator from Wisconsin.

Mr. KING. Then, I am in error. I had supposed that amendment had been defeated.

Mr. SIMMONS. No; it was not defeated; it was adopted.

Mr. KING. Then I agree with the Senator.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Utah desire the question put on his amendment to the committee amendment?

Mr. SMOOT. Yes; I ask that the question may be put on it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Utah to the committee amendment.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SMOOT. Now, on page 50, line 24, I move to strike out "(C)" and to insert "(B)."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment to the amendment will be agreed to in the absence of objection. The question now is on agreeing to the amendment of the committee as it has been amended.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Mr. President, I have an amendment to another part of the bill, which I ask to have printed and lie on the table.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from New Mexico proposes an amendment which will be printed and lie on the table.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Mr. President, while on my feet I desire to call attention to an article respecting the accomplishments of the League of Nations which appeared in the Boston Herald of Sunday, October 16. It is not only a well-written article but it contains some very valuable information. If I should not be accused of filibustering against the pending bill I would take up the time of the Senate to read it; but I do not wish to delay the consideration of the bill, and, therefore, ask unanimous consent that the article may be printed in the RECORD in eight-point type, the same kind of type as the matter generally appearing in the RECORD.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from New Mexico? There being none, it is so ordered, and the article will appear in the type which the Senator requests.

The article referred to is as follows:

LEAGUE OF NATIONS ACTIVE, SELF-RELIANT, AND VIGOROUS—IT IS NOT AS POWERFUL AS IT WAS EXPECTED TO BE, BECAUSE THE UNITED STATES IS NOT A MEMBER—INSTEAD OF BEING A SUPERGOVERNMENT, AS SOME HAD FEARED, IT IS A DELIBERATIVE ASSEMBLY, AND AS SUCH HAS A GOOD RECORD OF ACCOMPLISHMENT AND IS HIGHLY REGARDED IN ENGLAND AND EUROPE.

[By Paul Revere Frothingham, D. D.]

"The second annual meeting of the assembly of the League of Nations has recently come to an end. For just one month, from September 5 to October 5, daily sessions were held in the Salle du Reformation in Geneva. On occasions the assembly came together twice each day, with the exception of Sundays. And all the time the council and the various committees were conferring constantly, sometimes sitting far into the night. When the full and official report of the assembly is published it will prove interesting reading. Let us hope that it will likewise correct many false impressions in regard to the league which are prevalent in this country and elsewhere. Americans more particularly need somehow to rid themselves of certain fixed ideas which are as false as they are unfortunate. For my own part I went to Geneva an ardent supporter of the league, and I came away much more enthusiastic than I went. After staying there and studying the situation for about three weeks I became more than ever persuaded of the fact that in the league there is nothing for America to fear, and nearly everything that she ought to champion and accept.

"In the first place, the league is neither dead nor in any likelihood of ceasing to exist. It is active, self-reliant, vigorous. The attempt to spread the impression through the United States that the whole thing is a failure is so fundamentally false that it can not long continue to deceive people. The truth must finally prevail, for the 'truth is mighty above all things.'

OTHER NATIONS NOT INDIFFERENT.

"Again, we delude ourselves if we think that the other countries of the world are indifferent to the league, or have no faith in it. Such is not the case. In England, for instance, I found those whom we call 'the people' heartily in favor of the league, and standing solidly behind it. There is, to be sure, another and a somewhat disconcerting side. If one talks with a denizen of Piccadilly or Pall Mall; if the opinion is asked of a resident of Belgravia, the answer very likely will be a shrug of the shoulders, or a rather cynical expression of indifference. But in the Midlands, Yorkshire, and the North—and indeed with the middle classes generally—it is different. In short, the descendants of the men and women who stood up for the North at the time of our Civil War, and were champions of the Union, now see in the league the promise of a larger union embracing the entire world. Take, for instance, the 'League of Nations Union,' which is a national organization which was established for the sole purpose of arousing public interest in the league and getting people to support it. The headquarters of the union are in Grosvenor Crescent, London, the president is Lord Grey, and Lord Robert Cecil is chairman of the executive committee. At the time of its foundation the union had some 3,000 members; to-day the membership numbers more than 127,000; and my recollection is that some 800 branches, or chapters, have been established in various parts of the Kingdom. The leaders of British organized labor have indorsed the cause in the following manifesto:

FRANCE SENT ABLE MEN.

"'The League of Nations Union should be supported by every man and woman who has at heart the insuring of peace, the prevention of a new and greater war, the industrial recovery of Europe, the improvement of the standard of life, the continuation of our civilization, and the progress of humanity.' That is a pretty sweeping commendation for people who are supposed to be indifferent.

"I can not speak so confidently in regard to France. We are accustomed to hear it said that the French take no stock in the league. But, if such is the case, why were three of the very ablest men of France representing the country at Geneva? Leon Bourgeois, Gabriel Hanotaux, Rene Vivianni were the peers of any statesmen in Geneva, and the entire French delegation was one of the very strongest that was present.

"Here is what a distinguished American, who holds a very responsible position in France and has been there since the war, told me in regard to French opinion on the subject of the league. I am not privileged to use his name, but this is what he wrote:

"I feel quite sure that the European nations took the league seriously from the beginning, and that they continue to do so. It is a mistake to regard it as a Wilson conception. It embodied in the beginning greatly exaggerated hopes, which were, as I say, serious. It embodies now saner expectations, but they are still serious. * * * The man in the street was seriously interested in the beginning, but he lost interest, as he always does, when his exaggerated hope is disappointed, and now is inclined to scoff; but I think that the interest of the statesmen, and even of the politicians, has grown, rather than diminished, now that the exaggerated notions have been sloughed off.

"That opinion in regard to the league was expressed in June, before the knotty question of Upper Silesia was referred to it for settlement; and since then, of course, it has suddenly grown in popular favor, more particularly in France. Indeed, as Wellington Koo remarked in his opening address to the assembly, the question now seems to be, What would Europe do without the league?

NOT A SUPERGOVERNMENT.

"Again, we need in America to rid ourselves of the idea that the league is in any sense a supergovernment, intended to limit the sovereignty of States. It is not that at all, but a deliberative body, allowing for endless difference of opinion and designed to encourage cooperative action. Among other Americans in Geneva attending the meetings of the assembly was a well-known diplomat of the United States. He has been an outspoken opponent of the league from the very first. I asked him one day what his opinion was now that he saw things face to face and in operation. His answer came without a moment's hesitation, and it was this:

"Of course, the league has not turned out at all what it was meant to be. It was intended to be a superstate with coercive powers, instead of which it is merely a consulting body, allowing liberty for differing points of view.

"Whether that American 'observer in Geneva' was correct in his opinion as to what the league was intended to be is open to very serious question. Most of the statesmen who were present and who have helped to shape the organization would not agree with him. There can be no question whatever, none the less, as to what the league actually is. It constitutes anything but a supergovernment, and it is difficult to see how it can possibly do any country any harm.

"Once more we need to rid ourselves in this country of the most mistaken idea that the league has accomplished nothing. The published facts entirely refute so false a charge.

HAS BORNE MUCH FRUIT.

"That it has accomplished all that we might wish is, of course, not true, but already, in the brief course of its organized existence, it has borne much fruit. We need, in all fairness, to remember how very young the institution is. It has only just begun to walk. It was born at Versailles with the ratification of the peace treaty, January 10, 1920. It came to self-consciousness less than a year ago, at the first assembly meeting in Geneva. And in the course of that brief period—

"It has governed the Saar Basin since February 26 and has adjudicated on the question of Eupen and Malmedy, giving these Provinces to Belgium. It has held a financial conference of 39 States, including the former enemy States, to examine the financial and economical situation of the whole world, and has made recommendation for restoring credit and financial stability.

"At the request of Great Britain it intervened to prevent war between Sweden and Finland over the Aaland Islands. It has been successful in preventing war, and the two countries have agreed to live by the judgment that was reached.

"At the request of Poland it intervened between Poland and Lithuania in their dispute over the frontier.

"It has taken on itself the gigantic task of checking the spread of cholera and typhus in eastern Europe. It has been successful in securing the repatriation of 200,000 prisoners of war between Russia and the former Central Powers.

"It has drawn up the constitution of a permament court of international justice, to be composed of 11 judges and 4 deputy judges, elected regardless of their nationality.

"Last, but very far from least, the league has had referred to it the dangerous dispute in regard to upper Silesia, and Europe gave a great sigh of relief when this action was suddenly and unanimously taken.

"I might go on and speak of what the league has done for Austria. Instead of a strangled Austria we now have Austria, the invalid, in the care of a group of experts representing a world organization, intent on giving aid to a suffering sister.

"All this is but a part of what has been accomplished. It is enough, however, to convince those who are open to conviction that something new has come into the world which henceforth must be reckoned with.

GROWING MORE INFLUENTIAL.

"When the cynic, therefore, scornfully inquires, 'What has the league amounted to?' it is possible to point to these achievements and to remark that these are not the signs of speedy dissolution nor of death from inanition. They are evidences rather of growing strength, of increasing confidence, and extending influence.

"All this, however, refers to what took place before September 5, 1921, when the second assembly came together.

"It is still too soon to speak with completeness or confidence of what since then has been achieved. Of one thing, however, it is possible to speak with full knowledge and conviction.

"Whatever the second assembly may have done or failed to do, this one supreme achievement at least must be set down to its credit: It has elected the judges of a permanent world court, and has thus brought into existence an 'ever-present piece of international machinery which will at last allow the nations to feel that they can bring their disputes to settlement along the lines of justice.' The world has dreamed for many years of a supreme court of the world, and now at last the tribunal has been successfully established by the League of Nations. That marks a tremendous stride in the pathway of human progress. It places an international milestone which probably will be long remembered.

MACHINERY WORKED PERFECTLY.

"When I left Geneva everyone was on tiptoe waiting for the election of the judges, which was scheduled for Wednesday, September 14. It was feared that the process would be a long one. There were those who prophesied that it would extend over a week. The machinery was untried as yet and intricate. The council and assembly had to agree. A deadlock was looked upon as possible and even likely.

"But nothing of the kind took place; the machinery worked perfectly, and in the course of the first day the 11 judges and 3 out of the 4 deputy judges were quietly and happily elected. The remaining deputy was soon agreed upon after a conference was held. I repeat, if the second assembly accomplished nothing else, this one achievement in itself is enough to render it historic.

"But there was much else. It was a wonderful assembly, both collectively and individually. It gave one a decided thrill to look down on those representatives of more than 40 nations sitting together and taking counsel in regard to world problems. I kept repeating to myself the familiar words of Scripture, 'And they shall come from the east and from the west and from the north and from the south and shall sit down in the kingdom of God.' There they were before me, three from each country, at their little tables, which were arranged in alphabetical order.

Bulgarians side by side with Canadians, Poles touching elbows with Portuguese and Persians. So another prophecy had at last come true.

NEVER ANYTHING LIKE IT.

"One day, as I was sitting in the press gallery listening to the debates, a young American, looking somewhat worn and seedy, edged up beside me. We fell to talking, and he soon disclosed his identity. It was Whiting Williams, who has made a reputation for himself by his studies of mining conditions in different countries, living as a miner, for weeks at a time, in Wales and the north of England and in various of the collieries of America. He told me how he had just come from the Saar mines and was in Geneva to make a report as to conditions, which were very favorable, to the administrative section of the league, which has the region in charge. I ventured to suggest to him that after what he had been through, this meeting in the Sallee de Reformation must seem rather tame. 'On the contrary,' he replied, 'I think this is the most thrilling day of my life.' And when I inquired what he meant, he just waved his hand over the assembly where Belgians, Poles, Danes, Japanese, British, Brazilians, French, Spanish, Italians, Greeks, Chinese, Chileans, Swedes, Swiss, Norwegians, and all the rest were seated quietly together. 'Why, this,' he said. 'There was never anything like it in the course of history.' And there never was.

"Moreover, individually as well as collectively the assembly was remarkable. The various countries did not send mediocre men to represent them at Geneva. They sent great men of international repute, men of letters, statesmen, scholars, reformers, jurists, philosophers, and diplomats. Seated side by side on that assembly floor, coming together from the four corners of the world, and representing more than three-fourths of the people of the earth, were publicists, not politicians; idealists, not opportunists; men of attainments, not aspirants for public office. This was true of Japan and Italy, of England and Belgium, of Norway, China, Chile, Spain, and Austria. I have referred to the French delegation, with its trio of great men. But not less remarkable were other countries; Norway with Nansen, who was always a conspicuous and commanding figure; China with the courteous and polished Wellington Koo; Japan with the Viscount Ishii and Baron Hayashi; Sweden with Branting; and Czechoslovakia with Dr. Benet, of whom the world will probably hear more in the days and years to come.

BRITAIN'S GREAT DELEGATION.

"The British delegation in itself was a thing to reflect upon and study. Chief of all was Mr. Balfour, the British representative to the council, urbane, influential, universally respected, a man of vast learning and broad experience in public affairs, a member of Parliament for nearly 50 years, once prime minister, at present a member of the cabinet. Seated beside Mr. Balfour at the sessions and often to be seen with him on the streets and at headquarters was the Right Hon. Herbert Fisher, also a member of the British cabinet, head of the education department, of whom it was said when he gave up his university post and accepted public office, that somehow an angel had strayed off into political affairs.

"Representing South Africa was another member of Parliament, Lord Robert Cecil, third son of the late Marquis of Salisbury, the greatest champion in England of the league, executive chief of the League of Nations union, one of the honest and most fearless men in public life to-day, and thought by many as the most likely man to be next prime minister of England.

"Last, but not least, was Prof. Gilbert Murray, the great Greek scholar of Oxford, considered by some to be the ablest member of the assembly, and with a wealth of historical knowledge to guide him in giving counsel to his associates. Those men thought the league of sufficient significance to give to its affairs a month of their precious time and strength. And they were busy in Geneva from early morning until late at night. They let it be known at once that they would accept no social engagements, and devoted all their attention to league questions and interests.

"With such men and scores of others like them enthusiastic for the cause it would seem that the future of the movement is reasonably bright. The most difficult period has successfully been passed. The general impression in Geneva was that the league is almost certain to survive. It is far from being in a moribund condition. It has rather surprising activity and vigor. Because, however, of America's attitude it has to be recognized that it is something of a cripple. It does not have the use of all its limbs. It can not, for instance, function fully nor effectively in regard to armaments. How can it when a great munition-making Nation such as we are holds aloof and is not as yet a party to any possible agreements?

"In regard to this situation there are, or may be said to be, two parties in the league. One party is headed by Lord Robert Cecil, the other by his cousin, Mr. Balfour. Cecil is the champion of an aggressive policy. He believes in going ahead, and he would have the league proceed without any thought of the United States. The tendency to look over the shoulder and to consider what effect any line of action will have on America is one in which he does not believe. 'Be bold! Strike out! Take the path that is clearly right,' is his policy of push. He is so honest, so enthusiastic for the cause, in regard to which he is almost a fanatic, that he is impatient of delay.

A LINE OF CLEAVAGE.

"The attitude of Mr. Balfour is quite different. He is naturally cautious and conservative. He holds that the league must do a little at a time. Move slowly; not attempt the impossible; gradually make its way; and adjust itself to conditions as they exist.

"There you have a line of definite cleavage. It is the young man in opposition to the older one; the cavalry leader and the commander of infantry. And between the two, it must be confessed that the compromise has for the most part been fortunate and fruitful.

"Of late, however, the indications rather seem to be that the bolder, more progressive policy is paramount. At least Lord Robert, according to reports I have seen in the press, won a rather dramatic victory the other day. It is said that he forced through committee a resolution calling for the preparation, before the next meeting of the assembly, of general proposals for world disarmament in the form of a treaty draft or some other definite plan.

"The motion, I read, was driven through in the face of opposition on the parts of England, France, and Japan, whose proposition has been to wait for developments at the Washington conference.

"I can not speak with any precision on this point, for the discussion took place after I had left Geneva, and it is wise, as well as necessary, before passing judgment to wait for the full report. In general, however, I should say that the tendency would seem to be in the direction of Lord Robert's lead. That is to say, there would appear to be a growing feeling that the league had better go ahead and grapple things without too constant thought about America.

"Moreover, that, in general, is likely to be the line along which things will probably work out in future. Perhaps I am reflecting too much my own impressions and convictions, but I have felt from the first that the only effective way in which to enlist the cooperation of America is to make the league effective. If it is seen to work, we may come in time to be wise enough to work with it. Of course, the league would be willing to come half way to meet us; but it does not seem that they feel inclined to make things too easy nor to tempt us by making every possible concession. Instead of letting down the bars and adding to our sense of self-importance, the policy would seem to be to make the field so fruitful and productive that no nation can be content to remain outside. I can not help believing, therefore, that it was good policy as well as sound principle to hold on to article 10, neither eliminating nor amending it as Canada advised. Even Mr. Balfour, according to press reports, came out the other day in favor of the famous article, contending that it constituted the very heart of the league, and that it could not properly be construed as endangering national sovereignty.

NO SACRIFICE OF SOVEREIGNTY.

"The question of national sovereignty, or the right of self-determination, is, of course, a very vital and important question. It touches America in a sensitive spot. But it should not be assumed that the other States of the world, more particularly the younger ones, are any less sensitive than we are on the subject. We can be very sure that they do not feel that they are sacrificing any of this essential sovereignty by becoming members of the league. If they did feel so, they would perhaps have remained outside. They are wise enough, however, to perceive the necessary limitations that are incident upon civilized existence. We ourselves have much to learn and a vast amount to acquire in this one respect. As I view the situation, and, of course, it is infinitely complicated, States must pass through much the same stages that individuals have passed through with the advance of population and the development of community existence. Individuals have more or less definitely learned the difficult art of living together. They have given up—they have had to give up—certain rights and privileges, first for the simple reason that life has become congested with so many contacts.

"A man, for example, may live out in Dover or Pepperell and have great freedom of action. He may carry firearms and use them; he may let his dogs run free. But when he comes to Boston and becomes a resident of Beacon Street he can not disport himself by shooting squirrels on the Common nor pigeons in the Public Gardens. He must hold his dogs in leash and conform himself to general conditions of all city life.

STATES LIKE INDIVIDUALS.

"In much the same way States must somehow come to understand that there is such a thing as a community of nations. In the words of a well-known writer in the Atlantic Monthly for October, 'the right of a nation to shoot up the world and endanger civilization should be limited, just as the right of an individual to shoot up the community in which he lives is limited.'

"Any treaty obligation is, in the sense in which the agreement has been advanced, a limitation upon sovereignty; that is, a limitation upon the power of a nation to do anything it may choose. In order to meet the requirements of such a claim, we should have international anarchy, where each nation would be subject to no law of nations, but only to its own will and to such self-imposed notions of righteousness as it might see fit to recognize and put in force.

"With all of this, the practical question which rises uppermost in all of our minds relates to the future course of action in regard to the league on the part of the United States. That is a subject on which there is violent difference of opinion, and on which not all people express their minds either with calmness or intelligence. The only point, almost, on which both sides can agree is that the situation is extremely complicated. Irrespective of how we got into the present tangle, it is certainly one from which we can not easily disentangle ourselves. 'Cutting the painter with Europe,' writes Austin Harrison, 'was a gesture, not a principle; and it has produced little but chaos, distrust, and disillusion even in America.'

"In seeking a happy issue out of our present perplexity and distress, I may perhaps be permitted to make one simple but constructive suggestion. It would appear to me that Americans can not do much better than to turn back for instruction to the ethics of Aristotle, and to call to mind what that famous Greek philosopher said so well so many centuries ago in regard to the nature and the origin of man.

"According to Aristotle, 'in considering the nature of man the most important thing to take account of is not that out of which he has come, but the thing into which he is developing; not what he is at the lowest, but what he is at the highest; not what he is born as, but what he is born for. A flower is not less a flower because it is colored in the mind.'

"It would seem that we ought to feel the same about this organization. Of what matter is it that had to do with bringing it into shape? The thing to consider is, what value has it, what can it accomplish for the world?

A DREAM AND IDEAL.

"Perhaps the Washington conference will supply an answer to that question—that conference from which we hope and pray so much will come. It may be that we must wait much longer and leave things to the healing touch of time. But at least there is no need to conceal from ourselves nor from the world the dream and the ideal which the second meeting of the assembly of the League of Nations quickened, clarified, and strengthened.

"One of the interesting sights of Geneva is what is known as 'The Junction.' A little way outside the city the blue waters of the Rhone are met by the gray and turbid waters of the Arne as they rush impetuously down from the distant mountains. For a time the two streams are distinct and separate. Far as the eye can see the blue and gray waters can be clearly traced. But at length, as they flow beneath a bridge in France, they are found to be united, and as one swift, potent stream they make their way through fruitful fields and busy cities to the Mediterranean Sea.

"We may accept one of the processes of nature as a parable and prophecy for man. In the meantime we may wisely listen to one of the most constant and discerning friends that America has ever had. Said Viscount Bryce as he was preparing to sail for home a few days since: 'Those for whom I venture to speak, workers who have nothing to do with our respective Governments, mean to persevere in supporting the League of Nations as the only plan yet launched with a prospect of success.'"

The READING CLERK. On page 54, strike out lines 9 to 25, both inclusive, and on page 55, lines 1 to 5, both inclusive, and insert:

(e) Items of gross income, expenses, losses, and deductions, other than those specified in subdivisions (a) and (c), shall be allocated or apportioned to sources within or without the United States under rules and regulations prescribed by the commissioner with the approval of the Secretary. Where items of gross income are separately allocated to sources within the United States, there shall be deducted (for the purpose of computing the net income therefrom) the expenses, losses, and other deductions properly apportioned or allocated thereto and a ratable part of other expenses, losses, or other deductions which can not definitely be allocated to some item or class of gross income. The remainder, if any, shall be included in full as net income from sources within the United States. In the case of gross income derived from sources partly within and partly without the United States, the net income may first be computed by deducting the expenses, losses, or other deductions apportioned or allocated thereto and a ratable part of any expenses, losses, or other deductions which can not definitely be allocated to some item or class of gross income; and the portion of such net income attributable to sources within the United States may be determined by processes or formulas of general apportionment prescribed by the commissioner with the approval of the Secretary. Gains, profits, and income from (1) transportation or other services rendered partly within and partly without the United States, or (2) from the sale of personal property produced (in whole or in part) by the taxpayer within and sold without the United States, or produced (in whole or in part) by the taxpayer without and sold within the United States, shall be treated as derived partly from sources within and partly from sources without the United States. Gains, profits, and income derived from the purchase of personal property within and its sale without the United States or from the purchase of personal property without and its sale within the United States, shall be treated as derived entirely from the country in which sold.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President, I should like to ask some member of the committee the meaning of the last language in the paragraph just read. Does that mean that a corporation selling goods abroad shall be construed as having made the profit abroad, and therefore shall be freed from taxation upon that profit?

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, this has nothing at all to do with exemptions, and applies only to foreigners, nonresident aliens. I will say to the Senator that the reason for rewriting that paragraph was that in the practice of the department they have found it almost impossible to meet the conditions arising from returns of this sort, and Dr. Adams thought as a result of the experience they have had in the department that this was the only way to arrange it so that all would be treated alike and understand the law, because the existing law is very, very hard to understand.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. It is dealing altogether with nonresident aliens?

Mr. SMOOT. Nonresident aliens.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President, will the Senator explain to us what is the difference between the House provision and the Senate substitute?

Mr. SMOOT. It gives the commissioner more power—that is, I mean, with the consent of the Secretary. On pages 55 and 56 the Senator will find these words:

The portion of such net income attributable to sources within the United States may be determined by processes or formulas of general apportionment prescribed by the commissioner with the approval of the Secretary.

That is quite a power that is given into the hands of the commissioner, but it is with the approval of the Secretary. The consensus of opinion of the department is that that is the only way in which they can arrive at the facts of the case from these nonresident aliens; and it also settles another question by adding lines 12 to 16, reading as follows:

Gains, profits, and income derived from the purchase of personal property within and its sale without the United States or from the purchase of personal property without and its sale within the United States, shall be treated as derived entirely from the country in which sold.

The language is rather ambiguous, but it seemed to require both specific statements so that the department would feel sure that whatever was done would act the same in either case and that the tax would be imposed, whether it was in the United States or whether it was out of the United States.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I understand the significance of the last sentence to be that all profits made upon a purchase of property in the United States sold abroad go out, but profits made on property bought abroad and sold here go in. That is so, is it?

Mr. SMOOT. There is no exemption of taxation in this provision, but it does mean that a nonresident alien must pay a tax whether he makes a gain in the United States by the sale of goods or whether it is made from without the United States.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. That is to say, if the nonresident alien is here importing goods into the United States he pays?

Mr. SMOOT. He pays the tax.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. But if there is a man here exporting goods, he does not pay?

Mr. SMOOT. But if he were here he would not be a nonresident. He would be a resident here—a resident alien.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Yes; he is here, but he is engaged in the exporting business and another man is engaged in the importing business. The importer pays the tax and the exporter does not? That is the situation?

Mr. SMOOT. The exporter does pay the tax, because he is not a nonresident alien. He is a resident alien, and under the law he pays the tax. This applies only to nonresident aliens, and we are going to collect a tax from them where they derive profits in this country.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President, if this nonresident alien is selling goods in the United States, he pays his taxes here?

Mr. SMOOT. Yes.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. If he is buying goods in the United States and selling them abroad, he does not?

Mr. SMOOT. He does not.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. That is reasonable.

Mr. SMOOT. But if he is an agent here and if he is a resident here, then he must pay them.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will state the next amendment passed over.

The READING CLERK. The next amendment passed over is, on page 78, where the committee proposes to insert, beginning with line 21, the following:

PART III.—CORPORATIONS.

TAX ON CORPORATIONS.

SEC. 230. That, in lieu of the tax imposed by section 230 of the revenue act of 1918, there shall be levied, collected, and paid for each taxable year upon the net income of every corporation a tax at the following rates:

(a) For the calendar year 1921, 10 per cent of the amount of the net income in excess of the credits provided in section 236; and

(b) For each calendar year thereafter 15 per cent of such excess amount.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Mr. President, this is one of the most important provisions of the bill, and I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will call the roll.

The roll was called, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst	Hale	Moses	Simmons
Broussard	Harris	Myers	Smoot
Bursum	Harrison	Nelson	Spencer
Capper	Heflin	New	Stanfield
Caraway	Hitchcock	Newberry	Stanley

France	McKellar	Ransdell	Willis

Glass	McNary	Sheppard

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Sixty-six Senators having answered to their names, a quorum is present.

Mr. SIMMONS obtained the floor.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. SIMMONS. I yield.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I simply want to make a request. The item now before the Senate is "Part 3, corporations. Tax on corporations." I take it for granted that the action taken by the Senate on this part of the bill will largely depend upon what action is taken upon the excess-profits provision. The excess-profits tax provision of the bill is found on page 130. If the excess-profits tax provision of the bill is not agreed to, then I take it that no one, even on the other side, will vote for the increase in the tax on the net profits of corporations. It seems to me that the proper way to proceed, therefore, would be to ask unanimous consent at this time to take up title 3, war-profits and excess-profits tax for 1921, found on page 130, and when that is decided, then it will be understood that we will return to page 78 of the bill, "Part 3, corporations."

Mr. SIMMONS. That is what I rose to suggest, Mr. President.

Mr. SMOOT. I have no objection, and I will ask unanimous consent that that be done.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senate has heard the request of the Senator from Utah. Is there objection?

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I understand the Senator is asking that we take up the excess-profits tax provision of the bill?

Mr. SMOOT. That is the request.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. If we can occupy the time of the Senate with something else, I should like a short time further before we take that up. Some days ago I furnished data to the expert drafter and requested that an amendment be prepared to this provision. Owing to illness in the force of experts, the amendment which I asked to have prepared has not been drafted, and if we can just pass this over it seems to me it would be better than to go back and take up what follows, and I suggest that by unanimous consent we pass over this amendment for the present.

Mr. SMOOT. I think this is one of the vital questions in the bill, and I am quite sure it is going to provoke a great deal of discussion, so why not go on with it now? I have not any idea that it will be disposed of this afternoon.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I think the Senator is quite right about that.

Mr. SMOOT. Then let us get that much back of us.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. But it seems to me that the other feature of the bill will be the one primarily discussed, and that this ought to await action upon that. There is no reason that I can see why we should not go ahead with these amendments until we reach page 130 of the bill.

Mr. SMOOT. Does the Senator mean to pass over part 3, corporations?

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. No; I do not mean that.

Mr. SMOOT. I will say to the Senator that there is another reason I might have mentioned to the Senate why I prefer to take up the excess-profits tax at this time. The Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH] has an amendment to offer to part 3, corporations, which he spoke of yesterday, and it was virtually agreed that he would have a chance to offer his amendment to that part. We can take this afternoon, I am quite sure, in the discussion of the principle of the excess-profits tax, and we can get that much behind us. I do not desire at this time to take up any other subject to conflict with the two great questions which are to be solved in these two propositions we have just been talking about.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I, too, had intended to call attention to the fact that the Senator from Massachusetts has an amendment to propose to this section, and offer that as a reason for passing it over. I suppose by to-morrow morning I shall be prepared with my amendment and can go ahead at that time. If there are others who wish to discuss the general provision of the bill relating to corporations at this time, I have no objection to going ahead.

Mr. SIMMONS. Do I understand that it is proposed to take up the excess-profits provision now, and that if we should finish that this afternoon we would not return to the corporate income-tax provision, but would take up the amendments lying in between those two provisions?

Mr. SMOOT. I would not want to say offhand, Mr. President; but if we take up the war-profits provision this afternoon, and decide on that, I do not think there will be any question, from the expressions I have heard from Members on the other side, that if the excess-profits tax is retained we are not going then to increase the tax on corporations.

Mr. SIMMONS. If we should finish the excess-profits tax provision this afternoon, I would not like to have the income tax on corporations taken up, because I know the Senator from Massachusetts has an amendment which provides for a graduated tax on incomes of corporations which he would wish to substitute for this tax provision.

Mr. SMOOT. I know the Senator from Massachusetts has an amendment, but let us not lose any more time. Let us go on with the excess-profits tax provision, and when we reach the other we can decide that question.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the request of the Senators from North Carolina and Utah that we turn to page 130 of the bill and take up the excess-profits tax title? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered. The Secretary will state the amendment.

The ASSISTANT SECRETARY. On page 130, the first amendment suggested is to strike out line 1, "Title III.—Excess-profits tax repeal," and insert "Title III.—War-profits and excess-profits tax for 1921."

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I had to step out of the Chamber for a moment. What paragraph are we considering?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Page 130, lines 1, 2, and 3.

Mr. REED. How much of it has been read?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Just those three lines.

Mr. SMOOT. Will the Senator yield just for a moment while we make one little correction?

Mr. REED. I yield.

Mr. SMOOT. On page 132, line 10, the "(D)" should be "(C)."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Missouri yield for that purpose?

Mr. REED. Certainly.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will state the amendment.

The ASSISTANT SECRETARY. On page 132, line 10, at the beginning of the line, to strike out "(D)" and to insert in lieu thereof "(C)."

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President, do I understand the amendment now before the Senate is to repeal Title III of the revenue act of 1918?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment before the Senate will be found on page 130, line 1, to strike out "Title III.—Excess-profits tax repeal" and to insert "Title III.—War-profits and excess-profits tax for 1921."

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I do not understand the import of the language to be stricken out. I think it had better be passed over without being adopted in that way, because, as I understand its import, as near as I can make it out, it is intended to fit into the body of the provision which stops this tax with the year 1921. I desire to offer an amendment which would change the text of the bill, and I think therefore would change this title. I do not know that my amendment is in order under the practice we are following here, which seems to be to consider committee amendments, but I move at this point that on page 130, line 18, after the numerals "1921," there be inserted the words "and each year thereafter." I am proposing to amend the committee amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That is in order.

Mr. SMOOT. So that we may understand it and have the record straight, have we agreed to the committee amendment?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. No; the Senate has not taken action on the amendment found at the top of page 130.

Mr. REED. That title will not go into the bill if the amendment that I now offer is accepted.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator wish the amendment at the top of page 130 passed over?

Mr. REED. Yes; for the present.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection? There being none, it is so ordered.

Mr. SMOOT. So that the issue may be raised, why does not the Senator simply move to strike out "for 1921"? Then the issue would be clear. That is the committee amendment in line 3, and an amendment to that is in order right now.

Mr. REED. The Senator is referring to the title of the section. I do not think it would be as plain as the amendment I have offered.

Mr. President, this brings the issue clearly before the Senate whether we shall deal with this form of tax or not. The present bill proposes to repeal the war taxes or to end the war taxes with the calendar year 1921, and that year ends December 31 of this year, so that the proposition is that after the 31st day of next December there shall be no further taxes of any kind levied upon excess profits. It does not make any difference whether the profits are reasonable or unreasonable. They may be as high as 100 per cent or 500 per cent or 5,000 per cent, but they are to be tax free. I do not propose at the present time to discuss the question whether the present excess-profits tax might or might not be modified, but I desire to discuss the question as to whether we should take that tax all off or not.

Mr. President, I am going to wait until the exodus from the other side of the Chamber is completed. I do not ask any man in the Senate Chamber to sit and listen to me talk about this question, but there is going to be a quorum of the Senate maintained reasonably while we consider these important features of the bill. It may stay in the cloakrooms, but it will have to be within call. I might feel that this is personal, but it is not; it is habitual. It happens when anybody is speaking on the merits of the question, and then we are lectured by some Senators, who do not know what is in the bill at all, because we are taking time to talk about it. Incidentally, I wish to make a remark or two about these tirades that have been delivered with reference to the time consumed on the pending bill.

The bill, it was stated this morning, has been before the Senate three months. The bill has been before the Senate technically for 33 days, and during that period we disposed of the canal tolls bill and two of the most important treaties that our country has negotiated in 100 years.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, may I correct the Senator? The bill was reported to the Senate on September 26.

Mr. REED. I stand corrected. More than half of the time of the Senate was occupied with the important measures to which I have just referred.

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. Mr. President, I hope the Senator will not omit to state that we also took up enough time to give Brazil $1,000,000 to build a permanent structure, which we had no constitutional right to do.

Mr. REED. Yes; and we did many other things in that interval of time.

The RECORD will show that the bill which proposes to raise over four thousand millions of dollars in 12 months' time has been discussed very much less than the ordinary revenue bill, even some of the bills we passed during the war.

The bill of 1917 reached the Senate on May 25, was reported on July 3, and did not pass until September 10.

The bill of 1918 was passed more rapidly than most of them, because there were only a few changes made. It was a very short bill. That bill was reported on December 6 and did not pass until December 23.

The bill of 1916 reached the Senate on July 11, was reported on August 16, and passed on September 5.

The bill of 1913 reached the Senate on May 9, was reported on July 11, and did not pass until September 9.

I do not wish to encumber the RECORD by reading further, but other bills show similar periods of time consumed. I am growing a little tired of listening to lectures from men who are not considering the bill to men who are considering the bill. It is a very easy thing for a man to light his pipe in the cloakroom and then come into the Senate Chamber and indulge in a scolding operation to the men who have been sitting here working. I apprehend that none of the critics of those of us who have been working, if they were put to an examination on the bill and 100 per cent represented perfect, could pass a 10 per cent grade. It is time, Mr. President, for a little plain talk.

The bill is a difficult bill. Scarcely a more difficult problem has ever been presented to any legislative body. Every interest in the United States is seeking to have its taxes cut down. That is universal and natural. I am going to give the majority of the Senate credit for having tried to solve a great many problems, and solve them right, because questions of administration and questions of very difficult nature were presented. My quarrel with them is over two or three great propositions.

This is one of the questions: Shall we take the taxes off of those gentlemen who are engaged in profiteering upon the American people? Shall we find some other source of taxation to make up for the loss of revenue? We must raise this $4,000,000,000 of revenue—and I am using a round number. How shall we raise it? It is admitted that we must lay the hand of the Government upon every single individual, man or woman, who has an income of more than a thousand dollars a year and upon every married man who has an income of more than $2,000 a year. The tax proceeds from that point, gradually rising until we reach the surtax level, and that gradually rises until we reach 50 per cent upon the very large incomes.

In addition to that, we levy many other taxes, all of which are borne by the masses of the people of the country. But let us for a moment consider the case of a head of a family with an income of $2,000 a year. Every dollar that he makes in the world, if he gives to his family any kind of comfort, he must expend to that end. He takes that little salary and goes into the market place to buy the necessities of life. When he reaches the market place he finds that the prices which he must pay are substantially the war prices; that these prices are from two to two and a half times what they were anterior to the war. He goes to buy a pair of shoes which he could buy before the war for from four to five dollars. He inquires the price and is told that they are from ten to twelve dollars.

Mr. POMERENE. Or even $16.

Mr. REED. Yes; they are higher, of course, in some instances. I think I have struck a very low average. He learns that the price of the hide of the steer out of which the shoes are made is about one-fourth of what the price of that hide was before the war; that it now is scarcely worth taking off the animal for the price paid; he learns that the price of nearly all of the raw materials which are necessary to the tanning of that hide have fallen; he learns that in many instances the wages of the persons who make the shoes have fallen; and yet he is compelled to pay $12 for that pair of shoes. He then inquires why. The answer is found in the enormous prices that are charged either by the manufacturer, by the wholesaler, or by the retailer.

He goes down to pay his taxes upon the little $2,000 income that he possesses. Standing behind him is the man who charged him two prices for that pair of shoes and who made 500 per cent on his year's business. That gentleman pays no tax upon those excessive profits.

A farmer comes up to the tax counter at the same time. The farmer has sold his wheat for 90 cents a bushel—less than the prewar price. It cost him $1.10 or $1.20 to raise that bushel of wheat. He is actually out of money, because he planted and harvested the crop. He has sold his wheat, his cattle, his corn, everything that he has produced, and he is out money because of his labors and his efforts. Nevertheless, he must pay taxes, and, having just marketed his hide for $1.25, he stands beside the man who sold him some shoes made out of the hide for $12, and sees the gentleman who profiteered upon him escape any tax whatever upon his excessive profits.

That is the purport of this bill in a nutshell, as described by illustration. Forty-nine per cent of the 110,000,000 people of the United States, in round numbers 50,000,000 human beings, make their living off the farms of the United States. Those 50,000,000 people are compelled to sell their goods in the depressed and bankrupt markets of the world at less than prewar prices. That is bad enough; but when they turn around to buy the necessities of life, the clothing that they must purchase for their backs, the shoes for their feet, the hats for their heads, the dresses for their women folk, the stockings, the agricultural implements, the harness, everything they buy is sold to them at a price substantially twice as high as it was before the war.

The farmer has taken his loss incident to the war, and more than taken it. The gentlemen who made enormous excess profits during the war still are realizing those profits. If they do not realize them the present law does not touch them for a penny. It is only when they make excess profits that they are required to pay a cent under the existing excess-profits tax law.

When are they required to pay an excess-profits tax? They are allowed, first of all, to deduct every expense of their business; to deduct the interest upon all the money they have borrowed; to deduct the salaries paid to all of their officers—and there seems to be no limit upon the amount of the salary which they can pay—to charge off for obsolescence and waste and depreciation almost any sum their conscience will permit, and after they have done all that, they are entitled to a clear profit over and above everything of 8 per cent upon their invested capital. If they make no more than that, under the present law, which it is now proposed to repeal, they do not have a cent of excess profits to pay. When, however, they make more than the 8 per cent net they begin to pay. I said 8 per cent. Let me correct that. It is, in fact, 10 per cent, because while the law states upon its face the figure 8 per cent, there are exemptions which, in fact, raise the profit to 10 per cent net.

After they have made 10 per cent profit net, then if they make anything above that the excess-profits tax applies. How? Twenty per cent of their excess profits up to the point where their excess profits reach 20 per cent; that is the first bracket. After the excess profits have reached 20 per cent, then, under the present law, they are to pay 40 per cent on that part of their excess profits which exceeds 20 per cent.

Mr. President, that does not mean a tax of 20 per cent on the business; that means when they pay 20 per cent of their excess profits as a tax they will have, first, 10 per cent net profit, and, second, that they shall have 80 cents left out of every dollar of excess profits they have made up to the point where they have made 20 per cent profit; and that after that they shall have 60 cents out of every dollar of excess profits they have made, and shall keep the 60 cents. That statement is not absolutely accurate, for according to the manner in which the taxes are figured they do not run quite so high; but I do not propose to go into that detail.

As has been said upon this floor many times, the excess-profits tax which it is estimated will be paid this year will amount to $450,000,000. The excess profits, therefore, figuring in round numbers, which will be made this year by these institutions are probably close to one and three-quarter billion dollars. That is a rough estimate which I am making as I stand on the floor.

Mr. POMERENE. What were the figures the Senator from Missouri stated?

Mr. REED. I think one and three-quarter billion dollars excess profits would realize $450,000,000 of excess-profits taxes. We propose, therefore, to say to the farmer who has lost money, to the small income earner who is straining his last nerve to make both ends meet, "You must pay taxes wrung from you by processes of hardship, but we propose to take the tax off of those who have been successful and who have made their money by making the prices so high that they have deprived you people of a large part of your own earnings."

Mr. President, in my judgment it is the most monstrous proposition that has ever been put before the American Senate. Let us disabuse our minds, if we can, of all prejudice. Let us assume that this question is here as a matter of first instance; that we have no taxes, but we must levy them, and we are confronted with the proposition of levying that tax justly; and we learn that the great mass of the people are staggering under the burden incident to making a mere living; and we learn that here is a class of people that are exceedingly prosperous. They have made 10 per cent. Then, on top of that, they have piled up their prices and continued to pile them up until some of them have made 100 per cent, some of them have made 500 per cent, and some of them more than that; and we are asked now to place the burden of taxation. Where, as a matter of first instance, would an honest body of honest legislators place that tax? Would they put it upon the people already impoverished by the practices of profiteers, or would they put it upon the profiteers?

Mr. President, that is this case. Why is it that we are asked to take this tax off of the men who are making enormous profits and put it upon the people who make no profits and who can barely live?

I am going to talk very plainly about that for a few minutes. I think we might as well deal plainly with it.

There are two theories of government. One is——

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. REED. Yes, sir.

Mr. HARRISON. This is a very interesting subject, and there are about four Senators of the majority in the Senate Chamber. It seems to me that more of them should be here. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will call the roll.

The roll was called, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst	Harris	Myers	Shortridge
Brandegee	Harrison	Nelson	Simmons
Broussard	Heflin	New	Smoot

Hale	Moses	Sheppard

The VICE PRESIDENT. Sixty-two Senators have answered to their names. There is a quorum present.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I was saying that I intended to discuss pretty plainly the reasons that I think are back of this remarkable proposition.

There are two theories of government, broadly speaking, in this country. One of them is that if you can make business profitable, the country will prosper. The other is that you had better begin at the other end and try to have everybody prosperous, and that then business will prosper. The great business institutions of the country are entitled to respect, and they are entitled to just treatment. Nobody but a demagogue or a foolish person wants to destroy business; but I insist that you can not make the people of the United States prosperous and happy merely by taking care of the great business institutions of the United States.

Of course, what I say is no reflection upon New York City, a great city; but there are a good many people in New York City and its vicinity who think that if they are making money in New York the rest of the country is prosperous, and every time there is a little slump in New York they imagine that the rest of the world has gone all to smash. These people hold to the theory that if you can make business exceedingly profitable, particularly their business, the rest of the country must not complain. They have been very active in politics. They paid to the Government out of excess profits, which was only a small part of what they earned by this war, a very large amount of money—I have forgotten the exact figures. Perhaps the former Secretary of the Treasury, Mr. GLASS, can inform me the amount of excess profits that was paid in 1918.

Mr. GLASS. I am sorry to say that I can not.

Mr. REED. I had the figures the other day. They are in a speech that I made here. These people naturally wanted to keep that money all themselves. They paid other large amounts, which I will put in the RECORD, in other years. They naturally wanted to keep it all for themselves, and so the cry was raised that business must organize to protect business.

"Take the burden off of business and let business prosper," was the cry, and they started about it in a very practical way. One gentleman who had an enormous fortune of his own started out to spread it around over the country, not for the purpose of convincing people that he was the best man for the office of President but, as the testimony showed, for the purpose of getting delegates by gumshoe methods.

Another prominent gentleman held a meeting with some capitalists, and in that room, by some two or three men who were there assembled, arrangements were made to raise a large amount of money. I will ask the Senator from Ohio if he can tell me how much it was.

Mr. POMERENE. I do not recall the amount, but there was raised in behalf of their candidate over $1,700,000.

Mr. REED. In that room, where there were only two or three men present, there was an agreement made, as I recall it, to underwrite his campaign to the tune of a million dollars. If those figures are incorrect, I shall be glad to correct them when I get the record.

One gentleman, a large soap manufacturer, interested himself to the tune of about $750,000. His soap will float, but his candidate did not.

Far be it from me to charge that the press of this country is owned. The press is not owned, but there are some very influential newspapers in this country which are owned by some very wealthy interests, and they all set to work, and they are at work to-day.

So a propaganda was begun and a concerted effort made to take care that the Congress elected should take care in turn of the men who took care of the election expenses. They were, in fact, promised, or given to understand, that if they were successful three things would be done. One was to take the tax off corporation stock, which would relieve them of $75,000,000 of taxes, and deprive the Treasury of a corresponding amount. The second proposition was that the surtaxes on incomes were to be taken off or greatly reduced, and the third was that the excess-profits taxes should be taken off.

This bill was drawn to redeem those pledges, and it was brought into the Senate with the proposition to take off $75,000,000 of corporate stock taxes. That is the form in which it was brought here. It was brought here with the surtaxes upon great incomes reduced to 32 per cent, which would deprive the Government of $90,000,000 and leave that amount of money in the pockets of the extremely rich. It was brought here with the excess-profits tax cut out, and that would represent the staggering sum of $450,000,000.

In other words, there was an honest effort made to redeem those campaign promises, which I charge were either expressly or impliedly made, to redeem them to the extent of reducing the taxes paid by the profiteer, by the ultrarich, and by the corporations, in the aggregate sum of $540,000,000. It was all part of one scheme. The three eggs, the three very bad eggs, were all brought here in the same basket.

Then we were told that that would leave us in such a desperate condition for revenue that we must look about and find revenue from other sources to make up for those losses, and that we should cut down the necessary expenses of the Government so as to bring the expenses within the reduced revenue, and a part of that scheme was worked out in the executive department of this Government, and it was there actually proposed that the money which had been appropriated to build good roads in this country should not all be expended, that the money which had been appropriated for the improvement of rivers and harbors should not all be expended, that other public improvements were to be arrested or circumscribed, that certain reductions should be made in the amounts of expenditure, no matter though the express will of the people was defied, and the statute law of the country set aside, and road improvements and river improvements stopped, all this so that we might take $540,000,000 of taxes off of the people and the institutions which were able to pay them.

My attention has been called to the fact that one of the items was that we were to carry into the permanent debt of the country a large item which grew out of the so-called Pittman Act. Moreover, it was part of the plan of the Treasury, in order to carry out this scheme of reducing these taxes, that we would be asked to confer upon the Treasury the authority to issue $500,000,000 more of interest-bearing securities from time to time.

That was the situation, when there was a revolt started among what was called the agricultural bloc of the Senate. Those gentlemen said that the surtaxes should not be reduced as proposed. They said that the corporation-stock taxes should not be taken off, and I think they originally said, in fact, I feel very sure they originally said, that the excess-profits taxes should not be taken off. Then, as I said the other day, some shrewd gentlemen got a part of that bloc together and agreed with them, and traded to them a concession on the corporation-stock tax, and a concession on the surtaxes on incomes, in consideration of the bloc conceding that the excess-profits taxes should be taken off.

Is there a man of the agricultural bloc so dense that he does not know that when that trade was made by the standpat organization they saved the part that was dearest to the great capitalistic interests the standpatters have always served? Is there anyone here who has not sense enough to see that? That is exactly what they did. The corporation-stock tax is a tax which falls so lightly that even the great corporations do not feel it. The income tax, as it was finally agreed upon, would save the big fellows and would do the little fellows practically no good. They worked that on the members of that bloc, so that it was the multimillionaire whose taxes would be reduced, and the rest of the people would not secure any substantial reduction. They gave them this reduced surtax, and in lieu of that the darling of their heart was taken care of—the profiteer.

If I belonged to the agricultural bloc and had that sort of thing imposed upon me, I would never go to a town again without somebody to go along and keep me from buying a gold brick from the gentleman who stood selling that article. Any man who was deceived by that proposition is not safe to be trusted in town alone; he is not city broke.

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. SUTHERLAND in the chair). Does the Senator from Missouri yield to the Senator from Arizona?

Mr. REED. I yield.

Mr. ASHURST. I know that my friend, the Senator from Missouri, in his references to the agricultural bloc, does not mean to insinuate that any of the Democrats who belong to that bloc had anything to do with or knew about any scheme to aid the rich at the expense of the poor.

Mr. REED. I referred to a part of the bloc, and I am referring to the men who went into this deal. The other men have all exonerated themselves by showing that they are not in the deal; but the agricultural bloc seems to have been split in two. A crowd came to town, and the bunco steerers got part of them. The rest of them were wise enough to escape.

Mr. ASHURST. Will the Senator yield to me further? He was very kind just a moment ago.

Mr. REED. Certainly.

Mr. ASHURST. In the Chamber at this time are a number of Democratic Senators who have made a practice of going to the meetings of the so-called agricultural bloc.

Mr. REED. I do not criticize them for it.

Mr. ASHURST. At various meetings which I attended and which other Senators now sitting near me attended there was never brought forward the question of taxation, so far as I know. There was brought forward the necessity for an immediate reduction of freight rates, and I am glad to say that the day after our meeting the trunk lines of the South and the West and the Middle West reduced their freight rates immediately after our meeting. I do not know whether our meeting had anything to do with it or not, but that followed.

Mr. REED. If the Senator is so potential as that, and can affect the railroads, I hope he will have another meeting and affect the railroad magnates and the men who capitalize the railroads, and see if they can get around to affect some of their friends in the Senate.

Mr. HARRIS. Mr. President, I wish to remind the Senator from Missouri that it was the agricultural bloc, of which my colleague and I are members, that kept the Senate from adjourning when the leader of the majority made a motion to adjourn without doing anything for those engaged in agriculture or live stock. The vote was 24 to 27, and by keeping the Senate in session we passed the Norris bill, the Kenyon-Kendrick bill regulating the Meat Packer Trust, and the War Finance Corporation bill, which gave the relief so much needed.

Mr. REED. I do not desire to be led off into a discussion of the agricultural "bloc." I have in no way reflected upon those members of the agricultural "bloc," none of them; but I particularly have no criticism for men who meet with the agricultural "bloc," and if there can be one organized here that will control the forces that have been running the majority party on the other side I will welcome it. I am just complaining because when they started out to do good work enough of them were led aside to make this deal possible.

Now, one of the things that was accomplished, too—and I wish to be fair about it—was an agreement that the tax should be taken off of transportation. That had been a part of the scheme of those gentlemen who proposed to take off these three taxes that I have spoken of. It was planned to keep a tax upon transportation, showing their desperate determination to take care of great business at any cost. What I regret is that men whose purposes I must concede are honest should have made this agreement to take the excess-profits tax off.

Mr. President, there has been talk here about nuisance taxes. That is a misnomer; but let us concede that it is a proper description. You can take every so-called nuisance tax off if you keep the excess-profits tax on. You can reduce the taxes upon small incomes and reduce them enormously if you keep the excess-profits tax on. You can have money left to carry on your road improvements if you keep the excess-profits tax on. You can take the money you are giving to these profiteers in one year and complete every river and harbor improvement now contemplated in the United States and can put upon the great streams of the country, made navigable by this money, fleets of vessels that will protect our people against not only extortionate rates but freight embargoes and other serious troubles.

But you have made this bargain. It is a shameful thing that we should take the taxes off of profiteers and levy taxes that are burdensome upon the men and women of the country who are poor or of but moderate means.

Mr. President, the argument has been made, as an excuse for taking off the excess-profits tax, that excess profits are added to the price of an article and passed along to the consumer and ultimately collected from him. It is true that many taxes, the ordinary taxes which business must bear, are passed along to a very large extent to the ultimate consumer, for manifestly if a man realizes that he must pay a thousand dollars of taxes upon his place of business at the end of a year he counts that as a part of the expense of operation, so that legitimate business institutions do add to their prices a sum sufficient to take care of their taxes.

But when we come to excess profits, and I am repeating what I have already said, we have an entirely different question to deal with. The man who is engaged in legitimate business, and only asking a legitimate profit, must add the expense of his tax in order that he is assured of that legitimate profit. But when a man is not content with a legitimate profit and wants to make 100 per cent or 200 per cent or 500 per cent, that gentleman is not controlled at all by the question of the expenses of his business. The thing that controls him in fixing the price is his ability to exact the price, and he exacts all that he can get because he is not trying to run a business to pay its expenses and make merely an ordinary fair profit. He has become a commercial buccaneer, sailing under the black flag of despoliation, his cupidity limited alone by his ability to extort. A man who will extort 1,000 per cent from his customers will not extort a single cent more because he has to pay a tax, for the simple reason that he has already extorted all he can get, so that this tax is not passed along.

I am going to repeat, for I wish to make it perfectly clear, that the claim that these men will withdraw their money from these ventures and put it into low interest bearing securities is preposterous. If a man makes 100 per cent excess profits, at the outside he keeps more than $60 of each $100 and still has left 60 per cent profit. When he has paid the top of the excess-profits tax, he has still 60 per cent profit. Will any man who is making 60 per cent profit take his money out and invest it in something that is paying 4 per cent? A man has to be an awful fool to believe that. That excuse amounts to nothing.

When we get through with it all we are brought to this proposition, that in a country where the great mass of the people are having a hard time to make both ends meet, and that largely caused by a group of individuals who are making excessive profits, it is proposed to take the burdens from those who make the profits and let them keep it all. You may think you can justify that, but you can not. I do not say that that fact is going to turn the country over politically, if any one fact may do it, but it is a fact that ought to produce a political revolution in this country, and I think it will be a large contributing cause to that end.

So, Mr. President, I am offering the amendment which will preserve and continue the present excess-profits tax law, and if it is defeated I shall offer a modified proposition and so on until we finally determine whether the makers of excess profits are the masters of the Senate.

Now, Mr. President, I suppose there are many Senators who desire to talk upon the proposition. I have concluded my remarks, and in order that they may all have an opportunity to be heard I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The absence of a quorum is suggested. The Secretary will call the roll.

The roll was called, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Mr. WILLIS. I desire to announce the absence of the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. STERLING] on account of illness. I ask that this announcement stand for the remainder of the day.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Fifty-seven Senators have answered to their names. A quorum is present. The question is upon the amendment of the Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED] to the committee amendment. The Secretary will state the amendment to the amendment.

The READING CLERK. On page 130, line 18, after the numerals "1921," it is proposed to insert "and each year thereafter."

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President, speaking several days ago in favor of maintaining the present rate of taxes on large incomes, I stated that it was too early to begin reducing what had been denominated war taxes for the reason that we are still in the era of war expenditures and are required to raise revenue four or five times as great as we raised in prewar days. That seems to me true also so far as excess-profits taxes are concerned. They were war taxes; they were extraordinary taxes; but I do not believe they should be discontinued so long as we have to provide for extraordinary expenditures.

The excess war-profits tax has been criticized as being injurious to enterprise. I do not think it is. I can not see how a tax on excess profits can be criticized as destructive to business. The tax on excess profits has the same justification as has the graduated tax on incomes; the higher the income the higher the rate of taxation; and so the excess-profits tax is levied with the idea of increasing the rate of taxation as the rate of profit in a business enterprise grows.

On many occasions an attempt has been made to limit profits. There has been a moral sense in the community that there is such a thing as an excessive profit; there is a feeling that there ought to be some governmental restriction put on profits when they exceed a certain reasonable point; but no one has yet ventured to propose a governmental method of limiting profits. Probably that is not possible.

Everybody admits that capital ought to have a reasonable return when engaged in a legitimate enterprise; but is there not such a thing as imposing a governmental check on profits in enterprises where they exceed what may be considered a normal figure? Is it not reasonable, Mr. President, for the Government to say to a business enterprise, "You are protected by the Government; if you make a normal profit, a reasonable profit, in your business, your taxes shall be of a normal sort; if your business is so prosperous that you make extraordinary profits, away above the average profits of enterprise, away above the reasonable return for capital invested, you should share that additional profit with the Government which protects you?" Mr. President, that is the theory of the excess-profits tax.

We have in the loaning of money established a certain normal rate of interest by custom; we have in bank loans established a normal rate of interest. The man who puts his money out at interest as a loan expects to get for it 5 per cent under certain circumstances, 6 per cent under certain circumstances, 8 per cent under certain circumstances, and 10 per cent under certain circumstances. Probably the man who loans his money never expects to exceed 10 per cent; but when a business enterprise is entered upon where great risk is involved it is conceded that a larger rate of return on the capital invested is proper, and we may see a business enterprise earn 8 per cent or 10 per cent or 20 per cent or even a higher rate of profit.

Nevertheless, what legitimate reason is there for not saying to business enterprises generally, "When you exceed a normal rate of profit on your business enterprises your taxes are to be graduated in accordance with the excessive profit which your business brings you?"

Mr. President, that is the theory of the excess-profits tax. Under the law as it now exists any business enterprise which earns a profit shares one-tenth of it with the Government up to a certain point; that is to say, there is a 10 per cent tax levied upon every corporation that is doing a business of profit. This we call the normal tax.

But if a corporation does a business which earns a profit of more than 8 per cent, besides paying the normal tax the corporation is subjected on the excess to a higher rate of tax. Why should it not be?

If that business is so unusually prosperous above its neighbors, above its competitors, above the average, why should it not pay an increased rate of tax on that excess?

The present law provides that if a corporation earns a profit of 8 per cent it shall pay a 10 per cent tax on its profits; in other words, one-tenth; but if it earns a profit above 8 per cent the rate of tax is then made 20 per cent on the excess. Take, for instance, a corporation with $1,000,000 capital whose profits for a year amount to 10 per cent, or $100,000. After all deductions and credits such a corporation pays a total tax of $12,860. After such payment the corporation still has a net profit of $87,140, or about 9 per cent.

If the same corporation makes a 20 per cent profit, or $200,000, for the year's business, it pays a total tax of $40,860 and still retains a net profit of $159,140, or 16 per cent on its capital.

If the same corporation makes a profit of 30 per cent, or $300,000, on a year's business it pays a total tax of $86,860 and still retains a net profit of $213,140, or 21 per cent on its capital.

If the same corporation makes a profit of 50 per cent, or $500,000, on a year's business it pays a total tax of $176,860 and still retains a net profit of $321,140 for the year, or 32 per cent on its capital.

In other words, Mr. President, these graduated taxes, these excess-profits taxes still leave to the corporation against which they are levied a rate of profit in all cases away above the normal; and I can not conceive why a corporation that is making excess profits in its business, profits above the normal, should object to paying a tax on that excess so long as it is in all such cases still earning a profit which, after paying all these taxes, still leave it in a far more favorable situation than another corporation that is not subjected to the excess-profits tax.

Mr. President, if there is one thing which government can legitimately tax it is profits, because profits always afford the means out of which the tax can be paid. If you levy a sales tax, no matter how scientifically it is drawn, in many cases that tax is bound to fall upon business that is perhaps not profitable. You can imagine a corporation which is doing $5,000,000 worth of business this year and doing it at a loss, as many corporations no doubt are. A profits tax on such a corporation, whether it is a normal tax on profits or an excess-profits tax, is no burden whatever in a year of its distress; but a sales tax levied against that same corporation, which may be doing business at a loss of $100,000, simply adds $50,000 to the losses of that corporation.

The excess-profits tax, however, affects only the profits of a corporation. It is lenient to that corporation when it has bad years, and when it has years of prosperity the Government simply enters into a fair partnership with the corporation and takes in the form of taxation a small portion of its net profit above the ordinary profit.

Mr. President, the majority party has been charged with a very consistent plan in this bill of relieving wealth from taxation, and from this side of the Chamber we have made the fight legitimately to prevent that reduction of the taxes upon wealth.

There are virtually only two ways in which the revenues of the United States Government can be raised. They must either be raised by taxes on consumption or they must be raised by taxes upon wealth. No reasonable man ought to contend that all of the revenues of the Government should be levied by a tax on wealth, but every man who is fair will recognize that it is legitimate for the Government of the United States to raise a part of its revenues by taxing wealth. No reasonable man would insist that all of the revenues of government should be levied by a tax on consumption, because a tax on consumption comes very near to being a per capita tax. It falls with undue weight upon the man of limited means, practically all of whose income is spent to defray the cost of living of himself and his family. Apparently, however, the majority who have drawn this bill and who are putting it through the Senate have a settled purpose in this bill not only of relieving the taxes upon the wealth of the country, but in the pending schedule the majority party has determined to relieve the great, prosperous corporations of the legitimate tax upon their profits levied in past bills and which is levied in the existing law.

Mr. President, to my mind that is something which the people of the United States will resent. I can not conceive how any fair-minded man of any party will think it proper in these days of really widespread distress for the Congress of the United States to relieve from taxation corporations admitted to be making excessive profits. It is not that the people will object to corporations making excessive profits, but they have a right to feel and the right to expect of their legislators that those corporations so fortunate as to make great profits should pay taxes in proportion to their prosperity.

They are the very taxpayers upon whom the Government has the right to levy unusual taxes in unusual emergencies. If a corporation is making a profit of 50 per cent on its capital, it certainly ought to pay a higher rate of taxation than another corporation that is making only 10 per cent on its capital, and, as the Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED] has said, it is deliberately proposed in this bill by the majority party to abandon altogether the idea of levying taxes upon excessive profits. It is proposed to say that two corporations, one highly prosperous, making enormous profits, say 100 per cent on its capital, getting its capital back every year, shall pay no higher rate of taxation than another corporation barely able to earn enough profits to pay small dividends to its stockholders.

Mr. President, I say that will shock the sense of justice of the American people of all parties. The American people will not insist that the profits of a corporation shall be limited. They will not insist on any plan of fixing prices, but in my opinion the American people will resent the action of Congress in these serious times in deliberately taking off of corporations that are making enormous and unusual profits as the result of the protection of the Government all of these excess-profits taxes and merely subjecting them to the same rate of taxation that the ordinary corporation pays when it makes small profits.

I want to say to my Republican friends that when they undertake in these serious times to make that change in policy and wipe out the tax upon unusual, extraordinary profits they are entering upon a very serious step, and one that is likely to prove detrimental to the party which adopts that policy.

Mr. STANLEY. Mr. President, this determined fight on the part of a part of the majority, come what will and come what may, to relieve the profiteer is most significant. Plea after plea has been made for business after business. Interest after interest has complained, and justly complained, of the crushing burden of taxation. Indefensible tax after indefensible tax has been proposed. Many of these taxes have been so onerous, so unjustifiable, so outrageously oppressive that the gorge rose upon the other side of the Chamber, and the political colleagues of those in charge of this bill revolted, and revolted in such numbers after the calcium light had been thrown upon this bill by the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. SIMMONS] and the Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED] and others that the whole miserable thing had to be taken from the floor of this Chamber and from the light of day, carried out, and in a back room operated upon, and they bring it in here swathed in bandages; they bring it in here from their own political hospital; but the one thing that remains upon the mutilated body of infamous thing, sacred and secure, is the right of the profiteer to exemption.

Think of some of the taxes that have been proposed here—a tax of $130,000,000 on transportation! Mr. President, a tax, a fixed charge upon transportation, must necessarily be paid by the shipper. Mr. Hines has stated that an increased freight rate is multiplied many times in the cost to the shipper and the cost to the consumer. Mr. Hines has estimated, if I am correct—and I see the chairman of the Interstate Commerce Committee here, and he will correct me if I am wrong—that every dollar you put upon freight rates represents only one-fifth of the charge paid by the ultimate consumer and by the shipper; in other words, a charge of 20 cents will be reflected in an additional cost of $1 a ton upon that same article to the consumer.

It is necessarily so, Mr. President. Put a tax of 10 cents a ton upon a certain classification of freight. In the making of pig iron, for instance, that tax is paid in the transportation of limestone; it is paid in the transportation of coke; it is paid in the transportation of ore; and you have three rates when you come to your pig iron, paid when you transport that pig iron from the furnace, and you have a fourth rate when you come to your steel, and so it piles mountain high. An increase of 10 cents a ton on anthracite coal recently authorized by the Interstate Commerce Committee was immediately reflected in an increased cost of 50 cents a ton to the consumer.

Yet, knowing that fact, they deliberately voted to retain one-half of this transportation tax burden upon transportation when they knew that the $130,000,000 would be reflected in the addition of not less than $500,000,000 to the increased cost in necessaries of life to the people of the country at a time when the whole Nation is crying out in agony against a freight rate so enormous that it is literally crushing the traffic it was meant to foster and to serve.

Mr. President, that is but one instance of the character of taxation that has been authorized in order to save the excess-profits tax.

What is the trouble with this country to-day, Mr. President? We are worse off than we were during the war. The condition of labor, the condition of capital itself, legitimate business, is worse than it was the day that war closed. Why? The unprotected commodity, the unprotected laborer, the unorganized market, has gone to smash.

You can buy a hide for a dollar, but you still pay ten or fifteen dollars for a pair of shoes. Cotton has gone down; shirts stay up. Wool has gone down; cloth stays up. One of the troubles is that the profiteer still holds on to his ill-gotten gains, that the successful Shylock still has his clutch upon business, still refuses to lower his prices, and the producers of grain, of cotton, of every character of agricultural products, of every character of raw material for the mill and factory, has found his market crushed. The day laborer is getting a prewar wage, and yet he is paying war prices for the clothing upon his back, for the shoes upon his feet, for the necessities of life.

If there ever was a time when justice cried like angels, trumpet tongued, against the deep damnation of the profiteers, against the profit no longer levied upon wages paid during the war and war-time prices, but levied upon a people in the midst of depression, levied upon the want and nakedness of multitudes, levied upon 5,000,000 men in rags and in hunger, it is now. Still the profiteer will not loose his strangle hold upon the business and the industrial life of America. If he is not earning excessive profits, no excess-profits tax will attach, and if he is earning them, he should have it to pay.

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. Mr. President, I call the Senator's attention to the fact that our official reports show that the annual increase of wealth in the United States is slightly less than 10 per cent, and it is perfectly apparent that anyone who gets more than 10 per cent is leaving somebody with less. The proposition of the Republican Party is to favor the men who are making these excessive profits of from 100 to 1,000 per cent, thus necessarily leaving in the abyss of poverty the men who can not make any profit at all.

Mr. STANLEY. Mr. President, I thank the learned Senator from Georgia for his very pertinent suggestion.

For 30 years and more the Democratic Party, in victory and in defeat, has maintained, and truly maintained, that it was the champion of the great masses of the American people. From the days of Thomas Jefferson, come what would, it has stood foursquare to every wind that blew for equal rights to all and special privileges to none.

The Republican Party has denied that it was the servant and the champion of a protected and a selected class. For years it has stood as the champion of industry and of business. There was some excuse for that sort of a stand. Now, naked and exposed, it stands as the champion of privilege and plunder, of profiteering, and of the profiteer, and when they are reminded of the folly and the wickedness of such a course, we are cavalierly told, "Well, we carried the country by 7,000,000."

"Whom the gods would destroy, they first make mad." This is not the first time the champions of justice ever met defeat. They met it before there was a Republican Party, and they will live probably to meet it after that organization has gone to deserved oblivion; but never in all the checkered history of privilege, never in all the black annals of legislation for a privileged and pampered class, has anybody ever before stood for the exemption of inordinate profits at a time when the profiteer is destroying the happiness and imperiling the security of a nation. It was bad enough during the war. Now, when an attempt is being made to readjust conditions, with 5,000,000 men out of employment, with 20,000,000 agriculturists producing at a loss, with discontent and disaster and poverty and idleness and unrequited toil everywhere, we find a few thousand men yet piling up their unearned millions, yet adding profit upon profit, 10 per cent, 30 per cent, a hundred per cent, a thousand per cent; upon what? Upon food that the hungry can not obtain, upon clothing that the naked can not wear, upon shoes that the barefoot can not obtain, and upon homes that the homeless can not enter. Go on with your wild propaganda. Go on with your shameless proposal. In the language of the great cardinal, "Walk blindfold on; behind thee stalks the headsman."

Mr. REED. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. WILLIS in the chair). Does the Senator from Kentucky yield to the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. STANLEY. I yield.

Mr. REED. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President, I make the point of order that there has been no business transacted since the last call for a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The point of order is sustained.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I desire to withdraw the pending amendment. I now make the point of no quorum.

Mr. CURTIS. The Senator can not do that without unanimous consent, and I object to the withdrawal of the Senator's amendment.

Mr. REED. The Chair gave his consent and there was no objection.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair did not understand the observation of the Senator from Missouri.

Mr. CURTIS. The Chair would not have authority to give consent, anyhow. The Senate only can give consent.

Mr. REED. I desire to offer an amendment to the amendment. In addition to the insertion of the words "and each year thereafter," in line 18, page 130, I move to amend by striking out "Title III. War-profits and excess-profits tax for 1921." I desire to modify my amendment to that effect.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair is of the opinion that that does not affect the amendment now pending.

Mr. REED. An amendment to an amendment does not change the business.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair is of opinion that the amendment offered by the Senator from Missouri does not appertain to the pending amendment, and therefore it is not in order.

Mr. REED. If the Chair will give it a little consideration, he will withdraw his remark. The amendment now pending proposes to continue the tax from 1921 on. The title which I propose to strike out limits the war-profits and excess-profits tax to 1921, and the change I suggest now should have been offered as a part of the original amendment. It relates to exactly the same subject.

But there is no rule in the Senate, Mr. President, which declares that a Senator can not put half a dozen propositions in one amendment if he wants to, and an amendment to an amendment does not have to be germane to the amendment.

We might just as well settle whether we are going to proceed under parliamentary law or not. If not, if we are to have "rough-house" methods, if I may use a slang expression, we can commence them right now, and the Senate will be in session some time before it will get to a vote on this bill. There is no disposition over here to delay it a minute, but when we are threatened with all-night sessions and Senators see fit to absent themselves from the floor, we on this side propose to insist, if they hold us here all night, that they shall be in their seats. We will try to sit up with them and be good-natured about it. I have offered a proper amendment to my amendment, and I want to know whether it is going to be entertained.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Missouri has offered an amendment to be inserted on line 18. That amendment is now pending before the Senate. While without doubt the Senator would have a right to perfect his amendment, it is the opinion of the Chair that the proposition which he now offers is not of a nature to perfect his amendment. It would be tantamount to the offering of another amendment, and therefore is not in order.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I appeal from the decision of the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is, Shall the decision of the Chair stand as the judgment of the Senate?

Mr. REED. Having appealed from the decision of the Chair, which I think even the present occupant of the chair will regard as new business, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The absence of a quorum is suggested. The Secretary will call the roll.

The principal legislative clerk called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Brandegee	Harreld	McNary	Simmons
Broussard	Harris	Moses	Smoot
Bursum	Harrison	Nelson	Spencer
Capper	Heflin	New	Stanley
Caraway	Hitchcock	Newberry	Sutherland
Cummins	Jones, N. Mex.	Nicholson	Swanson
Curtis	Kellogg	Oddie	Townsend
Dial	Kendrick	Overman	Trammell
Dillingham	Kenyon	Owen	Wadsworth
Edge	King	Page	Walsh, Mont.
Ernst	La Follette	Penrose	Warren
Fletcher	Lenroot	Phipps	Watson, Ga.
France	Lodge	Poindexter	Watson, Ind.
Gerry	McKellar	Ransdell	Williams
Gooding	McKinley	Reed	Willis
Hale	McLean	Sheppard

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Sixty-six Senators having answered to their names, a quorum is present.

Mr. WATSON of Indiana. Mr. President, I move to lay the appeal of the Senator from Missouri on the table.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I congratulate the Senator from Indiana on having made a beautiful precedent, which I suppose will be cited in future years as a decision of the Senate. If ever there was a decision made on any question which can not be justified by any kind of logic, it is this particular decision by which it is held that a Senator can not offer an amendment to an amendment on the ground that it is not germane to the amendment, when, as a matter of fact, the amendment to the amendment is a part of the very subject matter. If the Senate wishes to make that sort of a record, and if we are to have motions to cut off discussion and debate, it is all right with those of us who sit on this side of the Chamber, but it will not save any great amount of time. That is not the way to save time on this bill.

There has not been an attempt to waste a moment on the bill. Every Senator who has spoken has done so in good faith. There has been a more complete adherence to the subject matter under discussion than I have ever known in the Senate and, I almost will say, than any other man in the Senate has ever observed. We have been proceeding with more than ordinary celerity in the discussion of the bill. I know one of the Senators who is absent, because he is not very strong, desires to make a speech upon this particular proposition. There are other Senators similarly situated.

It is proposed to go on to-night, I understand. We will, of course, have to be here if those in control of the Senate conclude that that is the best policy to pursue. Speaking for myself, I think it utterly unjustifiable. I have no objection, so far as I am concerned, however, if the Senate wishes to come to a vote on this amendment of mine and to proceed to a vote at this time. It only involves $450,000,000, and, of course, is not worth spending much time on. When the vote is recorded there is not a man who has been picking the pockets of the American people through excess profits who will not be ready to congratulate his friends. There is not one of them who will not go home congratulating himself.

There is talk that this tax is passed on, but excess profits, particularly grossly excess profits, are not passed on, because the man has already charged all that he can extort. Nobody gets a 500 per cent profit unless he is in some sort of a situation where he is levying upon the necessity of the people to buy, and he levies the last dollar he can get when he charges a profit of that kind.

Mr. STANLEY. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Missouri yield to the Senator from Kentucky?

Mr. REED. I yield.

Mr. STANLEY. At this time in our effort to readjust our conditions the public is demanding of the railroads, the great carriers, that they shall reduce their rates, notwithstanding the fact that the present rates of return could not be called an excess profit. The return is less than 6 per cent on the estimated value of those properties, at least according to the contention of the carriers. The public is demanding that the operators, 2,000,000 of them, shall submit to a reduced wage. They are not profiteering. The wage of every railroad man to-day will buy less than the wage he received before the war. The man receiving $4.50 a day now received about $2.50 a day before the war, but the $2.50 would buy more than the $4.50 will buy now. How can we demand of the carriers, who are not charged with profiteering, that they shall lower their rates, how can we demand of labor that it shall take less when it is really receiving less purchasing value than it got before the war, in order to adjust conditions, and then have the Senate deliberately exempt from their just burden of taxation those who have produced this condition? With what face can we do it?

Mr. REED. Yes; and with what face can we look the returned soldier in the eye and say to him, "We refused you compensation upon the express ground that we could not raise enough revenue, and the reason we could not raise that revenue was because we proposed to take $450,000,000 of taxes off of gentlemen who are making profits above 10 per cent"? How will you look that man in the face and say with an unctuous hypocrisy that you protested that you wanted to give him his compensation, but that because the Government revenues were circumscribed you were obliged to postpone his plea for justice until some means could be devised to raise more revenue, when all the time you had it in your mind to take $450,000,000 of taxes off men reaping excess profits which are the direct result of the war? How will Senators on the other side justify themselves to that soldier, who stands to-day without a job, who served abroad for $30 a month and his feed, when he is told that his bill for justice and relief was referred to this very Finance Committee; that they promised it speedy attention; and that that same committee to whom his claim was referred, upon the ground that the revenue could not be received, instead of giving him attention gave the attention to the profiteers and took $450,000,000 off the burden that the profiteers ought to pay?

How will those Senators look that soldier in the face who served abroad for $30 a month and who comes back and walks up to a profiteer to buy a civilian suit of clothes to take the place of his tattered uniform and who has to pay that clothier a profit of 100 or 200 per cent? How will they justify themselves when they say, "We benefited you by taking the tax off the man who is reaping profits off you?" How will they do it?

I am going to meet a large body of these soldiers in two or three days; I am going to discuss the question of their adjusted compensation; and I am going to tell them the truth about this matter; that the reason that they could not have adjusted compensation was because it was proposed to take the tax off the profiteers, and that the same committee that now is sitting like a coroner's jury over the dead body of their hopes reported out a bill to take $75,000,000 off the corporation capital tax, $90,000,000 off the gentlemen who enjoy incomes above $68,000 a year, and $450,000,000 off the gentlemen who are reaping profits above 10 per cent, and that is the reason they could not get compensation; and that the men who made these profits are the men who stayed at home while they went abroad to lose their health, to lose their jobs, and some of their brothers to lose their lives.

Now, Mr. President, if there is no Senator wishes to speak on the amendment to the amendment, I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. KENYON. Mr. President, before the roll is called I desire to ask the Senator from Missouri—for I have been compelled to be out of the Chamber all day in connection with the West Virginia hearing—just how this question now comes up? Is it on the committee amendment or is it on the amendment of the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. REED. Under the bill as reported by the Committee on Finance the excess-profits tax will terminate in December of this year. My amendment proposes to insert after the figures "1921" the word "and each year thereafter." If the amendment which I have offered to the committee amendment is adopted, then the excess-profits tax will continue to be levied until Congress shall hereafter change the law.

SEVERAL SENATORS. Vote!

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will call the roll.

Mr. FLETCHER (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Delaware [Mr. BALL]. Being unable to secure a transfer, I am compelled to withhold my vote. If permitted to vote, I should vote "yea."

Mr. HALE (when his name was called). Making the same announcement concerning my pair and its transfer as heretofore, I vote "nay."

Mr. HARRIS (when his name was called). I transfer my pair with the junior Senator from New York [Mr. CALDER] to the senior Senator from Texas [Mr. CULBERSON], and vote "yea."

Mr. HARRISON (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the junior Senator from West Virginia [Mr. ELKINS]. I transfer that pair to the junior Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH], and vote "yea."

Mr. LODGE (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD]. I transfer that pair to the junior Senator from Oregon [Mr. STANFIELD], and vote "nay."

Mr. RANSDELL (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the junior Senator from Delaware [Mr. DU PONT]. I transfer that pair to the senior Senator from California [Mr. JOHNSON], who, if present, would vote as I am about to vote. I am, therefore, at liberty to vote, and vote "yea."

Mr. WILLIS (when Mr. STERLING's name was called). I desire again to announce the absence of the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. STERLING] on account of illness.

Mr. SUTHERLAND (when his name was called). Making the same announcement as heretofore in regard to my pair and its transfer, I vote "nay."

Mr. SWANSON (when his name was called). I have a pair with the senior Senator from Washington [Mr. JONES]. I do not know how that Senator would vote if present. I find I am able to transfer that pair to the Senator from Nevada [Mr. PITTMAN], which I do, and vote "yea."

Mr. TRAMMELL (when his name was called). I have a pair with the senior Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. COLT]. In his absence I withhold my vote. If permitted to vote, I should vote "nay."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. KING (after having voted in the affirmative). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from North Dakota [Mr. MCCUMBER]. I have been unable to obtain a transfer of that pair, and therefore I am compelled to withdraw my vote.

Mr. MCLEAN (after having voted in the negative). I notice that the senior Senator from Montana [Mr. MYERS], with whom I have a general pair, has not voted. I transfer my pair with that Senator to the junior Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. CROW], and will let my vote stand.

Mr. CURTIS. I desire to announce that the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. STERLING] is paired with the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. SMITH].

So Mr. REED's amendment to the amendment of the committee was rejected.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I reserve the amendment for a separate vote in the Senate, and offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated.

The ASSISTANT SECRETARY. It is proposed to strike out lines 23 to 26 on page 130 and lines 2 and 3 on page 131 and to insert:

Twenty per cent of the net income in excess of 15 per cent and not in excess of 50 per cent of the invested capital, and 40 per cent of the excess over 50 per cent of the invested capital.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, the present law levies an excess-profits tax on profits above 10 per cent and up to 20 per cent at the rate of 20 per cent. This amendment raises that bracket so that the excess-profits tax does not begin until 15 per cent net has been realized, and then from that point on to 50 per cent the tax levied is 20 per cent. Under the present law the minute the profits exceed 20 per cent a tax of 40 per cent is levied.

This amendment, if agreed to, will have this effect: Whereas to-day all profits in excess of 8 per cent and up to 20 per cent are taxed 20 per cent, no tax at all will be levied upon the profits until 15 per cent has been realized, and then a tax of 20 per cent will be levied upon the profits up to 50 per cent of profits. After they have reached 50 per cent profit, then a tax of 40 per cent is laid upon the profits in excess of 50 per cent.

Mr. WILLIAMS. By the bill itself?

Mr. REED. No; by this amendment. By the bill itself the 40 per cent tax began when the profits were 20 per cent. The 40 per cent does not begin under this amendment until the profits have reached 50 per cent.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, may I make an inquiry for information?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Missouri yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. REED. Yes.

Mr. KING. As I understand, the amendment heretofore offered by the Senator which extended the excess-profits tax to a year beyond 1921 was defeated. I want to ask the Senator whether, if this amendment were adopted, it would not be limited solely to this year, and therefore would have the effect of diminishing the tax which would be collected for this year below the levels which existing law impose?

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I am obliged to the Senator. I meant to incorporate in this amendment the amendment I just offered and make it a part of this amendment, so that the excess-profits tax will continue beyond 1921, but that instead of paying an excess-profits tax as soon as 8 per cent is realized there will be no excess-profits tax until 15 per cent has been realized and, instead of the tax being 40 per cent as soon as the profits have reached 20 per cent, the 40 per cent tax will not be levied until the profits have reached 50 per cent.

Mr. President, the amendment should be further perfected so that it will read as follows: After the word "following," in line 21, add:

After the calendar year 1921 excess-profits taxes shall be levied as follows:

Then the language which I have employed.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, where does the Senator propose to put that?

Mr. REED. I propose to insert it after the word "following" in line 21, page 130.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President, I suggest to the Senator from Missouri, if he will pardon me, that a more appropriate place to put it would be after line 3, on page 131.

Mr. SIMMONS. I think the Senator's suggestion is correct. That is what I was about to suggest.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. That would make the paragraphs at the bottom of page 130 and at the top of page 131 applicable to 1921, and then thereafter the rates would be as fixed.

Mr. REED. I was obliged to present this amendment very hastily, and I think the suggestion is a very good one, to insert at the end of line 3, on page 131, the following:

After the calendar year of 1921 excess-profits taxes shall be levied as follows:

Then:

Twenty per cent on the net income in excess of 15 per cent and not in excess of 50 per cent of the invested capital, and 40 per cent of the excess over 50 per cent of the invested capital.

Now, Mr. President, I think the amendment is in shape.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, I suggest to the Senator that he put it in this form:

That for the calendar year 1922, and each subsequent year thereafter, the tax shall be—

And so forth.

Mr. REED. Very well; let it be put in that form:

That for the calendar year 1922, and for each calendar year thereafter, there shall be levied—

And so forth. That is the proper form.

Mr. President, I am not offering this amendment out of a mere desire to make a record; but it seems to me that the course we are pursuing is so at war with what ought to be done that it is worth while to present the question in this modified form. It may be claimed that an excess-profits tax beginning at 8 per cent begins at too low a point, that corporations ought to be allowed to make more than that percentage and still pay merely the normal tax; but when you allow them to make 15 per cent free of all excess-profits taxes, I think they are being dealt with very fairly and generously. Then the tax of 20 per cent, which under the present law begins at a 10 per cent profit and ends at a 20 per cent profit, will be levied here on the profits between 15 per cent and 20 per cent, on that small bracket; and the tax of 40 per cent, which under the present law begins at a 20 per cent profit, will under this amendment be only a tax of 20 per cent on the profits up to 50 per cent. That is to say, an institution will be free of all excess-profits taxes until it has made more than 15 per cent. Then on the difference between 15 per cent and 50 per cent it will pay only 20 per cent, and on the excess above 50 per cent it will pay the 40 per cent which now is levied on the profits as soon as they reach 20 per cent.

I am informed by the experts that this will realize to our Government $200,000,000. That $200,000,000 would do many things. I need not take the time of the Senate to tell how many things it would do; but what man is there in this body who can say that after a corporation has made 15 per cent net, has paid the salaries of its officers, has paid the interest on its money borrowed, has taken out a proper sum for the depreciation of its plant, and stands there with 15 per cent net, it can not pay the small additional surtax levied by this amendment? How can Senators sit here and tell soldiers that they can not pay them a bonus when they refuse to levy a tax of this kind? How can we justify the other taxes of this bill, and, as was well said by the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. STANLEY], how can we say to the railroads that are not making excess profits, "You must cut down your freight rates regardless of that fact," and yet say, "We took the tax off the profiteers, the men who were making more than 15 per cent"?

Let somebody on the other side rise and answer. You have sat over there all day, when you sat there at all, as mum as oysters and with about the same intellectual cast of countenance. You do not defend because you can not defend.

Mr. PENROSE. Mr. President——

Mr. REED. The utmost of your endeavor is to move to lay something on the table, so that there can not be discussion.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator yield to the Senator from Pennsylvania?

Mr. REED. I yield.

Mr. PENROSE. Our countenances have been illuminated by the character of intellectual provender that has been furnished us.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, that all depends on what is back of the countenance that is to be illuminated, for you could throw the brightest light that ever glimmered in this world upon a piece of dead lead and you could not get a reflection.

Why do you not answer? What is your defense? Have you any? Well, Senators, you will have to make your defense somewhere.

Mr. WATSON of Indiana. Mr. President, I have very great respect for the Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED]. We have been personal friends for a quarter of a century, and I have always admired his ability. Whatever he may say and whatever he may do, I shall never forget the service he rendered to the Republic during the discussion of the momentous problem of the League of Nations on this floor.

He might at that time have chosen the easy course. He might have basked in the sunshine of the White House and been among the favored few admitted to those secret precincts. But he chose what to him was the path of honor, the path of courage, and the path of patriotism, and in so doing he delivered orations on the floor of this Chamber worthy of the best days of the Senate and of its most splendid traditions. Whatever he may say now in regard to the Republican Party or any of the propositions that are pending growing out of this tax question will not, so far as I am concerned, diminish my admiration for his talent or his ability.

But when the Senator from Missouri, rising in his place, prostitutes that talent and that ability to personal charges against Senators on this side, he but belittles himself. When he says that we sit here like oysters, with countenances that have no reflection of intellectuality or intelligence, he but dwarfs himself and casts nothing but his littleness upon this side.

Mr. STANLEY. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Indiana yield to the Senator from Kentucky?

Mr. WATSON of Indiana. I decline to yield.

The Senator from Missouri had better leave those little things to men of lesser talents and of more meager capacity. When he descends to make a charge of that kind it is as if a wrecking crew were ordered out, with all its mighty appliances, to lift a mouse from a railroad track.

However, I have not risen for the purpose of discussing the Senator from Missouri, but for the purpose of talking about the excess-profits tax and of saying to my friend from Missouri that he need not be alarmed about the answer we shall make to the country. We have already given that response. Not only did the Republican Party proclaim throughout the length and breadth of the Republic its belief in this proposition in the last campaign but the Senator's own party, from the day the convention met up until election time, did not fail to respond in the same way to the same demand of the American people.

The honorable Senator from Kentucky [Mr. STANLEY] said that the people of the United States, like angels, were speaking trumpet-tongued, demanding the continuance of the excess-profits tax. Let us see who some of these trumpet-tongued angels are who have so loudly demanded the perpetuation of this tax. The Democratic platform adopted at San Francisco recited:

> We advocate tax reform and a searching revision of the war revenue acts to fit peace conditions so that the wealth of the Nation may not be withdrawn from productive enterprise and diverted to wasteful or nonproductive expenditure.

To what two taxes did that refer? Inevitably to the excess-profits tax and to the higher surtaxes. It would have had no intelligent construction if it had been applied to any other feature of the existing tax law, and when they spoke, trumpet-tonged, they had in mind only the excess-profits tax and the surtax.

Why am I led to that conclusion? Because before that convention met, Senators, Secretary Glass had given his views on this question to a committee of the American Congress. He said:

> The Treasury's objections to the excess-profits tax even as a war expedient (in contradistinction to a war-profits tax) have been repeatedly voiced before the committees of the Congress. Still more objectionable is the operation of the excess-profits tax in peace times. It encourages wasteful expenditure, puts a premium on overcapitalization, and a penalty on brains, energy, and enterprise, discourages new ventures, and confirms old ventures in their monopolies.

Out of the mouth of their own Secretary of the Treasury, standing upon their own platform, advocating the very thing we now advocate—that is our answer to the charge of the Senator from Missouri.

Who else has had something to say upon this proposition? Secretary Houston, likewise an honored member of the last Democratic Cabinet, urged the repeal of the excess-profits tax at the earliest day. What were his words? Listen to them, you who desire to know the campaign position of the Democratic Party on this question:

> The reasons for the repeal of the excess-profits tax should be convincing even to those who, on grounds of theory or general political philosophy, are in favor of taxes of this nature. The tax does not attain in practice the theoretical end at which it aims. It discriminates against conservatively financed corporations and in favor of those whose capitalization is exaggerated; indeed, many overcapitalized corporations escape with unduly small contributions. It is exceedingly complex in its application and difficult of administration, despite the fact that it is limited to one class of business concerns—corporations. Moreover, it is rapidly losing its productivity.

He goes on and states other reasons why it should be repealed. So from the Democratic national platform and from two of its Secretaries of the Treasury come this day answers which my friend from Kentucky might well say are trumpet-tongued.

But, Senators, we are not left alone with the assertions of the Democratic platform and the assertions of these two former occupants of a Cabinet position. The Democratic candidate for the Presidency in the last campaign, supported by my friend from Missouri, supported by every man on the other side of the Chamber, echoed and reechoed the demands of the Democratic platform and in various speeches throughout the Republic reasserted the opinions of these two occupants of the Treasury portfolio. In one of his addresses, speaking of the excess-profits tax, he said:

> I believe that a better form of taxation than the so-called excess-profits tax may be found, and I suggest a small tax, probably 1 to 1½ per cent on the total business of every going concern. It is to be understood that the term "business" as used does not include income received by wage earners, salaried men, agriculturists, and the small business man who should be exempt from this tax. The profiteer and some of the highly capitalized units have used the excess-profits tax as a favorite excuse for loading on the consumer by means of highly inflated selling prices many times the amount actually paid the Government.

That is the answer I make to the honorable Senator from Missouri. His own candidate for the Presidency, whom he supported; his own platform, upon which he stood; his own Secretaries of the Treasury, two of them, whom he supported—these are the answers I make to the Senator from Missouri as to why the excess-profits tax should be repealed.

Are yet other answers required? If so, they are simply these, Senators, that when we overtax capital we drive it out of business, and unless capital is invested in business labor is not employed, and if labor is not employed idleness results, and everybody understands what follows in its train. That is the all-sufficient answer to the Senator from Missouri.

But, Mr. President, I call attention to the further fact that Dr. Adams, himself a Democrat, once an honored member of the faculty of the great University of Wisconsin and now professor of economics in Yale University and the Treasury expert whose services are sought by everybody——

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. And always a Republican.

Mr. WATSON of Indiana. Is he a Republican?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Yes.

Mr. WATSON of Indiana. I beg the Senator's pardon; I had always thought he was a Democrat.

Mr. NEW. My colleague had better beg Dr. Adams's pardon.

Mr. WATSON of Indiana. I beg his pardon.

Mr. STANLEY. If the Senator will yield at that point——

Mr. WATSON of Indiana. No; not here.

Mr. STANLEY. The Senator need not yield at all if he does not want to.

Mr. WATSON of Indiana. My understanding has always been that Dr. Adams is a Democrat, and I think that my friend the Senator from Utah had the same opinion. So much the better if he is a Republican.

Mr. STANLEY. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator yield to the Senator from Kentucky?

Mr. WATSON of Indiana. No; I decline to yield. Senators on the other side have taken up practically all the time. I want to have just a little of it over here.

What does Dr. Adams have to say about this? Hear it:

> A great deal might legitimately be said, if space permitted, in favor of the excess-profits tax. But it is not enough. The tax should be repealed at the close of the year 1920. It should be repealed because it taxes corporations by an entirely different method from that applied to partnerships and individual business men, sometimes taxing one class heavier than the other, and again reversing this situation; because it penalizes conservative corporations and rewards their less conservative and less scrupulous competitors; because it exempts in whole or in part many overcapitalized trusts; because by its uncertain and unequal burdens upon business it is injuring every wage earner and salaried man, every stockholder and consumer whose interests can be adversely affected by the unnecessary bedevilment of business; because corporation taxpayers since the beginning of the war have played the game and stood the gaff, have fairly earned and may confidently ask the right to pay whatever share of taxes is decided to be their due, by a tax which is simpler, more certain and less capriciously unequal than the excess-profits tax.

When we came to investigate the facts as they were developed before our committee, every statement made by Dr. Adams, and by every other expert, as my friend from Connecticut [Mr. McLEAN] suggests, was borne out by the facts and controverted by nobody upon the witness stand from the beginning of those hearings to the very end.

Why had they ceased in productivity? In 1918 we gleaned from this source $2,500,000,000 of revenue, enough to pay the expenses of the Government, Senators, aside from interest and the cost of wars past and present. Yet for the next year no one places the estimate at more than $400,000,000, a decrease of $2,100,000,000 of revenue from this source alone.

Is not the Senator from Missouri answered? There are no excess profits to tax because of this very repressive policy, and if it is to be continued in the future capital will not be invested, labor will not be employed, mines will not be opened, and factories will not run. So we shall continue to have the very condition that to-day blights the prosperity of this Republic and casts its baneful shadow athwart the highway of the future. So, Senators, we have an answer to the honorable Senator from Missouri.

Oh, he said, he is going out to speak to the soldiers soon, and he is going to say to them that because we have repealed the excess-profits tax we shall not be able to pay their pensions and to raise the revenue essential to meet the bounty that looms ahead. Why, Senators, it is not possible that the honorable Senator from Missouri will make that statement, for he knows as well as he is conscious of his own existence that these taxes are passed on to the consumer. He has said that he intends to go and say to them that we have saved the storekeeper and the manufacturer from these taxes, and that because of that fact we shall not be able to discharge the debt of gratitude in a financial way that we owe to the soldiers who served us under the flag overseas. The Senator from Missouri well knows and every other Senator knows that all these excess-profit taxes from the very beginning are passed by every manufacturer down to the consumer and all of them loaded upon his back. He knows that every man that touched every product all along the line from production to consumption put an extra tax on and that those excess-profits taxes were pyramided from the beginning to the end until they rested like a mighty mountain of excessive cost upon the backs of the people of the United States.

We propose now to lift that burden. We propose to repeal the excess-profits taxes. We propose to take the hampering and restraining influence of those excessive taxes off of the business of the United States and set it once more awork along all lines of activity in the country. That is the answer we make to the Senator from Missouri.

He need not be alarmed about how we will answer the people of the United States. We will do our own answering and will not call upon the Senator from Missouri to make reply for us when we go out to meet the people of the land. For over 60 years the Republican Party has discharged its obligations. We have carried our burdens, we have lifted the country on up the heights from success to greatness, from greatness to glory, and, if I may be excused a street expression, we have dragged the Democratic Party by the scruff of the neck up the hill behind us, and they of all people ought to be the last to charge us with doing that which is contrary to the highest interest of the people of the country or of dearest concern to its citizenship.

I am not afraid to meet the question of the excess-profit taxes. We met that in the last campaign, save that Democrats did not answer, because every Democratic speech of which I had knowledge delivered in the whole campaign echoed and reechoed the sentiments which I have expressed this afternoon, and not one voice was lifted anywhere throughout the country against the repeal of these taxes. Not until now, when we come into the Senate Chamber in the calm of the after-election period, when there is a new campaign coming on and when a new issue must be sought, have our Democratic friends suddenly discovered that the repeal of the excess-profits tax is in the interest of the profiteer and that unless repealed they will still hold the burdens and the expenses of Government upon the backs of the already overburdened poor.

Oh, no; it will not do. We will go to the people on the question, but when we repeal the excess-profits tax and when we get through this whole new tax bill our capital will be invested, our labor will be employed, the mines will be opened, and their resources will be poured out and carried to the factories, where they will be converted into forms of usefulness and beauty for the benefit of our citizens. We will thus again call out all that is highest and best in men. We will enlist their noblest instincts, their loftiest purposes, and we will again weave, just as we ever have in the past, the splendid fabric of a mighty nationality.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. President, before the Senator from Indiana takes his seat will he yield?

Mr. WATSON of Indiana. Certainly.

Mr. LENROOT. Will not the Senator place in the RECORD in connection with his speech the table prepared by the Treasury Department showing that the burden of excess-profits tax is borne in the largest part by corporations having an average invested capital of $61,000, while the large corporations with watered stock are escaping the payment of any excess-profits taxes?

Mr. WATSON of Indiana. That is entirely true, and I ask permission that I may incorporate——

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. Mr. President, I understood the Senator from Indiana had yielded the floor and taken his seat.

Mr. WATSON of Indiana. May I ask unanimous consent to have this little table incorporated as a part of my remarks?

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. I have no objection.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The table referred to is as follows:

The excess-profits tax has been so thoroughly discussed that it is unnecessary to state at length the reasons which have led your committee to recommend its repeal. The time for discussion is past; and the time to repeal the tax has arrived. It may be mentioned, however, that further investigation has only accentuated the conviction that the inequalities of this tax make necessary its early repeal. Whatever may be its theoretical merits, in practice it exempts the overcapitalized corporation, falls more heavily upon corporations of small or moderate size than upon the larger corporations, penalizes business conservatism, and places upon the Bureau of Internal Revenue tasks which are beyond its strength. The fact that the excess-profits tax bears less severely upon large than upon small corporations is well illustrated in Table A. This table is based upon the latest Treasury statistics which have been analyzed in detail and covers all the corporations of the country which made full returns of invested capital in the year 1919. The weakness of the excess-profits tax revealed in this table is alone sufficient to condemn it.

Table showing average rate of excess-profits and income taxes upon corporations of different size.

Mr. WATSON of Indiana. Thus showing, as the Senator from Wisconsin so well says, that these taxes fall heaviest upon the corporations of small capital and are almost wholly evaded by the largest ones in the land, which furnishes an additional reason for their repeal.

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. Mr. President, I trust the Senator from Indiana, my namesake, will not leave the Chamber while I am answering him, because the answer is going to be hot off the bat. I was once as red headed as he is, but there never was a debate in which I was afraid to let anybody interrupt me, and I am not afraid to let them do it now.

Mr. President, the Senator from Indiana quoted from his platform. He quoted some words which the American people had never heard discussed in the campaign. I ask him now to name the time and place when his candidate for the Presidency explained that plank to the people and told them that his success would mean the taking off, from the very rich, of the excess-profits taxes to the amount of $495,000,000.

Mr. WATSON of Indiana. Mr. President——

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. I yield to the Senator from Indiana.

Mr. WATSON of Indiana. I will not do the Democratic candidate for the Presidency the discourtesy to say he did not know what he was talking about.

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. I was not talking about the Democratic candidate.

Mr. WATSON of Indiana. I have read from the hearings before the Senate committee what he said.

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. I am coming to him after a while.

Mr. WATSON of Indiana. I assume that he knew just what he said.

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. I am coming to that, and you need not doubt it. I am speaking about President Harding, the man who won. I am not talking about Gov. Cox, the worst-beaten man, perhaps, in all American political history. Perhaps the very plank which my namesake voted helped to beat him. I am asking him about what Harding said.

Mr. WATSON of Indiana. I can very readily get what Mr. Harding said about it, because President Harding on several occasions advocated the repeal of these taxes. I have not the speech here. I took it for granted that everybody knew about that.

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. Nobody knows about that, Mr. President, because it did not occur. I am going to stick to the facts myself. I read the speeches of both the candidates, and nowhere did the Republican candidate say that he meant to take $450,000,000 of excess-profits taxes off the shoulders of those who receive the excess profits.

The Senator said there are no excess profits. Then why take $450,000,000 off? The Senator's speech answers itself. Necessarily, there must be some immensely profitable concerns who make excess profits and who have been paying taxes on them to the extent of $450,000,000, else there would be no tax to remove.

Mr. REED. That is the tax estimated for the ensuing year.

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. Precisely so. When and where did the Republican Party, or its candidate, its speakers, its editors, tell the people that they meant to leave the tax on the calico dress of the poor woman and lift it from the sables of the rich woman? What sort of a speech would that have been? How many votes would it have won? Would you have received your 7,000,000 majority if you had explained that to the common people? Talk about friendship for the common people! How many of the common people can buy those expensive furs from which you are taking the tax? Those who are buying those furs can afford to buy them, and can therefore afford to pay the tax.

Mr. President, the Senator from Indiana again read the report of Secretary Glass. We have been reminded of that here several times. Did they use that during the campaign? How many of the voters knew what Secretary Glass had written about the excess-profits tax?

The Senator from Indiana alluded to Secretary Houston. How many votes does he think ex-Secretary David Houston could get, if he were to run for some office? Where would he get them? Why, Mr. President, as Secretary of Agriculture he had the most loving ways to make people hate him of any official of this Government, and they hated him then and they hate him now.

Senators on the other side do not enjoy this debate. Why? They are getting the worst of it. They are going to keep on getting the worst of it. Running out of the Chamber will not help any. Taking refuge in the cloakroom will not save anybody. Mr. President, if I may be allowed the expression, they are going to catch hell next November. [Laughter.]

Mr. REED. Mr. President——

SEVERAL REPUBLICAN SENATORS. Vote!

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. I have not yielded the floor, and I am not going to be howled down, either. I have got the floor, not by the permission of any Senator, but by the recognition of the Vice President.

Mr. PENROSE. We are going to vote in a minute.

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. You will vote when I get through with my speech. This is a mere preface to a remark or two. I have learned, Mr. President, that when a Senator gets up here and says, "Just a moment," it means an hour or so; and when he says, "I want to say just three words," he means three thousand words.

We have heard of the "agricultural bloc," we have heard of the "manufacturers' bloc," but there is an "oratorical bloc" here. Although I am a junior Member of it, I want to hold up my end of the stick. It may be that the "agricultural bloc" is split up but the "oratorical bloc" is not split up. [Laughter.] It is not going to be split up or howled down.

Something was said here the other day about the unimportance of a tax measure; that the people really did not care anything about taxes. I wonder, Mr. President, if the Senators who made those remarks remembered that we owe our national independence to a fight on a very small tax on tea and paper? A tax started a revolution in the old country; a revolution was started there by an illegal imposition of ship money. John Hampden, a rich man, whose share of the tax would have been less than $15 in our money, refused to pay it, and began an insurrection which only ended with the English revolution of 1688. In my judgment, Mr. President, if this bill goes through, relieving from taxation those who are making excessive profits, we are going to have at least a political revolution in this country. I do not believe the people will stand it.

In Mackenzie's History of the Nineteenth Century, at page 147, I find the following which may or may not interest Senators:

> The vast revolution that had been in progress for half a century was at length fully accomplished. The transfer of power was complete. Fifty years ago—

The book was written in 1872—

> a few great families guided the destinies of the Nation.

Not great corporations, not great banks, not the money power, but a few great, aristocratic, land-owing families.

> The people had no shadow of control over the actings of their Government, and little knowledge regarding them excepting such as they gained from the taxgatherer, the policeman, or the press gang.

We have drifted into that very position. A few great corporations and a confederation of insatiable banks have gathered to themselves the monopoly of the net gain of national wealth. The figures here show it. The national gain in wealth is somewhat less than 10 per cent a year. The Government reports show that the 30,000 corporations, specially protected by the tariff and by such laws as that now proposed, get practically every bit of that national increase of wealth. When and where did a banker ever create wealth? When and where did a dollar ever become useful to any human creature until that dollar was put in use?

We have been told here again, this time by the Senator from Indiana [Mr. WATSON], that unless we allow excessive profits the men who gain them, and who want them exempted from taxation, will not employ labor. How long do Senators on the other side think labor will stand for that? Let the country learn the facts about this bill; let them learn what Senators on the other side say here, that the favored few shall be allowed to make excessive profits and to take unto themselves every year the entire increase of national wealth; go and tell the people that; tell them if you dare! The Senator from Indiana says he will tell them. I venture to say he will not; he dare not; and no other orator or editor on the other side of the Chamber will do it, either.

We have here, just issued, a statement as to the ginners' report on cotton.

The facts are startling. In the State of Georgia we have lost half a million bales of cotton, and lost half the value of what we made. What does that mean to the cotton growers of Georgia? Similar statements apply to all the cotton-growing States, including the great State of Texas, which is so ably represented here, in part, by my friend the junior Senator from that State [Mr. SHEPPARD]. Who made that cotton? Who makes the corn? Who makes the wheat? Bankers do not make it; manufacturers do not make it; the railroads do not make it. Everybody gets rich on it except the men, women, and children who make it. Do you call that statesmanship?

When a man and his wife and his boy and his girl toil from one end of the year to the other to produce crops, should they not have more than a bare living out of the product of their toil?

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. President, will my friend from Georgia yield to me for a moment?

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. With pleasure.

Mr. HEFLIN. The commissioner of agriculture of the State of Texas telegraphed me that it cost 25 cents a pound to produce the cotton crop of this year. Cotton is now selling at 18 cents a pound, or 7 cents a pound under the cost of production.

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. I thank the Senator for the added information.

Mr. President, there will have to be a change. The Republican Party was sent here to make it. We are trying to help them improve their bill. We are not talking merely to consume time. We want the people to know the facts about this bill, because it is the common folk, the producers of wealth, who have to pay these taxes, and when these taxes shall have been paid not one dollar of net profit will be left to them.

A pound of cotton which sells at 18 cents when manufactured into handkerchiefs sells for the equivalent of about $600 for the bale of 500 pounds. A pound of cotton at 18 cents, when made into a bath towel, costs anywhere from $2 to $5, and when made into mercerized goods a pound of cotton reaches a value of at least thirty or forty dollars. The merchant can not "water" his stock; the cattleman can not make two cows out of one; the cotton grower can not "water" his product; the farmers who raise corn and wheat can not "water" their stock; but corporations, with tens of billions of dollars of "watered" stock, require the people of this country to pay net profits on that valueless stock. When I say "valueless," I mean that it originally cost nothing at all, except for so much printing ink and paper, and yet Senators on the other side are proposing to exempt from taxation the men who issue these tens of billions of dollars of watered stock and to impose the burden upon the men who make their daily bread in the sweat of their faces.

Mr. President, Senators may not listen; but the country is listening. The country is reading, as it never has read in recent years; the explanations of this bill and the denunciations leveled against it are carrying far and wide; and when the snowstorm of the ballots begin next November, in the election of Representatives and of those Senators whose terms may then have to be renewed, that snowstorm will catch you far from shelter, and you may feel the effects of the political blizzard.

Mr. TRAMMELL. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will call the roll.

The roll was called, and the following Senators answered to their names:

The VICE PRESIDENT. Sixty-three Senators have responded to their names. A quorum is present. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Missouri.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I have been trying for days to get somebody on the other side of the aisle to break the painful silence that has been maintained, and give us a reason for relieving profiteers from taxes. I was able to do it only when, I fear, I employed language which was neither parliamentary nor polite. When I referred to the Senators upon the other side as sitting as mum as oysters I was entirely correct, but when I said they had about the same intellectual cast of countenance I was wrong. They look much more intelligent than oysters. That much ought to be said in the interest of history; but, of course, I do not mean to reflect upon any of my distinguished friends on the other side of this Chamber. I am willing to have it solemnly recorded now that they are not only an intellectual looking body of men but that they are an intellectual body of men; but the singular thing has been that we could not obtain from them a single reason for taking off the excess-profits tax.

I listened to the speech of my very good friend the Senator from Indiana [Mr. WATSON] with admiration for his eloquence, and with still greater admiration for the sublime nerve he exhibited. If I had a desperate case in which there was no defense whatsoever, I should try to secure the services of the Senator from Indiana; for he can disregard facts and pass lightly over obstacles with an ability which but few men in this country possess. He is, however, altogether an admirable and charming gentleman, and whatever he does possesses an artistic finish which elicits admiration even though it may not convince the judgment.

Let me follow his argument, now, seriatim.

He begins by telling us that the Democratic platform promised to take off excess-profits taxes. It does nothing of the kind. It promised to equalize the burdens of taxation, and that is something that both parties professed they would do; but the singular thing is that your process of equalization as you brought it to us consisted solely in the reduction of the taxes upon the very wealthy and powerful, and did not do anything whatsoever for the men of moderate means. That may be called equalization, but it is an equalization by cutting off everything at one end.

The Senator tells us that a Secretary of the Treasury, Mr. GLASS, denounced the excess-profits tax, and that Mr. Houston denounced the excess-profits tax; and that that ends the matter; that all argument and debate is foreclosed.

I have no criticism of Mr. GLASS for his opinion. It was the opinion of one man. I have no criticism of Mr. Houston for his opinion. It was the opinion of one man. In my judgment both of their opinions were mistakes, and their opinions have no more weight than the opinion of any Senator in this body so far as I am concerned. If we are to settle this question by opinions, then we might as well go out and take a show of hands in the country, and let that determine the proposition.

When we pass from these opinions the Senator from Indiana makes several assertions and several points. The first assertion that he made here, or one of his early assertions, was that because of excess-profits taxes having been levied business had been destroyed, so that there are no excess-profits taxes to be collected.

Mr. President, if that is true, then why all this fuss? If there are no exeess-profits taxes to be collected, then an excess-profits tax, however high, will disturb nobody, for it will reach nobody. But the fact is that excess profits are being collected every day. It is true that profits are not as large as they were during the war; but does the Senator mean to say that the failure to make these excessive profits to as great an extent as during the war is because there is an excess-profits tax? Is that the kind of logic that goes out in Indiana? When the war was on, when prices were mounting every day from a lower level to a higher level, when foreign Governments were willing to pay any price whatsoever for materials, when there was no limit to the prices men would pay in their necessity, profits of course were enormous, and I believe the excess-profits tax amounted at one time to nearly two billions and a half. The war being over, the world settling down to a different economic basis, of course affected the excess-profits tax to a very large extent. Does the Senator mean to say, as he did say, that it was the excess-profits tax that made these people quit making their excess profits, or will he not accord to the truth of the matter—that the closing of the war and the changing economic conditions made it impossible to reap as large profits as during the war?

But, Mr. President, excess profits are still being made notwithstanding the excess-profits tax and notwithstanding the close of the war. The estimate is that the excess-profits tax, if levied under the terms of the present law, will, during the ensuing calendar year, bring $450,000,000 to the Treasury. That must mean, then, that there are excess profits to be realized on probably two billions of dollars by the institutions that are required to pay the excess-profits tax.

So that it is utterly idle to stand here and say in one breath that the excess-profits taxes have prostrated business so that there are no excess profits, then in the next breath to say that we must take the excess-profits tax off, when there are no excess profits to levy taxes upon, and then turn to us and say that profits have been reduced because of an excess-profits tax.

The argument might be made to a crowd of shouting partisans who would not perhaps pause to analyze it, but it is an argument which can not stand the touch of examination. There is a tax to be collected during the next year of $450,000,000 on excess profits, and that means that excess profits are still being realized.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN in the chair). Does the Senator from Missouri yield to the Senator from North Carolina?

Mr. REED. I yield.

Mr. SIMMONS. I was going to suggest to the Senator that the returns of revenue from individual incomes have fallen off about as much as the revenue from excess profits, and if the argument made by Senators on the other side as to why we should repeal the excess-profits tax is a good one, it would apply equally well as an argument why we should repeal the income tax upon individuals.

Mr. REED. Certainly; and they started in to do that, but they back-tracked on it.

The Senator from Indiana declared that if we levy an excess-profits tax we will drive people out of business. That is an argument that has been answered on this floor at least a score of times. The excess-profits tax does not begin to affect any business until 10 per cent net has been realized, and there is not a tax-exempt security in the United States that pays above 6 per cent. Why, then, would a man who has his business exempt from the excess-profits tax up to 10 per cent invest in those low interest bearing securities?

But the excess-profits tax begins to operate after 10 per cent has been realized. How does it operate? One dollar out of five of the excess profits collected up to 20 per cent is taken for taxes and $4 is left in the hands of the gentleman who collects it. So that the individual who has to pay excess-profits taxes and is not making above 20 per cent nevertheless has $80 left out of every $100 of excess profits he makes. Would he forego that and close his business because you took one-fifth of his excess profits; or would he close down his business and put his money in 4 and 5 per cent nontaxable securities when he could make as high as 18 per cent after he had paid his excess profits? I will not say the argument is ridiculous, for I would not want to characterize anything my friend from Indiana said as ridiculous. Senators may characterize it themselves.

Again, when the profits go above 20 per cent, then the tax upon the excess over 20 per cent is 40 per cent; but in that case the man who makes profits above 20 per cent, if he makes a hundred dollars, still has left $60 of that profit in his pocket after he has paid the excess-profits tax. The Senator from Indiana said that a man who was making that kind of a profit will cease doing business because he is not allowed to keep the entire 100 per cent.

The Senator from Indiana, proceeding, declared that this tax ought to be taken off because it is passed on to the ultimate consumer. Senators, that argument proves nothing or it proves too much. If it is sound to take the tax off the man who is profiteering and making more than 20 per cent because the tax will be passed on to the ultimate consumer, then why not take the tax off all corporations because all taxes are passed on to the ultimate consumer? The argument would do away with all taxes upon wealth, and we would levy them all upon the common masses of the producing people, because wealth is going to pass them on anyway to those people.

Mr. CARAWAY. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator yield to the Senator from Arkansas?

Mr. REED. I do.

Mr. CARAWAY. The absurdity of the argument that excess-profits taxes will drive capital out of business is apparent when one reflects that if, as the Senator from Indiana says, the tax is passed on to the consumer, capital is not impaired by the tax at all. If the excess-profits maker can pass the tax on to the consumer, as the Senator from Indiana said, it makes no difference to the profit maker how much the tax is, he still makes his profit and passes the tax on.

Mr. REED. Certainly. The Senator from Arkansas has exploded the whole theory when he makes that statement. They tell us, "You will drive men out of business if you levy an excess-profits tax." They tell us in the next breath that the man who pays the excess-profits tax to the Government does not pay it at all, that he turns right around and collects it from the people, and hence is just as well off as he was before he paid it.

The Senator from Arkansas states it all in a sentence. You can not stand here and claim that an excess-profits tax is passed on and at the same time say that an excess-profits tax is an embargo upon business, for it is no embargo if it can be immediately collected from the purchaser.

That one point was all there was to the argument of the Senator from Indiana, except that he claimed that the excess-profits tax was chiefly made by small concerns, and he presented a table that was gotten up in the Treasury Department to sustain that argument.

Unfortunately for that table and for that doctrine, Mr. President, I presented the statements of experts of the Treasury, who showed that the excess profits were very largely made, not by the very biggest concerns which were overcapitalized but by concerns of very great magnitude, concerns like great department stores, great wholesale houses, great manufacturers, and that the greater part of this tax comes from institutions of that kind.

I grant you that the few very great concerns, like the Steel Trust, will probably pay no excess-profits tax this year; and why? Because they have issued stock to the amount of two or three times their capital investment; but because you can not get them all with an excess-profits tax is no reason why the profiteers should be allowed to escape.

We are confronted with another proposition put forward by the majority, which ran in parallel lines with the reduction of the excess-profits tax, the proposition to take the tax off capital stock. That tax did reach institutions like the Steel Trust very heavily, but they proposed to take the tax off excess profits, and at the same time to take off a tax which they knew the Steel Trust and similar combinations were compelled to pay. That was part of this scheme.

Mr. President, I have already said, and I repeat, their whole scheme was to take off the tax on capital stock, $75,000,000, the tax on high incomes, $90,000,000, and the tax on excess profits, $450,000,000, and every proposition they brought in was for the benefit of the ultra rich. That was the plan devised by that part of the Republican Party represented by the Senator from Indiana.

What did they propose in lieu of that? They tell us that this tax should be taken off because it is passed on to the people. Apparently they have forgotten that they proposed in lieu of it to levy direct taxes, which reach the humblest and poorest of the land.

What were the recommendations of the Secretary of the Treasury, who does not represent big business, but who is big business, the embodiment of it, the choicest flower and fruit of it? His recommendation was to take off the taxes that I have mentioned, and then, in lieu of those taxes, which we are told should be taken off because they are passed to the ultimate consumer, to do what?

Mr. SIMMONS. The Senator should not forget that the Secretary recommended that the surtaxes be reduced to 25 per cent.

Mr. REED. Oh, yes; the surtaxes were to come down to 25 per cent as a maximum. He proposed to double the documentary stamp tax. If there is a nuisance tax in the world, that is it, and it is a tax which must be paid by everybody who transacts any kind of business.

Second, he proposed a tax of 2 cents on each check, so that every working girl or workingman who has a little account in the bank and wants to draw a check would have to pay a 2-cent tax. The most obnoxious tax that ever was levied in a free country probably is that sort of tax. You are taking off the excess-profits tax because it is paid by the ultimate consumer, and you propose to levy a tax of 2 cents on every check that is drawn by every poor man, as well as every rich man.

But he did not stop there. He suggested as a convenient method of taxation an increase of the postage rate from 2 cents to 3 cents. He wants the excess-profits tax taken off because it is passed on to the common people, and then he proposes to make every man who writes a letter and every woman who writes a letter pay 3 cents postage instead of 2 cents postage. How they love the common people!

Mr. CARAWAY. Mr. President, another wing of the party wants a gross sales tax, so that every Negro who buys cheese and crackers will pay his part of the revenue.

Mr. REED. Then the Secretary proposed a license tax on motor vehicles. That would be widely distributed, and it is not quite so bad. Then he proposed to keep the transportation tax on entirely to the close of the calendar year 1922 and to take off one-half of it in 1923, resulting, as he figured it, in a return of $180,000,000, and that is a tax that is paid by the ultimate consumer.

Mr. STANLEY. Five times over.

Mr. REED. Yes; five times over, probably, but certainly once. It is paid by the masses of the people.

Let no man stand in this body and declare that the Republican Party, the great party of the people of the United States, which saved and made this country, is taking off the excess-profits tax in order to benefit the common people of the land, and then come forward with propositions to tax them on their mail, to tax them on their transportation, to tax them on everything they eat and drink and wear.

Mr. President, that is my reply to a speech that was well delivered and fluent in its tone, but that did not have a single sound statement of fact nor a single correct syllogism of logic in it.

Finally, the Senator from Indiana told us that the Republican Party had made this country. One would have thought, as he heard the Senator in his oratorical gyration, as he gradually climbed the golden stair of his enthusiasm, that he really believes that the cows have calves and the hens lay eggs in the United States because the Republican Party exists; that all that the toiling millions have produced by the work of their hands, all the fruitage of our wonderful fields, all the products of our mighty mines, all the works of beauty and of art that have glorified our civilization, all the teeming thoughts that have poured from the teeming brains of the best people on earth were due solely to the Republican Party as it is organized and exists in Indiana, where they vote them in blocks of five and import them from the distant South.

The fact of the matter is that I think God Almighty had more to do with the prosperity of this country than any political party. He it was who unrolled this mighty scroll of mountain and of plain, who sent across it the wandering rivers, who covered it with verdure, who planted the forests, who filled the veins of the earth with silver and gold, copper and lead, zinc and iron, and somehow or other I think God Almighty had something to do with the creation of the human family before the Republican Party was born or thought of. This country will continue, though we may have mistakes of either party, for some time to come.

The Republican Party has not been leading the Nation at all. On the contrary, the Republican Party has been, through a good many periods of its history, so completely serving the great interests that the party split in two a few years ago and the best part of it went in revolt. You have had a rebellion here on your side of this Chamber that has compelled you to restore a part of the good that was in the old law, and my only regret is that they will not stand with us upon this proposition.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, perhaps I had better apologize to the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. PENROSE] for rising at this time, but I propose to put into the RECORD certain facts in answer to repeated statements made upon this floor. The Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED] just made the statement that in the amendment which had been made in the surtax provision we are taking off all the equalization from one end and from the wealthy, and not one cent from the poor. Now, what are the facts?

Mr. REED. I said the bill as it was brought in, and is not that true, as the Senator believes?

Mr. SMOOT. No; I will say to the Senator that it is a mistake when he makes that statement to the bill when it was brought in.

Mr. REED. Very well; I shall be glad to have the Senator tell us just what the bill as it was brought in did in regard to that.

Mr. SMOOT. I can very quickly tell the Senator just what it did, and also what the proposed amendment is.

The highest bracket in the existing law, and that is found in the bill as reported in section 211, for the year 1921 was 65 per cent. As amended it has been reduced to 50 per cent. That is the highest bracket for the income surtaxes. That is 23 per cent discount. Now, let us begin at the beginning——

Mr. REED. But as brought in what was it?

Mr. SMOOT. If the Senator will pardon me, I wish to proceed in just the way I intended to do.

Mr. REED. Very well.

Mr. SMOOT. Now, begin at the first bracket. On incomes of $5,000 and which do not exceed $6,000, under the proposed amendment there is a reduction, an entire reduction between those two figures; in other words, a reduction of 100 per cent.

The next bracket is between $6,000 and $8,000. The rate of the existing law is 2 per cent. That has been reduced to 1 per cent, a reduction of 50 per cent.

The next bracket under existing law is 3 per cent. That has been reduced to 1 per cent, or a reduction of 66⅔ per cent.

The next bracket is from $10,000 to $12,000. The present law is 4 per cent. A reduction is made to 2 per cent, or a reduction of 50 per cent.

The next bracket is of incomes from $12,000 to $14,000. The present law provides 5 per cent. The rate agreed upon is 3 per cent, a reduction of 40 per cent.

The next bracket is incomes of $14,000 to $16,000. The existing law is 6 per cent. The rate proposed is 4 per cent, or a reduction of 33⅓ per cent.

The next bracket is of incomes from $16,000 to $18,000. The present law is 7 per cent. The proposed rate is 5 per cent, or a reduction of 30 per cent.

The next bracket is $18,000 to $20,000. The present law is 8 per cent. The proposed rate is 6 per cent, or a reduction of 25 per cent.

That is not all, Mr. President. I now call attention to the fact that the number of taxpayers in the United States who are within the brackets which I have just mentioned is 4,355,526 out of a total of 4,425,111. The number of taxpayers who are involved in returns of incomes above $20,000 is 69,585. In other words, the decrease on the 69,585 taxpayers as to percentage is less than it is upon the other 4,355,526 taxpayers.

Those are the conditions. Those are the facts. That is what the income-tax section provides for.

All I wished to do was to take about three minutes to put in the RECORD exactly what the results show as to the amendments as agreed to by the Senate and passed upon by the Senate to-day, as compared with the statements that have been so often made here.

Mr. REED. The Senator has been ostensibly replying to me——

Mr. SMOOT. Not altogether to the Senator. I said it has been stated here time and time again upon the floor.

Mr. REED. The statement I made was with reference to the bill as it came in, and I said that it did substantially nothing for the man of moderate means. To make that accurate, what it did was to double the exemption for dependents and to increase the exemption to the head of a family by, I believe, $500. Outside of that it did substantially nothing. Now, I said that after the bill had been brought in here there had been certain amendments forced to it, and the Senator has been discussing the bill as it is now regenerated and changed in the Senate. The figures he has given are not the figures pertaining to the bill as it was introduced here, but the figures as the bill has been changed by this debate.

Mr. SMOOT. Taking the same number of taxpayers, I now call attention of the Senate to the decreases that were made in the bill as reported to the Senate. Mind you, it will be up to the $20,000 incomes, covering the same number of taxpayers that I have already stated, and this is the result: In the existing law there is a bracket of incomes from $8,000 to $10,000 as to which the existing law applied a rate of 2 per cent. That was reported as 1 per cent. The incomes to which a 3 per cent rate applied were reported in at 2 per cent. I shall not take the time to state all the figures in the brackets, because the Senator from Missouri has them before him and can follow me.

The next bracket was reduced from 4 per cent to 3 per cent. The next bracket was reduced from 5 per cent to 4 per cent. The next bracket was reduced from 6 per cent to 5 per cent. The next bracket was reduced from 7 per cent to 6 per cent. That takes them all up to incomes of $20,000. Now, remember that was every bracket affecting over 4,000,000 of the taxpayers in the United States that have been reduced.

Mr. REED. While that statement may be technically accurate, yet it is very misleading. The reduction of the tax on many of those incomes was $10 a year, and it was put in purely so that it would show a reduction. One of the experts who offered it said, "If you want to show a reduction, this is a reduction, but it is very small." There was a somewhat substantial reduction made on incomes of $6,000 to $8,000.

There was a reduction from 2 per cent to 1 per cent. On incomes from $8,000 to $10,000 there was a reduction from 3 per cent to 2 per cent; from $10,000 to $12,000 there was a reduction from 4 per cent to 3 per cent; from $12,000 to $14,000 there was a reduction from 5 per cent to 4 per cent; from $14,000 to $16,000 there was a reduction from 6 per cent to 5 per cent; from $16,000 to $18,000 there was a reduction from 7 per cent to 6 per cent; from $18,000 to $20,000 there was a reduction from 10 per cent to 9 per cent; from $22,000 to $24,000 the tax was increased from 10 per cent to 11 per cent; and from $24,000 to $25,000 the tax went up from 11 per cent to 12 per cent. It ran along practically without any change between the two bills, then, until we reach incomes of $66,000, and there, under the present law, the tax continued to increase to 65 per cent. As to those incomes, which number about 12,000 and which are enjoyed by millionaires, a flat rate is fixed as the bill was reported at 32 per cent, saving to them the $90,000,000 about which we have been talking.

Senators on the other side were forced through the debate to raise the tax from 32 per cent to an aggregate of 50 per cent. Hence the figures which the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT] has just been giving may be said to be true with reference to the bill to-day, but they were not true with reference to the bill which the committee sought to put down the throats of this country without even one word of explanation as to what it meant. They brought it in here and sat down silently, hoping, apparently, to pass it without criticism.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, the Senator from Utah made no statement that the figures were based upon the bill as reported to the Senate; but I wish to say this to the Senator: He may not think that there is any substantial reduction where the rate has been reduced from 2 per cent to 1 per cent; but I call his attention to the fact that that amounts to a 50 per cent reduction; that it makes the income tax of every individual in the bracket affected just 50 per cent less; I do not care whether it is $10 or $100, or what the amount may be, the reduction is 50 per cent. It is about that we are talking.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, let us see how much it amounts to. I have the figures here. The gentleman who has an income of $6,000 saves $10 under the bill as reported.

Mr. SMOOT. Then he was only taxed $20.

Mr. REED. That gentleman saves $10 on the bill as reported.

Mr. SMOOT. Then, he will pay but half of what he previously paid.

Mr. REED. Then the next taxpayer, on an $8,000 income, previously paid $50 and his tax is reduced to $20; on an income of $10,000 the tax was $190, and it is reduced to $120; on an income of $12,000 the tax was $290, which is reduced to $200; on an income of $14,000 the tax was $410, which is reduced to $300; on an income of $16,000 the tax was $550, which is reduced to $420; on an income of $18,000 the tax under the present law is $710, which is reduced to $560; on an income of $25,000 the tax was $1,200, and it is reduced to $1,100.

See how entirely the two measures now commence to run together. On an income of $30,000 the tax was $3,410 and it is reduced to $3,400—a saving of $10. From that point on the taxes are all substantially the same until we reach the bracket of 32 per cent, which was levied on incomes of $68,000. From there up under the present law the tax continued to increase to 65 per cent. Under the bill, as introduced, it was reduced to a flat rate of 32 per cent, and, as I showed here in my first speech, it meant a saving to some of these gentlemen of over $1,000,000 a year. So I say that the crumbs that fell from the table of Senators on the other side for the benefit of those who were enjoying the lesser incomes were so small that they need not be considered in connection with the loaf that they handed the millionaire.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. President, the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT], who has had some difficulty in explaining this measure, speaks about 4,000,000 people who have had their taxes reduced. I wondered while the Senator was speaking what arrangement was being made to give fair treatment to the other 106,000,000 American people. I have insisted from the outset that Senators on the other side of the Chamber intended to unload this tax burden upon the masses of the country; that they intended to shift the burden from the shoulders of those most able to bear it to the shoulders of those least able to bear it. I am more convinced of that to-night than I have ever been before.

A wonderful argument was made here this afternoon by one of the Republican leaders, the Senator from Indiana [Mr. WATSON], who undertook to convince this body and the country that the big excess-profits tax was paid by the consumer. Mr. President, the Republican Party never in all its history undertook to take any tax off the consumer. If the excess-profits tax had been paid by the consumer those gentlemen who make excess profits would have been here to-day clamoring for its continuance upon the statute books. The Senators on the other side of the Chamber would never put into the provisions of this bill a clause repealing the excess-profits tax, because if there is anything on the face of the earth which delights the standpat Republican it is to impose a tax burden upon those out amongst the masses and to relieve the money lords, the tariff barons, and the trust magnates of the country.

The pending measure, it seems to me, is constructed for the purpose of letting the big rich men out. We may just as well speak frankly here and be fair with one another. The bill ought to be written, so far as it is possible, with fairness and justice to the great taxpaying masses of the people. We ought to apply the principle that Christ himself announced; I have referred to that before, but I will do so again for the benefit of the Republican Senators. He demanded more of the man of 5 talents than he did of the man with 2 talents. Certainly that is a good principle to apply in government. Certainly we ought to demand more taxes of those who have most and less taxes of those who have least; but what are the Republicans doing in this bill? They are doing what I said in the outset they would do. They have brought in here a stalking horse in the amendment suggested by the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT] providing for a manufacturers' tax; and this morning the Washington Post contained an article stating that the Republicans would ultimately fall back upon a sales tax and that the consumer would pay it at the counter. That is what I said on yesterday before that article was written. The sponsors for the bill are coming to that, and while there are some here who yet dare to speak for the people let us hold up to them the unfair and obnoxious provisions that the Republican majority are proposing to put into the bill.

The excess-profits tax paid by the consumer! Nearly half a billion dollars that Senators on the other side are preparing to take out and give over to the profiteers of the country.

Mr. President, these men were exceedingly good to the Republican Party last fall when that party expended more money in corrupting the ballot and obtaining the election than ever was expended in a presidential campaign in all the history of this great Government. These men were lavish with their funds; they unloosed their purse strings; they contributed to the campaign fund generously and now they are demanding their toll; they are asking that the Republicans return to them legislative favors for the favors they granted to them last fall.

The first thing the Republican Party does when it organizes a campaign is to begin to look out to ascertain where it is going to get a campaign fund, while the first thing the Democratic Party does is to say, "Let us write a platform that is fair and just, and let us show to the country the record of our party, its record of loyalty to the interests of the masses of the people." No boss controls the Democratic Party; it is free and unfettered; it is the brave and free champion of the masses. The Republican Party, on the other hand, is not free; it is hampered and hog tied by the interests. That party can not pass a bill, its leaders will not even bring one in here, that has not been O. K'd by the special interests.

Mr. President, I am going to make a charge against the other side now, and I want some Senator on that side to respond. I make the assertion that there is not a Republican Senator in this body who can take this bill and explain intelligently every provision in it; and yet Senators on the other side are clamoring for a vote on this monstrosity and asking that we quit discussing it and let it go upon the statute books. There is not one of them who can get up here and explain the bill provision by provision, and yet they are asking Senators to vote for it and give it their solemn sanction. [Applause.] I hear no response to my challenge.

Mr. President, one expert, not a Member of the Senate, has a fund of information on one item in the bill; another expert has information on another item in the bill; and still another expert has information upon another item in the bill; and those experts come up and whisper that information into the ears of a Senator who is supporting some provision of the bill. Then the expert retires; he goes back to his seat; he sits down; and in two hours' time the Senator has forgotten what the expert told him, and the situation is something fearful. Yet Republican Senators are asking us to come here and vote on this bill that affects the purse of the people of this country and solemnly to place it on the statute books of the Nation.

Mr. President, I submit that time ought to be given to examine into the provisions of the measure. We objected to the bill as first brought in here, and by discussing it created so much objection to it amongst the intelligent people of the country, men and women, until, as the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. STANLEY] said, we made you withdraw it and take it out of this Chamber; and now you have come back with a new bill, and it is nearly as bad as the other one.

It is our duty to call attention to the defects of this bill, and we are doing it. You ought to cut out some of the terrible provisions of this bill. By the fight we have made, by the time we have consumed, and by the light we have shed upon this bill, we have saved some money to the taxpayers of the country and we have shown to the people what it is that you are trying to do.

Senators, let the people have fair treatment. They are entitled to that. This Government does not belong to a few bond sharks in Wall Street and tax-dodging profiteers. This Government does not belong to a few money kings who have no pleasure in this world except in counting their accumulated coin, whose hearts never beat in sympathy for the mass of mankind. They live in an atmosphere away from the great throbbing heart of humanity; and I do not intend to sit here and permit you to put in these provisions which will be burdensome to the people—unfair and unjust to them—without entering my solemn protest.

Mr. TRAMMELL. Mr. President, in view of the fact that there are so few Senators present—I believe that out of the 96 Members of the Senate only about 12 are present—and there are very important matters to be transacted, I suggest the absence of a quorum. I think that on an important matter of this kind we ought to have more than a dozen Senators present.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. WADSWORTH in the chair). The information of the present occupant of the chair is that no business has been transacted since the last quorum was called.

Mr. TRAMMELL. Mr. President, I move that when the Senate adjourns to-night it adjourn until 9 a. m. to-morrow, and upon that question I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were not ordered.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Florida.

The motion was rejected.

Mr. TRAMMELL. Now, Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will call the roll.

The roll was called, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst	Gooding	Moses	Smoot
Borah	Harris	Myers	Spencer
Brandegee	Harrison	Nelson	Sutherland
Broussard	Heflin	Nicholson	Swanson
Bursum	Hitchcock	Norbeck	Townsend
Capper	Jones, N. Mex.	Oddie	Trammell
Caraway	Kenyon	Overman	Wadsworth
Cummins	Keyes	Page	Walsh, Mont.
Curtis	King	Penrose	Warren
du Pont	Lenroot	Phipps	Watson, Ga.
Edge	McKellar	Ransdell	Willis
Ernst	McKinley	Sheppard
Fernald	McLean	Shortridge
France	McNary	Simmons

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Fifty-there Senators have answered to their names; there is a quorum present.

Mr. PENROSE. Mr. President, it had been my purpose to endeavor to continue this session until as late an hour to-night as possible in order to expedite the passage of the pending bill; but I recognize the fact that considerable progress has been made to-day, and if I can get a unanimous-consent agreement on this excess-profits question I shall be content to ask for a recess of the Senate until 11 o'clock to-morrow morning.

I therefore now ask unanimous consent that the Senate will vote on the question of the excess-profits tax and all amendments relating thereto and all questions connected therewith not later than 4 o'clock on to-morrow.

Mr. SIMMONS. The Senator means that not later than 4 o'clock to-morrow we shall begin to vote without further debate?

Mr. PENROSE. Yes; without further debate.

Mr. SMOOT. Will not the Senator limit debate?

Mr. PENROSE. That is another question; and that prior to that time no Senator shall speak on the question more than——

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Do not put that in.

Mr. PENROSE. I am not anxious for that part of it.

Mr. SMOOT. Then, will we have a chance to offer amendments after 4 o'clock without debate?

Mr. SIMMONS. Without further debate.

Mr. PENROSE. Yes; I think so.

Mr. SMOOT. I simply want to have that understood.

Mr. PENROSE. My request is for a vote on the main question and all amendments pending or offered not later than 4 o'clock.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Does that include the whole of Title III?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. No; that is just the excess-profits tax.

Mr. PENROSE. Yes.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. That is what I want to find out—how far it extends.

Mr. SMOOT. I want to say to the Senator that the Senator from Colorado has an amendment to offer to this section.

Mr. PENROSE. Well, let him offer it.

Mr. SMOOT. If the Senator will limit it to excess profits, I know of no amendment except that one.

Mr. PENROSE. That is what I did limit it to.

Mr. SMOOT. I know the Senator did, but later it was suggested that the whole title be included.

Mr. PENROSE. I make the request as I put it originally, confining it to the question of the excess-profits tax and all amendments pending or offered. I ask that the vote be taken not later than 4 o'clock without debate.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President, I wish to inquire whether it would not be agreeable to the Senator from Pennsylvania to provide that the Senators tendering amendments after 4 o'clock may have five minutes within which to explain the nature of the amendments? I have observed that when we make such an arrangement to vote on amendments, frequently amendments are tendered with no explanation whatever as to their nature, or what the significance of them may be. I am very sure it would not delay the matter.

Mr. PENROSE. I do not believe it would, Mr. President, although I must say that it does not arouse any enthusiasm in my breast; but, still, I will agree to have that put in. Now I ask to have the Secretary state the agreement, and if it is entered into I intend to ask the Senate to take a recess until 11 o'clock to-morrow.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President, I will ask the Senator to let us have a short executive session.

Mr. PENROSE. Let us agree to this unanimous-consent proposal if we are going to do so.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will state the proposed unanimous-consent agreement.

The Assistant Secretary read as follows:

It is agreed by unanimous consent that at not later than 4 o'clock p. m. on the calendar day of Wednesday, October 26, the Senate will proceed to vote without further debate upon any amendment that may be pending or that may be offered to the committee amendment known as the excess-profits tax: Provided, That any Senator proposing an amendment after the said hour of 4 o'clock p. m. may explain the same for a period not exceeding five minutes.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection?

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Mr. President, I should like to inquire of the Senator if that includes also the discussion of the so-called 15 per cent normal tax?

Mr. PENROSE. No; it does not affect the normal tax.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I mean the corporation tax, the flat tax on corporations.

Mr. PENROSE. No; it has nothing to do with it.

Mr. SIMMONS. Nothing except the excess-profits tax.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the proposed unanimous-consent agreement? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

Mr. PENROSE. Now, Mr. President, I move that when the Senate has carried a motion for the consideration of executive business and disposes of it the Senate will take a recess until 11 o'clock to-morrow morning.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. PENROSE. I now move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to, and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After five minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened.

FUNERAL CEREMONIES FOR UNKNOWN AMERICAN SOLDIER.

Mr. WADSWORTH, from the Committee on Military Affairs, reported the following resolution (S. Res. 160), which was considered by unanimous consent and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Senate accept the invitation transmitted by the Secretary of War in his letter of October 15, 1921, addressed to the President of the Senate; and be it further

Resolved, That on Friday, November 11, 1921, the Senate shall meet at 8 o'clock and 20 minutes a. m., and that immediately thereafter it will adjourn in order that Senators may proceed to the Rotunda of the Capitol, there to join the President and the members of his Cabinet in escorting the body of the unknown American soldier.

RECESS.

Mr. CURTIS. I move that the Senate take a recess until 11 o'clock to-morrow.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 7 o'clock and 53 minutes p. m.) the Senate took a recess until to-morrow, Wednesday, October 26, 1921, at 11 o'clock a. m.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

TUESDAY, October 25, 1921.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. James Shera Montgomery, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Almighty God, O how great and marvelous is Thy goodness, which Thou hast laid up for them who love and fear Thee! Turn, O turn, Thy favoring eye and give us the token of Thy presence. Great is our need, but greater far is Thy loving power. Remind us that no good thing wilt Thou withhold from him who walks uprightly. May the heavenly harmony of peace and good will break everywhere, until all men and all nations shall be drawn to Thy feet. Bid us be of good courage; lead us in a plain path and never leave nor forsake. In the name of Jesus, our elder Brother. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, I notice in the RECORD of yesterday, when the gentleman from Alaska submitted a report on the bill H. R. 7948, to provide for agricultural entries on coal lands in Alaska, that the RECORD fails to show that I reserved a point of order. Does the Journal show that fact?

The SPEAKER. The Journal shows the fact.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Very well, if the Journal shows it.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, the Journal as read will stand approved.

There was no objection, and the Journal was approved.

REPRINT OF HEARINGS—INDIAN AFFAIRS COMMITTEE.

Mr. SYNDER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for a reprint of the hearings of the subcommittee in the matter of the Indian tribes of California. The print is entirely exhausted, and I ask that 500 additional copies be printed.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York asks for a reprint of the hearings before the Indian Affairs Committee on the subject referred to. Is there objection?

Mr. WINGO. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, what is the subject?

Mr. SNYDER. I am asking for a reprint of the subcommittee hearings on the matter of the claims of all of the Indians of California. The number printed originally has been exhausted. There is a very great interest in the matter, and we have a great call for them.

Mr. WINGO. What does the Committee on Printing say? I find great difficulty in getting one copy of the hearings, and I have requests for 183 from my district.

Mr. SNYDER. I am asking unanimous consent for a reprint of the hearings. If the gentleman desires to object, it will be agreeable to me. I want to supply the gentleman in his demands, if the House desires that we shall have them.

Mr. WINGO. I hope the gentleman will not be ill-tempered about it.

Mr. SNYDER. Oh, I am not ill-tempered about it.

Mr. WINGO. I asked the gentleman a courteous question, and I am endeavoring to get information.

Mr. SNYDER. I have not asked the Committee on Printing. I am asking the House for unanimous consent. It is a matter of slight importance to me, but the people of California seem to be very greatly interested in it, and I have a desire to supply them with the information.

Mr. WINGO. What kind of claims are they?

Mr. SNYDER. They are claims for lands that have been taken away from them, something like 100 years ago. There is a great interest in the matter all over the State.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Speaker, I hope the gentleman will withhold his request and consult the Committee on Printing. I do not understand that this is a request to print this in the RECORD?

Mr. SNYDER. Oh, no. I am submitting a request for unanimous consent to have a reprint of the hearings. I want to have 500 of these pamphlets reprinted. It is a matter of 130 pages.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection of the request of the gentleman from New York.

Mr. CANNON. I have objected to the consideration of that legislation time and again.

Mr. SNYDER. Oh, I am opposed to the legislation myself, I will say to the gentleman.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York. [After a pause.] The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

CALL OF THE HOUSE.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that there is no quorum present.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Wisconsin makes the point of order that there is no quorum present. Evidently there is not.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, I move a call of the House.

The motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The Doorkeeper will close the doors, the Sergeant-at-Arms will notify absentees, and the Clerk will call the roll.

The SPEAKER. Two hundred and ninety-five Members have answered to their names; a quorum is present.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, I move to dispense with further proceedings under the call.

The motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The Doorkeeper will open the doors.

EXPULSION OF A MEMBER.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, I offer a privileged resolution.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Wyoming offers a privileged resolution, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Whereas THOMAS L. BLANTON, Representative from the seventeenth district of the State of Texas, did on October 4, 1921, ask unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD "upon the improvements in the Government Printing Office," which consent was granted by the House; and

Whereas under such permission the said THOMAS L. BLANTON did insert and cause to be printed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD for Saturday, October 22, 1921, grossly indecent and obscene language, unworthy of a Member of the House of Representatives, contrary to the rules of the House, derogatory to its dignity, and in violation of its confidence: Therefore be it

Resolved, That the said THOMAS L. BLANTON, by his conduct as aforesaid, has forfeited all right to sit as a Representative in the Sixty-seventh Congress, and is hereby expelled and declared to be no longer a Member of this House.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman from Wyoming yield?

Mr. MONDELL. In just a moment. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLANTON] did not answer to his name on the roll call. I do not see the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLANTON]. Is he present? Mr. Speaker, this is a very serious matter, and while the office of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLANTON] was notified this morning that this resolution would be offered it does not appear to me seemly that we should proceed to the consideration of the resolution in his absence. I desire to give notice that the resolution will be called up immediately upon the convening of the House to-morrow morning, and in order to make that possible without the two-thirds vote necessary to dispense with Calendar Wednesday business I ask unanimous consent that the business in order under the rule on Calendar Wednesday may be in order instead on Thursday.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Wyoming asks unanimous consent that the business regularly in order to-morrow on Calendar Wednesday may be made in order on Thursday. Is there objection?

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, would it be agreeable to the gentleman from Wyoming to permit the consideration of the resolution offered to go over until Thursday? I do not know whether Mr. BLANTON is in the city or not. I have had no communication whatever with him.

Mr. MONDELL. If the gentleman from Tennessee makes that request, I shall not object. Therefore, on the request of the gentleman from Tennessee—I understand that to be his request——

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. I think it would be better from every aspect.

Mr. MONDELL (continuing). I withdraw my request relative to Calendar Wednesday, and give notice that the resolution will be called up immediately after the reading of the Journal on Thursday.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman withdraws the resolution——

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, I did not withdraw the resolution, but I shall not press it for consideration at this time.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Mr. Speaker, I submit a privileged resolution from the Committee on Rules.

Mr. MONDELL. If the gentleman from Kansas will withhold that for one moment——

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. I do.

Mr. MONDELL. While our rules do not require it, in order that there may be no question as to the service of notice on the gentleman from Texas of the resolution which I have just presented, I shall ask the Sergeant at Arms to deliver him, or his secretary in his absence, a copy of the resolution at the earliest possible moment, and notice that it will be taken up Thursday.

INTERNATIONAL CENTENNIAL CELEBRATION, RIO DE JANEIRO.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Mr. Speaker, I offer a privileged resolution from the Commitee on Rules.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report it.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas, from the Committee on Rules, offers the following resolution:

"Immediately upon the adoption of this rule it shall be in order to take up for consideration S. J. Res. 114 under the general rules of the House."

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Mr. Speaker, the effect of this rule is to make in order the consideration of the Senate joint resolution providing for the participation of the United States in an exposition at Rio de Janeiro. The question will come up under the general rules of the House under the rule that has just been offered. I have nothing to submit further unless there may be some questions.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I would like to ask the gentleman a question.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. I will yield.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I want to say in advance that I am in favor of the United States accepting the invitation to participate in the exposition at Brazil. I understood the gentleman to say—I did not hear the resolution read at the desk—that this rule makes in order the Senate resolution.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. The consideration of the Senate resolution.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. As I understand, the Senate resolution makes an appropriation of $1,000,000 for the purpose of participating in the exposition. That $1,000,000 was appropriated under the Senate resolution without any estimate upon the part of any department officer of the Government in violation, if I may use the term, of the express provisions of the budget law, and also in violation of the Rules of the House which require estimates to be submitted in accordance with the law.

Now, I have wondered whether or not the gentleman proposes by this resolution to make the entire Senate resolution in order or whether or not it is proposed to strike out the proposition of making an appropriation and simply make an authorization?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Under the rules the House will have control of the entire matter and may make such changes or modifications as it sees fit.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. I will say to my colleague that it technically makes the Senate bill in order, and what is actually before the House is the one amendment, a committee amendment, which strikes out all of the Senate bill and substitutes the House bill, which merely carries an authorization.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. And not an appropriation?

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. And not an appropriation.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I want to repeat, Mr. Speaker, with the permission of the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. CAMPBELL], that I have no objection to the resolution in so far as authorizing the Government to accept the invitation of the Brazilian Government is concerned, nor have I any objection to a proper appropriation, and it may be that a million dollars may be necessary for that purpose, but I certainly think we ought to have an estimate of the amount that is to be appropriated and know exactly how it is to be expended before an appropriation is made.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. This is but another evidence that there are men doing business under the dome of this Capitol who will have to find out something about the rules of the House and of the constitutional rights under which appropriations originate.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I will say to the gentleman that his opening remark was that this made in order the Senate resolution. I submit to the gentleman, if he has read that resolution, he knows it makes an appropriation. The gentleman did not make the explanation that was made by the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. GARRETT], which has cleared it up.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. The resolution carries the Senate title and the Senate number, but the Senate resolution has been stricken out, and, as stated by the gentleman from Tennessee, the House substitutes——

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. If the gentleman had made that statement, I would not have interrupted him.

Mr. STAFFORD. Will the gentleman from Kansas yield?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. For a question.

Mr. STAFFORD. Under the pending resolution, reported from the Committee on Rules, the Senate joint resolution is up for consideration, not the Senate joint resolution as reported by the committee with the House amendment.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. The only difference between what the gentleman from Wisconsin recites and what the facts are is that the Senate joint resolution will have to be read.

Mr. STAFFORD. There is much more difference than that, I will say to the gentleman.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. And the consideration will fall on the amendment submitted.

Mr. STAFFORD. There is much more difference. It does not bring up for consideration the amendment in the nature of a substitute as reported to the Senate joint resolution.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. The consideration falls upon the amendment.

Mr. BUTLER. Will the gentleman from Kansas yield?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. I will.

Mr. BUTLER. If we adopt this rule, does it bind us to pass that Senate resolution?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. It binds us to consider the House amendment to the Senate resolution.

Mr. STAFFORD. It binds us to consider only the Senate resolution. That is the matter that is up for consideration, and not the substitute recommended by the Committee on Industrial Arts and Expositions.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. That is the title of the resolution, and is the customary way of dealing with matters of this kind.

Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the resolution.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Kansas moves the previous question on the resolution.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

The resolution was agreed to.

Mr. BLAND of Indiana. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of Senate joint resolution 114, and pending that I would like to have some agreement in reference to time. Would the gentleman from Texas [Mr. LANHAM], the ranking member on the minority side of the committee, agree to an hour on a side?

Mr. LANHAM. I think that will be satisfactory.

Mr. BLAND of Indiana. Then, pending the motion, I would like to submit a unanimous-consent request that the time for debate on the resolution be limited to two hours; that one half of that time be given to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. LANHAM] and the other half to myself.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman asks unanimous consent that general debate be limited to two hours, half to be controlled by himself and half by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. LANHAM]. Is there objection?

Mr. STAFFORD. Reserving the right to object, I believe it is a fact that both the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. BLAND] and the gentleman from Texas [Mr. LANHAM] are in favor of the Senate joint resolution providing for an appropriation of a million dollars for the exhibit at Rio de Janeiro. I wish to inquire whether there can be any time extended to those who are opposed to this?

Mr. BLAND of Indiana. I will try to provide the time.

Mr. STAFFORD. I think at least three-quarters of an hour should be granted to those who are opposed to the bill.

Mr. LANHAM. I will say to the gentleman that I am not in favor of the Senate resolution, but I am in favor of the House resolution.

Mr. STAFFORD. There is only this much difference between the Senate and the House, in that the Senate resolution provides for three commissioners and the House resolution provides for five.

Mr. LANHAM. There are other differences also, and I think that the gentleman will find that the difference between the House and the Senate is not one of great importance when the details are understood. And with reference to yielding time to those opposed to the resolution, it is my intention to yield to those opposed to the resolution if the motion is agreed to.

Mr. STAFFORD. Reserving the right to object, I would like to have some understanding before that as to how much time should be granted to those opposed to the resolution.

Mr. LANHAM. It is my purpose to grant reasonable requests for time to those in opposition to the resolution as well as to those in favor of it.

Mr. STAFFORD. Regardless of the political affiliation?

Mr. LANHAM. Yes. Well, if the gentleman on that side can make the same statement with reference to that side, perhaps it will take care of the situation.

Mr. STAFFORD. I made the suggestion to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. BLAND] that I think at least one-half of the time on this side should be extended to those in opposition to the bill.

Mr. BLAND of Indiana. Oh, there are so many that are in favor of the bill and so few who are against it that I do not think it would be fair to give the opposition one-half.

Mr. STAFFORD. I speak for those that are opposed to it.

Mr. BLAND of Indiana. If there are a number sufficient to justify the taking up of that time, I should favor giving it.

Mr. STAFFORD. I think that one-half of the time should be used in opposition to the bill.

Mr. BLAND of Indiana. When there are only a few in opposition to the proposition presented, I do not think it would be fair to give them one-half of the time.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the motion that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of S. J. Res. 114.

The motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York [Mr. HUSTED] will please take the chair.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the resolution (S. J. Res. 114) accepting the invitation of the Republic of Brazil to take part in an international exposition to be held in Rio de Janeiro in 1922, with Mr. HUSTED in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the resolution (S. J. Res. 114), which the Clerk will report by title.

The Clerk read as follows:

Joint resolution (S. J. Res. 114) accepting the invitation of the Republic of Brazil to take part in an international exposition to be held in Rio de Janeiro in 1922.

Mr. BLAND of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to dispense with the first reading of the resolution.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Indiana asks unanimous consent that the first reading of the resolution be dispensed with. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. BLAND] is recognized.

Mr. HUDSPETH. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield to a question before he begins his statement?

Mr. BLAND of Indiana. Yes.

Mr. HUDSPETH. Is this resolution the same as the House joint resolution? Are we considering the Senate joint resolution or the House resolution?

Mr. BLAND of Indiana. We are to consider the Senate joint resolution. I will explain the difference in a moment. There is quite a difference between the Senate resolution and the House resolution.

Mr. Chairman and gentlemen, the history of this legislation is something like this; A number of months ago—I will not undertake to say just when—we were officially invited to participate in the exposition to be held at Rio de Janeiro in September, October, and November next year, and were given a definite time in which to accept. Of course, the reason for assigning a definite date of acceptance was for the purpose of holding for us the ground upon which we were to exhibit if we cared to participate. The time expired. Nothing was done, and they extended the time. They have now extended the time to October 31, which I understand to be the third extension of time.

The committee is unanimous in its report that we ought to accept the invitation. There are many impelling reasons.

With the acceptance of the invitation, of course, comes the corresponding obligation to our country to furnish an exhibit and really make some showing at this centennial of that great Republic. The Secretary of State, Mr. Hughes, first wrote to the committee a very strong letter setting up what I believe to be indisputable reasons for our taking part in this exposition. Aside from that he sent a representative of the State Department, Mr. Carrell, to testify before the committee, and that representative gave most conclusive reasons for our participation.

I want to deal somewhat briefly with those reasons. I have found very little objection to this resolution in Congress. I think the only reason that is assigned by anyone for not participating would be on the ground of the expense entailed. Brazil is the greatest Republic in the world except the United States. They have 25,000,000 people. They belong to the Western Hemisphere. They are progressive, they are active, and they are going to take a great place in the history of affairs in the near future.

It may be recalled that 10 years ago there were but probably 14 or 15 American citizens in Rio de Janeiro. To-day, by the cultivation of the splendid feeling existing between North America and South America, there are 1,500 American citizens, citizens of the United States, in Rio de Janeiro alone, and the United States is taking its place in the commerce of that great Republic. We have two great banking institutions down there. One of those institutions represents 20 American banks. Brazil has recently floated a loan of $12,000,000 with the United States in order to carry on this great centennial exposition. England, Japan, and all the Governments I have heard from have taken or are taking part in this exposition.

The relationship between Brazil and the United States is most cordial. Those folks are Latin people down there; they speak the Portuguese tongue. They are very friendly to us. When we declared war they declared war. They are using our Supreme Court decisions as their guide in legal jurisprudence. Their constitution is modeled after ours. They admire the American Republic. Eight times has Brazil come to the United States and taken part in our expositions. At the St. Louis Exposition $600,000 was expended by that Republic, which at this date has only 25,000,000 people. She built a wonderfully fine building there. That building was taken down, moved down to Rio de Janeiro and reconstructed, and it now stands on one of the main streets of that beautiful city of 1,000,000 people and is called the Monroe Palace, named after our President of that name, who is honored as the father of the great Monroe doctrine.

I understand that those people are somewhat sensitive over the fact that we have not accepted the invitation before now. This committee went carefully over the whole situation and unanimously arrived at the conclusion that if it was purely a matter of investment we could not afford to fail to appropriate $1,000,000 and go down there and make a splendid showing. Furthermore, as a matter of reciprocal friendship, it would be unspeakable for us not to accept this invitation from Brazil. To-day Germany, France, and England are striving for the commerce of that great Republic.

Fortunately she produces what we do not produce, and we produce what she does not produce, and we have a splendid exchange of products, and out of her friendship for us she has given us a 20 per cent advantage in her tariff duties. You remember when Secretary Root went down there. He helped to establish a wonderful relationship with those people, and the late Secretary Colby went there also and was entertained wonderfully. We are established upon such a splendid friendly basis with those people that we do not dare to risk endangering it.

Something may be said about the size of the appropriation requested. The Secretary of State has asked for $1,000,000. It has been estimated that it will cost $500,000 to build the building. Some one has said, "Why do you not get the plans and specifications of the building?" We do not know anything about what kind of a building ought to be built there. The commission will build the building, and already I am informed that it has been suggested to the United States Government that if we will build the building with a permanent foundation and use steel, it will be easy to sell it to those people when we are through with it, and I am sure that can be done.

The little Republic of Uruguay to the south of Brazil has appropriated $100,000 to take part in this celebration of her Pan American sister, and this great rich Nation of ours can not make much of a showing with $1,000,000; but the committee thought it was best to put certain limitations on the salaries, and just there comes the amendment that the House committee has made, different from the Senate bill.

The bill as originally written by the State Department and introduced by Senator LODGE in the Senate provided for five commissioners, and it had no limitation on the salaries to be paid. It had no provisions with respect to future appropriations. The committee decided that we ought to put a limitation upon salaries in order that we might avoid any abuses as to the amount of salaries paid to any individual. Therefore, the committee in its bill, which was referred to the Committee on Industrial Arts and Expositions and reported favorably, provided that there should be a limitation of $15,000 for any salary, and that not more than one person should receive a salary greater than $10,000, and that only three persons should receive salaries between $7,500 and $10,000.

Mr. CONNELL. Does that include their personal expenses also?

Mr. BLAND of Indiana. Oh, no. Now the Senate struck out the word "five" and inserted the word "three" as the number of the commissioners. The House committee was informed that the probabilities were that two of the commissioners would be men who would be appointed for the social end of the affair and probably would serve without pay. The committee is inclined to accept the Senate amendment as far as I have been able to ascertain, and I am going to offer an amendment later to the effect that the two commissioners over and above those provided in the Senate resolution shall not receive any compensation. I am informed by those most interested that two persons can be obtained who will serve efficiently without pay.

Mr. MONTAGUE. That is two out of the five.

Mr. BLAND of Indiana. Two out of the five.

Mr. DENISON. Will the gentleman from Indiana yield?

Mr. BLAND of Indiana. I yield to the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. DENISON. I may have misunderstood the gentleman in his statement about the $15,000. What was it the gentleman said?

Mr. BLAND of Indiana. Under the House amendment, only one person could receive a salary between $10,000 and $15,000, and that would be the commissioner general.

Mr. DENISON. Is it necessary that we pay a salary of $15,000 to a man to go to Rio de Janeiro?

Mr. BLAND of Indiana. The testimony before the committee shows that at the Santiago exposition the commissioner general was paid $20,000, and there have been other expositions where the commissioner general has been paid $40,000 or $50,000, and the committee thought that was too much. We did not want that to happen. But, if you understand, this service is for only about three months, and to get a real man who can fill that job you would have to pay him proportionately, at least, to $15,000.

Mr. LANHAM. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLAND of Indiana. I yield to the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. LANHAM. Is it not true also that the commissioner general of this exposition would have pretty much the same standing among those Latin-American people that the ambassador from the United States would have, and is it not true that the ambassador from the United States receives a salary of $17,500?

Mr. BLAND of Indiana. I thank the gentleman for the suggestion. That is absolutely true. The ambassador receives $17,500, and the commissioner general will have more expenses than the ambassador, and will be there for only three months.

Mr. ACKERMAN. I notice that section 4 provides—

That the Shipping Board is authorized to give the commission such assistance as may be necessary and to make special rates and special sailing schedules for the transportation of governmental and private exhibits and participants to and from the exposition.

I wish to ask the gentleman if the expense of making those special rates and sailing schedules is to come out of the $1,000,000 that may be appropriated, or would that be in addition to the $1,000,000?

Mr. BLAND of Indiana. There is a reason for putting that section in the bill that I do not think it would be advisable to state on the floor of the House, but I am quite sure that some charges will come out of this fund. The cost of passage from New York to Rio de Janeiro at the present time is $450 one way, and that is entirely too high, and something must be done to make them come down on their charges, or else the United States will have to transport her own exhibits down there.

Mr. ACKERMAN. It seems to me, if I may be permitted to make the suggestion, that the expense of this Shipping Board at the present time is a very serious question in the minds of the people of the United States; and if there is to be something in addition to the $1,000,000 incurred in the passage of this bill, it seems to me that the voters of the United States ought to know what it is.

Mr. BLAND of Indiana. I think the gentleman ought to be satisfied with the answer that the Shipping Board can make a rate that will make competitors come down in their rates.

Mr. PADGETT. Will the gentleman yield for a moment?

Mr. BLAND of Indiana. Certainly.

Mr. PADGETT. I just want to call attention to one matter. The preamble states the purpose of the resolution. Ordinarily in passing a resolution we strike out the preamble. Following the resolving clause the first words of the resolution are—

That said invitation is accepted.

Now, if the preamble is stricken out, that sentence will be meaningless or without proper significance.

Mr. BLAND of Indiana. The preamble is not stricken out.

Mr. PADGETT. I know it is not stricken out now, but usually when a resolution with a preamble passes the House the preamble is stricken out the last thing when the resolution is adopted.

Mr. BLAND of Indiana. It is certainly not the intention of the committee that the preamble shall be stricken out.

Mr. PADGETT. If you followed the usual custom of striking out the preamble, then the words—

That said invitation is accepted—

would be meaningless.

Mr. BLAND of Indiana. I am glad the gentleman called attention to it, because I hope the preamble will be retained; and I know of no good reason why it should go out.

Mr. PADGETT. It has been the usual and customary practice to strike out the preamble.

Mr. BLAND of Indiana. That is done ordinarily by motion.

Mr. PADGETT. Yes; it goes out on motion.

Mr. BLAND of Indiana. Now, gentlemen of the committee, the committee also thought that it was proper to serve notice at the end of section 8 by a proviso that no indebtedness shall be incurred hereafter in excess of the amount herein authorized to be appropriated. The legal effect of that does not amount to anything, because, of course, Congress could appropriate more money if it wanted to, but it is the sense of the committee that those in charge of the fund should limit themselves to the amount appropriated. Congress serves notice on those charged with the expenditure that they do not intend to appropriate any more. We spent $1,500,000 at the Paris exposition, and we spent over $1,000,000 at San Francisco. I know of no exposition that we could invest a million dollars in that would bring in such splendid returns as the exposition we are now considering. I am in favor of historical expositions commemorating the great deeds in history, but to-day we are striving to capture some of the trade of the world to aid our industries, take care of the merchant marine, and employ the unemployed. You can not do it unless you get foreign trade, and you can not get foreign trade in some portions of the world unless you have friendly relations with the people you deal with, and that is particularly true of Latin America. The President in his letter specifically requests that this amount be appropriated, and the Secretary of State has also requested it. Mr. Chairman, I reserve the balance of my time.

Mr. LANHAM. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, as has been indicated by the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. BLAND], it is necessary that expeditious action be taken with reference to the pending resolution. The time heretofore set for the acceptance of the invitation from Brazil expired on the 30th day of September, but, owing to the fact that the House of Representatives was then in recess, an extension of time was made until the 31st day of the present month. It is for this reason that this measure is now presented under a rule, the importance of it being stressed also by communications from the President of the United States and the Secretary of State, who necessarily and naturally are interested in and informed about our foreign relations and affairs.

The provisions of this resolution have been briefly explained by the gentleman from Indiana. We have sought in the House committee to limit expenditures and so to provide in the terms of the measure that there may be no call for deficiency appropriations. It is designed to forestall the recurrence of certain contingencies that have characterized some expositions of the past. The committee has sought to eliminate extravagant salaries by proper restrictions. It has inserted also a further provision that expenditures are to be made with the approval of the Secretary of State, and to him I think we may look for the exercise of reasonable diligence in scrutinizing them.

Brazil is a country in territorial extent approximately of the same size as the United States, with a population of 25,000,000 people. It is regarded by many as the political and economic key to the whole South American Continent. It plans beginning in September of next year and continuing until some time in November a centennial exposition for the purpose of promoting through proper exhibits from the foreign countries of the world, the farming interests, the cattle industry, fisheries, mining and mechanical industries, transportation, communication, science, and fine arts, special emphasis to be placed upon forestal and manufacturing industries. Because of the nature of this exposition there are certain features of the pending measure drawn to meet specific needs in regard to these various things I have mentioned.

Now, with reference to the amount authorized to be appropriated, there appeared before the committee a representative of the State Department, and also Mr. Momsen, of Rio de Janeiro, an American citizen who has the high distinction of being the only American who has ever met the requirements for admission to the bar and been licensed to practice law in Brazil, and who gave assurance that with a million dollars, and likely for not much less than a million dollars, the United States could have an exhibit which would be creditable to this country and one comparable to those contemplated by other nations that will accept this invitation. So a lump sum, or so much thereof as may be necessary, is authorized to be appropriated, with restrictions on its expenditure, requiring the approval of the Secretary of State, in order to obviate the likelihood of any deficiency, and with restrictions with reference to salaries, which are such as may be expected to prevent a recurrence of some of the extravagant expenditures which are reported in this regard in the exposition at Paris.

The acceptance of this invitation is, it seems to me, prompted by considerations of courtesy and commerce, one largely a matter of the heart and the other largely a matter of the head. Brazil, upon our invitation, has had eight different exhibits here. In this connection, I wish to quote what the Secretary of State, Mr. Hughes, had to say in his communication of June 24, 1921, to the President:

Moreover, on the invitation of the Government of the United States, Brazil has liberally participated in the large expositions held in the United States, notably at Philadelphia, Chicago, St. Louis, and San Francisco, and it would seem that the extension and acceptance of the invitations which by the authority of Congress were issued to the Government of Brazil to participate in those expositions would involve the reciprocal acceptance by the Government of the United States of a similar invitation from the Government of Brazil to participate in the Rio de Janeiro exposition.

The people of Brazil, through their appropriations, have spent in those expositions here between three and five million dollars. As has been stated, they took their building at the Louisiana Purchase Exposition, for which they appropriated originally $600,000, and then, I understand, a deficiency appropriation afterwards, carried that building to Brazil and reerected it in Rio de Janeiro and gave it the name of the Monroe Palace, and that edifice to-day houses the House of Deputies of the Republic of Brazil, which corresponds to our National House of Representatives. Now, for the first time in our history this sister Republic of the Western Hemisphere, which, as I say, has appropriated between three and five million dollars to exhibit at our expositions in this country, asks us in good faith, with a reciprocal courtesy, to make an exhibit there, and it seems to me that every consideration of fair dealing prompts the acceptance of it. It is true that our expenditures with reference to expositions in South American countries heretofore have not approximated separately the sum of $1,000,000, but it is also true that at those expositions, with reference to the one in Ecuador, for instance, and the one in Chile, we went no further than to authorize the attendance of commissioners from this country, and that exhibits were not had. That accounts for the relatively smaller appropriations for the South American expositions which have heretofore been held.

It has been stated that Brazil is a friendly nation. Gentlemen will recall the recent visit of the President of the Republic of Brazil, Dr. Pessoa, whom we sought to honor in this Chamber.

Mr. DENISON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LANHAM. Yes.

Mr. DENISON. Can the gentleman state to the House whether or not this Government owns an embassy building in Rio de Janeiro?

Mr. LANHAM. I am not advised as to that. Perhaps some one from the Foreign Affairs Committee can give the gentleman the information.

Mr. DENISON. If it should happen that we do not have an embassy there, if the Republic of Brazil could move from this country its exposition building and reerect it in the city of Rio de Janeiro and use it, why could not any building which we may erect there be afterwards used to construct a useful and beautiful embassy for our Government in Rio de Janeiro?

Mr. LANHAM. That is a splendid idea and perhaps a practical one. The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. BLAND] has stated that there have already been certain overtures, unofficial perhaps, leading us to believe that the Brazilian Government itself might desire to purchase this structure in case our own Government does not care to use it after the exposition is over.

Mr. DENISON. I take it that the committee might be consulted by, or have occasion to consult with, the State Department on this matter in case the bill becomes a law, and I think it would be a useful suggestion if the committee could discuss that phase of it with the State Department after the bill has been enacted into law.

Mr. LANHAM. I think that is a very practical suggestion. Of course it is a matter to be dealt with after the passage of the pending resolution, but certainly it is worthy of serious thought.

Mr. Chairman, I was making reference to the friendly attitude and relationship existing between this country and the Republic of Brazil, and I wish to quote in this regard the language used by Mr. Momsen when he appeared recently before the committee. He said:

> One striking incident of her friendship is the fact that in 1876, on the occasion of our Centennial Exposition in Philadelphia, Dom Pedro II, then Emperor of Brazil, was the only foreign chief of state to attend that exposition, and that at the time when the American Navy in Philadelphia hoisted the flag in celebration of the one hundredth anniversary of our Republic, a Brazilian warship was the only foreign battleship present on that occasion. Brazilian admiration for American precedence and custom is shown by the fact that when the Republic of Brazil was proclaimed in 1889 it was made the United States of Brazil. Her constitution was modeled after ours, with a Senate and House of Deputies, her courts followed very closely the American plan, and the decisions of our Supreme Court were given unusual consideration by the Supreme Court of Brazil.

I wish also to call attention to the fact that the Brazilian Government has given a preferential tariff to this country. Quoting now from page 12 of the hearings, which contains the testimony given before the committee by Mr. Momsen, I read:

> I might mention that Brazil has granted a special preferential tariff of 20 per cent on a long list of articles to the United States, which the United States alone for a great many years has enjoyed against all other nations, enabling it to compete with the European countries who could produce these products on a cheaper basis. Last year, Brazil extended this preferential to Belgium, which everyone heartily agreed to, with the idea of trying to rebuild that country which was devastated during the war.

Then we recall also Brazil's participation in the war—and I mention these things in order to show that not only are we closely associated by reason of the fact that we are both in the Western Hemisphere, but because the ideas, the principles, and the ideals of the two countries are largely similar. To quote again from Mr. Momsen:

> I might mention Brazil's participation in the war. Shortly after our declaration of war, Brazil broke her neutrality, declared war on Germany herself, sending a fleet of destroyers to Europe to patrol the coast, supplied us with a large portion of the manganese which we used in this country and which was indispensable in the manufacture of guns and ammunition, supplied the Allies with meats, cotton, beans, and many other commodities, which prior thereto she had not even produced in sufficient quantities for her own consumption.

So I say, gentlemen, in the light of this history and this mutual relationship, in view of the fact that even the territorially small country of Uruguay has appropriated $100,000 for an exhibit at this exposition, in view of the fact that the Brazilian Government has eight times exhibited here at our request and has expended between three and five million dollars for that purpose, in the light of the establishment at our very Capital of the Pan American Union and the spirit of harmony it fosters, surely every consideration of a reciprocal courtesy demands that on the occasion of this first request we should have a proper and a creditable exhibit in Brazil.

Another consideration that urges favorable action in this matter is one that is perhaps somewhat more sordid. It is one which is very practical, and yet I am reluctant to stress specially from this standpoint the acceptance of this invitation, because I think it ought to be a matter of the heart rather than a matter of the head and the pocketbook which prompts our acceptance in good faith.

I refer now to commerce. We have emphasized in this House the matter of the necessity for markets, especially for farming and other products, for the exhibition of which this exposition in Brazil is primarily designed. The Secretary of Commerce has called our attention to the prime importance of developing foreign markets for our goods. We have been overloaded with a surplus in this country, and we have seen domestic prices depressed by reason of the fact that no markets have been available for our surplus products. The tariff bill, we are informed, has been deferred in its final enactment until we can study further this prime requisite and ascertain whether or not we can find greater opportunities for marketing our products abroad. So if we reduce it to the somewhat mercenary consideration of commerce, then we are urged to accept this invitation. For the last two years the trade balance between Brazil and this country has been in our favor, largely by reason of that friendly feeling which the people of that country entertain for the people of this country. It has been shown by the testimony of the representative of the State Department before the committee that the other nations of the earth are going to exhibit very creditably, and shall we now say to Brazil, "We do not want your commerce; we will not exhibit at your great centennial exposition, although you have done so eight times at expositions of ours"? The Secretary of State, Mr. Hughes, had some very pertinent things to say in this regard. He said:

> I am inclined to the view that in these days of commercial rivalry, when American products are seeking foreign markets and foreign Governments are zealous and active in promoting the export trade of their nationals, every opportunity should be availed of to secure to American industrial interests equal opportunity with the industrial interests of other countries to bring their products to the knowledge of foreign buyers and to obtain the advantages which may accrue from competition in this way with their foreign rivals.

Permit me also to quote a further statement from another communication from the same source:

> Another important reason why the United States Government should participate in this exposition is that it should do all in its power at the present time to assist in maintaining our commercial standing in Latin American countries during the present period of business depression. During the past few years American finance and commerce have made important gains of a permanent nature in these countries. This new business is, of course, at the present time suffering from the after effects of the war. Every effort is being made by our foreign competitors to establish themselves in Latin American countries, with the encouragement of their own Governments, and it is understood that the latter are making elaborate plans for participation in this exposition. The least this Government could do for our business interests at this exposition would be to have an exhibit there consistent with the importance of the position that we now occupy and intend to maintain in Latin American affairs.

In view of the fact that this exposition is to be devoted so largely to farming and agricultural pursuits, surely it is time that we turn aside for a moment from the expenditure of more than 90 cents of every dollar of governmental revenue for purposes of war to the 8 or 10 cents that we devote to the pursuits of peace, and try to build up our crippled commerce with these South American countries, in order that it may be commensurate with the friendly spirit of relationship that now exists between us. Shall we not authorize a million dollars, or so much thereof as may be necessary, for the pursuits of peace, to be expended under the safeguard of the approval of the Secretary of State, who urges us in our foreign affairs to look to the competition in commerce of our foreign rivals across the seas?

Should those of us who come from the agricultural sections of the country, where we are anxious to find foreign markets for our surplus crops, antagonize this measure? An expenditure is frequently economical. A man may let his insurance policy lapse and say the payment of the premium is an expenditure, that it is more economical not to make that expenditure, but if he does not make it his insurance lapses and he loses the corpus of his prospective income. And just in the same way, regarded simply from the sordid aspect of commerce, here we are putting, perhaps, a million dollars as an insurance premium upon the continuation and development of our business with the South American countries, who are linked with us in this Western Hemisphere through the Monroe doctrine and through all those interests that bind us together in a common tie. And so I say, gentlemen, that from considerations of the heart, of reciprocal courtesy and good faith, from considerations of the head, the demands of commerce and the national pocketbook, and from the consideration of the development of our trade in the relief of the producers of this Nation, we are urged to an acceptance of this invitation. [Applause.]

Mr. Chairman, I reserve the remainder of my time.

Mr. BLAND of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, I yield 20 minutes to the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. STAFFORD].

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, from the arguments advanced by the two previous speakers we would be led to believe that our diplomatic relations and our trade relations with Brazil hinge on the voting of a million dollar appropriation for a building that will be of no use to the United States—a building in which to house the exhibits for a seven weeks' exposition at Rio de Janeiro. The fact that in similar centennial expositions of Ecuador, Chile, Peru, and Argentina we did not make any exhibits, but merely appropriated some $30,000 or $40,000 to pay the expenses of a commission to represent our Government, is argument sufficient that that position is not well taken. It is proposed by this bill to spend as much money within $100,000 as was expended by our Government at the San Francisco exposition, which lasted, not seven weeks, as proposed by this exposition, but for nearly eight months. We expended at the San Francisco exposition a total of one million one hundred and odd thousand dollars—$500,000 for a building, a spacious structure—and that was a real international exposition. This exposition is proposed to open on September 7 and run to November, a period of seven weeks. Only three Governments have agreed to exhibit there—only three Governments to date. I am not very much opposed to our exhibiting; in fact, I am in hearty agreement to accept the invitation of Brazil; but the question is what is a seeming representation and exhibit on the part of our Government, when you consider that this is just a limited affair of seven weeks to celebrate a centennial of the freedom of Brazil. Never before have we seen an appropriation bill for an exposition coming to the House with such a lack of information. There is no regular estimate as to the building that is required. It is proposed by the great American Chamber of Commerce of Brazil that there should be erected by the Government of the United States a building for exhibition purposes of the dimensions of 245 by 108 feet, of steel superstructure, and with permanent foundations. Some gentleman proposes that large, spacious barn, after its construction at the expense of $500,000, should be used for an embassy building. Of course, the mere statement of the size of the building needs no further argument as to its unfitness for embassy purposes.

Mr. DENISON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STAFFORD. I have not much time, and my time is running.

Mr. DENISON. Of course, the bill does not require a steel building.

Mr. STAFFORD. This bill is predicated entirely upon the report of the American commercial representative in Brazil—the gentleman has not read the report or the hearings; I have.

Mr. DENISON. I have.

Mr. STAFFORD. Instead of accepting the space set aside by the Brazilian Government for a building to accommodate our own Government exhibits at an exposition lasting less than two months, it is proposed for the first time to depart from the policy that we have followed and erect an immensely large building to house as well all the exhibits of American manufacturers.

Mr. BLAND of Indiana. If the gentleman will yield, I beg the gentleman's pardon. There is nothing contemplated in this building that some one has said might be built for $500,000——

Mr. STAFFORD. The gentleman stated in his opening remarks that this had the support of the President of the United States, and there is nothing in his letter to warrant any statement——

Mr. BLAND of Indiana. I will ask the gentleman not to misquote me; I never said the Treasury——

Mr. STAFFORD. I do not intend to misquote the gentleman.

Mr. BLAND of Indiana. I said the Secretary of State and the President of the United States favored it.

Mr. STAFFORD. There is nothing in the hearings or in the report to warrant—will the gentleman in his own time present anything that shows the President of the United States did anything more than say that we should be represented? There is nothing in the hearings to show that he approved of a separate appropriation of $500,000 for a building. The President stands for economy.

Mr. BLAND of Indiana. Will the gentleman yield to me to answer in his time?

Mr. STAFFORD. If the gentleman will yield me additional time.

Mr. BLAND of Indiana. I can not. The gentleman told me to answer in his time. If the gentleman will look at page 1 he will find a letter of the President of the United States transmitting a letter of the Secretary of State saying it is highly important to consider and accept this invitation, and in the letter which he transmits he sets out all these facts.

Mr. STAFFORD. Accept the invitation—nothing to substantiate the statement of the chairman of the committee that the President favors this appropriation which he mentioned in his opening remarks.

Mr. LINEBERGER. I want to call the gentleman's attention to the wording of the President's letter, on page 2 of the report, where he says:

To the recommendations of this report I give my hearty approval.

And therein he includes a letter of the Secretary of State in which the $1,000,000 appropriation is specifically mentioned. This shows that the President had knowledge of the matter.

Mr. STAFFORD. I very much doubt if the Secretary of State, in sending this letter, had gone over the matter in detail. He has been too busy with other matters. The Secretary of State, in the letter which he signed, much of which has been read by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. LANHAM], uses this language:

Furthermore, adequate provisions were made by Congress for United States participation in the centennial exposition held in Quito, Ecuador, in 1909, and at Buenos Aires, Argentine Republic, in 1910. Equally favorable action in the case of the Rio de Janeiro Exposition would seem to be called for.

What was our policy in the expositions referred to in Equador and Argentina? Nothing more than the sending of a delegation to represent the United States and also sending some works of art for exhibition at those expositions. Now, if we are going, whenever a centenary occurs in the annals of the history of these South American Republics—and there are many of them—and when an invitation is received to make an exhibit at an exposition in honor of the occasion, to adopt a policy to spend as much money as we have spent at expositions held at different times in this country, I think we are going to be carried far afield in the expenditure of money. There are four tracts of land to be used in this exposition—one for Government buildings, where a small space was reserved for the United States Government to simply erect a Government building for governmental purposes exclusively. But these men in Brazil, who are not charged with the control of the purse strings of the Government, send up here a request that they want a building 245 by 108 feet for the housing of all the exhibits of American concerns, when the Government of Brazil is going to provide adequate housing facilities for the exhibits not only of America but of all countries. Their proposal, if you will examine the hearings, is to erect a permanent building of steel and stone construction not required by the occasion or by the requirements of American exhibitors.

Mr. WALSH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STAFFORD. I yield.

Mr. WALSH. I make the point of order there is no quorum present.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Massachusetts makes the point of order that there is no quorum present, and evidently no quorum is present.

Mr. STAFFORD. I did not yield to the gentleman from Massachusetts for that purpose.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will call the roll.

Thereupon the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. HUSTED, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee, having under consideration the resolution (S. J. Res. 114) accepting the invitation of the Republic of Brazil to take part in the international exposition to be held in Rio de Janeiro in 1922, and finding itself without a quorum, he had directed the roll to be called, whereupon 172 gentlemen answered to their names, a quorum, and he presented a list of the absentees to be entered in the Journal.

The SPEAKER. One hundred and seventy-two gentlemen—a quorum—have answered to their names. The names of the absentees will be published in the Journal. The committee will resume its session.

Thereupon the committee resumed its session.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. STAFFORD] is recognized for 11 minutes.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, the question before the committee is whether we should launch into a departure, so far as concerns expositions to be held in connection with the centenaries of South American Republics, celebrating the one hundredth anniversary of their independence. So far as concerns the centenary celebrations of Ecuador, Chili, Peru, and Argentina, all that the United States Government did was to vote an appropriation of $40,000 or $50,000 for the expenses of a commission.

Mr. BLAND of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STAFFORD. Not at present. Here it is proposed to authorize the expenditure of a million dollars. And for what? For a large building, 248 by 108 feet, in which to house the exhibits of American manufacturers, when the Brazilian Government is going to provide ample space for the exhibits not only of American manufacturers but those of all countries. What is more, it is to be a two-story building, of steel construction, on private land. Permit me to read to you the only report upon which this estimate is based, that from Mr. W. L. Schurz, our American commercial attaché in Rio de Janeiro:

Dimensions space reserved for United States Government building exhibit, 245 by 108 feet. Largest and best location available. * * * Foundation Co. estimates cost of two-story building and equipment $500,000. * * * Part of land reserved owned by individuals, who offer use of lot on condition that we put in permanent foundation and steel frame. Agree to pay difference between cost of temporary and permanent material. American Chamber of Commerce discussed plans for acquiring exhibition buildings as permanent buildings for club consulate headquarters of chamber. American Chamber of Commrece requests I recommend total appropriation of $1,000,000, all expenses of exhibit, including $100,000 toward cost of monument to be given Brazil.

We hear so much of economy these days, and here is the time when you have the chance to economize. You can save several hundred thousand dollars to the Treasury of the United States, several hundred thousand dollars, and still be recognizing Brazil in a fitting manner becoming this great Government. We should not launch upon a policy which, so far as estimates are concerned, is urged only by the American commercial attaché.

At the Paris exposition the cost of our Government building was only $500,000. That was an eight-months' international exposition. This one begins on September 7 and runs to November, a seven-weeks' exposition, and we are called upon in these piping times of economy to vote $1,000,000—$500,000 for a steel structure building on private land, to be turned over to the private owners after it is used.

Mr. BLAND of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STAFFORD. I can not yield now.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman declines to yield.

Mr. STAFFORD. To be turned over to the private owners or to permit arrangements with them for its transfer under certain conditions; and $100,000 for a monument to be given to the Brazilian Government. Perhaps it may cost $100,000 for our Government exhibit. Here perhaps as much as $300,000 may be expended; $300,000 for expenses of the commissioners and the Government clerks in waiting at the exposition.

Oh, do you know who, according to the hearings, were in favor of this? The hearings were very brief. Well, there was this commercial attaché, on whose estimates the Secretary of State bases his recommendation. In addition to this was Mr. Richard B. Momsen, formerly of Milwaukee, who some years ago was secretary to one of my colleagues from Wisconsin, a gentleman who later took a position as consul in Brazil. A bright young man who naturally is enthusiastic as to this venture. The third person who urges it is Mr. D. C. Collier, a distinguished Californian, who tells us that if we appropriate this money he will be a candidate for the position of director general that will pay $15,000——

Mr. BLAND of Indiana. Between $10,000 and $15,000.

Mr. STAFFORD. No. The language of the resolution is—

That no person appointed or employed by virtue of the provisions of this act shall receive a greater salary than $15,000 per annum, and not more than one person shall receive a salary in excess of $10,000 per annum.

Taking the language as it is, I will warrant that he will receive the maximum of $15,000. Then these other five additional Representatives are to receive $7,500 each. The Senate provided for only three, thinking that the two additional could perform the social duties down there without pay. Now, because Brazil happens to have expended $600,000 at the St. Louis Exposition and has spent some other hundreds of thousands of dollars at real international expositions lasting for months and months we are called upon for the first time to adopt a different policy from what we took in the cases of Argentina, Ecuador, Peru, and Chile, and instead of merely voting $40,000 or $50,000 for the expenses of a delegation to represent our Government at their centennial expositions, we are now going to vote to authorize a million dollars, of which $100,000 is to be for a monument to be donated and $500,000 is to be for a two-story building of structural steel and of ornate stone construction, according to the hearings, that is to be left there for private use after the seven weeks' great international exposition in Brazil concludes. I ask you, is that consistent with a policy of economy under existing conditions? The country is clamoring that the expenses of the Government should be curtailed. What is the reasonable thing to do? Of course, we want some representation down there. We want to accept the invitation of Brazil. We have never declined to accept the invitations of these other South American countries to participate in similar celebrations; but as a matter of policy, can we vote an appropriation for a building, as much as was expended in San Francisco? Why, all we expended in San Francisco for a building was $500,000, and the total expenditure at San Francisco for the entire seven or eight months of the exposition was only $1,174,000. Are we not going a little bit wild in our expenditures? In Paris we spent only $500,000 for a building, and our total expenditure for that eight months' exposition was $1,400,000, of which $593,000 was for salaries.

Let us be a little bit reasonable. Let us get our bearings. Of course we want to retain the friendship of Brazil. Of course we want to retain the friendship of all the South American countries; but if we provide for a reasonable Government building, where our Government exhibits may be properly housed, if we adopt a policy under which our American exhibitors can place their exhibits in the building to be erected by Brazil, rather than to erect a building exclusively for American manufactures, are we not going, even then, pretty far? How can we justify before the eyes of the country the voting of $1,000,000 or the authorization of $1,000,000, when $100,000 of it is for a monument to be turned over to Brazil and $500,000 for a two-story building of steel and stone construction? The building that we erected in San Francisco was not a two-story building. Most of the Members here were at the San Francisco exposition. The building there was merely a one-story structure. Just because the commercial attaché, who reflects perhaps the wanderlust of some of these commercial representatives of the Government, wishes to make a very ostentatious showing down there at this exposition of seven weeks from September 7 next to November, we should not be called upon to vote money so freely and without any warrant, as is proposed by this bill. [Applause.]

Mr. Chairman, I reserve the remainder of my time.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wisconsin reserves one minute.

Mr. BLAND of Indiana. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. LITTLE].

Mr. LITTLE. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. STAFFORD] very aptly observed that the question now is whether we shall make a radical change in our attitude toward South America. Between the Rio Grande and Puntas Arenas are the richest undeveloped natural resources in the world. There is no place on earth where the United States has such a chance by a little advertising to cement the friendship of a people and open up a line of business that will bring back to us such a return of untold wealth. I am in favor of making a radical change in our attitude toward the South American countries and am in favor of going after that business. [Applause.] The time has come, gentleman, when we ought to quit wasting our money on purely idle expenditures to send diplomats to foreign countries for mere social and ornamental purposes and when we ought to be able to present a plan of expenditure that will bring something back for it. Twenty-five or thirty years ago Gov. Tom Osborne, of Kansas, had been for four or eight years minister to Brazil. A young man from our State was appointed to the diplomatic service elsewhere, and he went down to see old Tom and asked him, "What did you have to do?" Gov. Tom said, "Not a thing." He used another little word in there, but in view of recent occurrences I will not put it in. [Laughter.] The young man asked him again, and he said,

"Not a thing." I think it is time, gentlemen, that our representatives to a South American Republic like Brazil, the next to the biggest Republic in America, should have something to do. Right now Brazilian opportunity is knocking at our door. Rio de Janeiro simply asks reciprocity for the millions they expended when we made a similar call on them. The ships rotting in our harbors could readily establish a line to Brazil, to continue until this world's exhibition closes. We pay men $10,000 a year and more who are mentally overtaxed if they count our mighty navies once a year—mere depositories for squandered salaries. Why not start something, gentlemen, that has a chance to win and send these ships for a time on round the Horn to Valparaiso, Callao, Guayaquil, Panama, and home again? We could hardly spend much more than we are losing now, and we might achieve incomparable and unsurpassed results of conquering the commerce of a continent. Here is a chance to present to the people of Brazil the resources of this country which are at hand to supply all their necessities, a chance to develop trade and to advertise to our biggest sister Republic the vast mercantile and manufacturing enterprises, which should be transforming and shipping to the four quarters of the globe our mining, stock, and farm products. "Let's go!"

The world's fair at Chicago and the world's fair at St. Louis did more to advertise this country than any thousand books that were ever written about it. They gave the people of the world a better idea of what we could do, and gave us a better idea of the people of the world whose trade we want here than we could have secured in any other way. Similar results will be attained if we go to Brazil and make a good advertisement there.

Mr. KNUTSON. Is it not a fact that we spent $1,400,000 at Paris, and that the exposition at Rio de Janeiro offers to us an infinitely better opportunity to enlarge our trade?

Mr. LITTLE. Certainly. Every dollar that we sent to Paris was as much wasted as if it had been poured into the ocean, as far as practical results were concerned. Every dollar that we send to South America will bring us back 1,000 companions if it is intelligently used. If you went to the world's fair at St. Louis, you saw that every country represented there exhibited to you something that challenged your attention to its resources and opportunities. That is what we must do in Brazil. We have never done it. We need a radical change in that regard. We need to reach out and get in touch with them. We need to make them see that we are their friends, that they can do business with us, and that there is something in it. I wish we would maintain a permanent exhibit at the capital of each Spanish-American Republic. That would pay in dollars and in cents. If you went to the world's fair at St. Louis, you saw that the most magnificent feature of all that grand exhibition was the German Empire's wonderful display of all its people could do and all it had to offer the world for a price. The Kaiser spent millions of dollars there to show the people of this country what they had in Germany that we could use, and they built up more trade out of it than any other country in the world has ever built up with another nation in the same length of time. Advertising pays. Getting in touch with your neighbors and customers pays. We could not spend a million dollars better than in going to Brazil and showing its people all that our mines and factories and merchants and farms can furnish them at reasonable rates, and in convincing them that here they would find the friendliest market, the squarest deal, and the best customers for what they have to sell, and to teach them to come and buy from us and for us to go and sell to them as this opportunity affords. I hope that we will build a $100,000 monument there. I hope we will glowingly picture on it America's invitation to them to come here and get acquainted with us, and I pray it may stand there a thousand years to tell the people of Brazil that Americans are interested in them and want to do business with them. [Applause.]

Mr. LANHAM. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. DAVIS] such time as he may desire.

Mr. DAVIS of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen, no country has been more consistently and cordially friendly toward the United States than has Brazil. In establishing their Republic and adopting a constitution, Brazil very closely followed the Constitution and form of government of the United States. Brazil has manifested her friendship and admiration for us in many ways. For instance, she remained neutral with respect to the World War until the United States declared war, when she promptly followed suit, taking her place beside the United States, as did most of the other South American Republics. Brazil has accepted the invitation of the United States to participate in eight different American expositions, at an aggregate cost of more than $3,000,000. Now that Brazil, the largest republic in South America, has invited our Government to participate in an international exposition to be held in Rio de Janeiro for the purpose of commemorating the centenary of the independence of Brazil it occurs to me that we should accept the invitation and make provisions for an appropriate exhibit.

When President Monroe very properly enunciated his famous "Monroe doctrine," now universally recognized and respected, we took the young republics of South America and Central America under our paternal care and protection. They have since been our friends, and it is highly important from political and military standpoints, as well as from a commercial standpoint, for us to maintain friendly relations with all the republics of South and Central America. This is all the more important, in view of the fact that by deserting our allies in making peace we have at least cooled the ardor and friendship of the European nations.

However, it is useless to undertake to maintain cordial relations with the South American Republics and to hope to continue trade relations and friendly intercourse with them if we are to build such a high tariff wall around this country that our South American friends will be unable to trade with us. They can not and will not buy our surplus products unless we will and can buy some of their surplus products. They produce many commodities which we need, and we produce and manufacture many commodities which they need. However, if we are to pursue the policy embodied in the Fordney tariff bill, their trade will all turn to Europe. Our trade with South America should be fostered instead of destroyed. Until recently our trade balance with South America was in our favor, but it is being materially reduced by the so-called emergency tariff law and by the prospect of the passage of the Fordney tariff bill. The South American countries are deeply resenting a policy of this kind on the part of the United States, as has been manifested in numerous cases. Along that line I submit a letter received from one of my constituents inclosing a letter from a large firm of exporters inclosing memoranda, all of which are self-explanatory, to wit:

TULLAHOMA, TENN., October 5, 1921.

Hon. EWIN L. DAVIS,
Member of Congress, Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. DAVIS: We are inclosing herein a copy of a letter from our export representatives, W. J. Kingsland & Co. (Inc.), of New York.

The writer knows from his personal visit to Argentina, Uruguay, and other countries that W. J. Kingsland & Co. are very reliable, conservative, and a long-established firm in these and other countries. So we feel sure that the views reflected by their representative is expressive of their true feelings and the conditions in Argentina, so we respectfully call your attention to same. When conditions are normal we ship quite an amount of goods to Argentina, Uruguay, South Africa, Australia, and other foreign countries, and the development of this business is dependent to a great extent upon the feeling in these various countries, which is sometimes very strongly aroused by legislation in the United States regarding tariffs against their goods, etc. We merely offer this for your consideration, and are not trying to tell you just what is the best policy, as you, doubtless, have more and better information than we have; but we, along with other exporters, would like to see the United States hold and develop the foreign trade which we feel is justly ours when we go after it without hindrance or opposition aroused by Government policy.

The writer saw a wonderful field for many classes of American goods in these South American countries in 1917, and knows that by friendly cooperation and good Government policy the United States can derive great benefits from this territory.

With kindest regards, we are,
Very truly,

CAMPBELL & DANN MFG. CO.,

GENTLEMEN: We beg to inclose herewith extract of cable from the Argentina-American Chamber of Commerce, as well as extract of letter from Mr. Eberson, received by last mail, which we thought would be of general interest to you.

Yours, very truly,

CABLE MEMORANDUM FROM THE ARGENTINE-AMERICAN CHAMBER OF COMMERCE, BUENOS AIRES.

General situation: The high price of the dollar coupled with the high tariff policy of the United States, is furnishing a basis for regular and strong attacks on American business in Argentina. A small section of the press is constantly occupying itself with what it terms "The downfall of American commerce in Argentina."

The alleged unfriendly customs policy of the United States is also furnishing an opportunity for these assaults. Such writers assume that American business men here will find further trade impossible as a result of such legislation as the Fordney law.

To enable American business to continue to expand in Argentina, La Nacion, which is usually friendly to American interests, states that the following factors are of vital importance: First, the organization of channels for complete trade information; second, the study of economic conditions; third, the facilitation of credits; and fourth, a friendly customs policy which will eliminate risks and serious variations in exchange rates.

EXTRACT OF LETTER FROM MR EBERSON, BUENOS AIRES, REFERRING TO VISIT TO ROSARIO.

I recently visited Rosario. There is little to report concerning conditions there that are any different from here. Everybody has the same complaint to make and everything American is tabooed. You are received with scant courtesy, and only the many years' relationship we have had gives us a little more polite treatment (although with apparent irony everywhere).

The feeling is to do Americans and their interests in every way possible that is short of murder. Goods, though, are getting short, and things will change, but words are just wasted in an effort to induce business at this time for the States. Little by little this will be overcome by dire necessity, but meanwhile the animosity shown Americans is enough to make one swear, and no one can appreciate the present conditions unless on the spot.

The frame of mind of the citizens of Argentina is typical of the attitude of the citizens of other South American Republics. They treat the tariff legislation referred to as not only destructive of their trade with the United States, but also as a manifestation of hostility.

At this point I wish to insert in the RECORD a letter from the Casey-Hedges Co., of Chattanooga, Tenn., explaining the effect of the Fordney tariff bill upon our trade with Cuba:

CHATTANOOGA, TENN., October 19, 1921.

Hon. EDWIN L. DAVIS,
The House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

DEAR CONGRESSMAN DAVIS: As manufacturers exporting normally about 40 per cent of the products of both our boiler shop and gray-iron foundry to the island of Cuba, we are more than apprehensive at the tremendous increase proposed in duty on sugar shipped from the island of Cuba into the United States, and as Cuba is a protégé of the United States, we feel that no legislation should be passed that would in any way stifle the marketing in a profitable manner of her largest source of income, which, as you are aware, is sugar.

At least 90 per cent of the heavy sugar and other machinery that was previously furnished by England, France, and Germany (up until a few years ago) is now exported from the United States, which is loaded in cars in the yards of the respective American manufacturers and goes through direct in original cars to all points on the island of Cuba via the Flagler ferry system from Key West, with daily sailings from Key West.

We understand that the Fordney bill proposes to increase the tariff rate on Cuban sugars not less than 60 per cent, which will make a material increase in the cost of sugar to every American household.

Eliminating any personal, selfish reasons against the proposed increase, our company has approximately $125,000 outstanding on the island of Cuba, and not a single one of our customers can raise sufficient ready cash to pay the interest on these obligations. In consequence, we feel that the sugar tariff should be put back where it was previous to the passage of the emergency bill, viz, 1 cent for Cuba.

Asking that yourself and associates kindly give these recommendations extraordinary consideration, we are, with continued regards,

Very sincerely, yours,

THE CASEY-HEDGES CO.,
T. H. JOHNSON, General Manager.

It is needless to state that the Cuban Government and people are bitterly protesting against the high tariffs imposed by the Fordney bill in so far as it affects Cuba.

It is a matter of common knowledge that our good friend Canada, one of our very best customers, is likewise bitterly protesting against the Fordney tariff bill.

The policy of the Fordney tariff bill is to increase our trade by sandbagging our customers. I do not subscribe to any such doctrine, and it is quite evident that our customers and late friends do not appreciate such a policy.

Mr. LANHAM. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. SWANK].

Mr. SWANK. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Oklahoma?

There was no objection.

Mr. SWANK. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, I believe in an economical administration of the affairs of government, and the people are demanding economy as never before, but they do not ask unwise economy. They want the products of America advertised and demand access to the markets of the world. They are overburdened with taxes, and in some sections, where they felt the blight of the boll weevil, many are wondering where they will get the money with which to pay their taxes. My record on economy will compare favorably, I think, during this session of Congress, with that of any other Member. We must cultivate friendly relations with the other nations of the world and not lose any of our friends. The products of our farms and factories are more than we consume, and we must find an outlet for these goods and create greater markets. We can not isolate ourselves from the other nations if we continue our leadership in the affairs of the world. Isolation leads to barbarism and cooperation to civilization and progress. Large sums of money are contributed and expended through the churches of this country for the purpose of sending missionaries to foreign lands to spread the doctrine of Christianity among other people, and it is money well spent. It enlarges the influence of the church. These missionaries do not isolate themselves at home, but brave the dangers of the savage and disease to carry out their work. By thus enlarging the sphere of their activities they increase the usefulness of the church and bring good cheer and better living to many places which otherwise would be left alone to suffer and advance further in their idolatry and barbarism. These churches also spend large sums of money to maintain schools in these foreign fields, cultivate the minds and morals of these people, and teach them our methods of living. They are doing a wonderful work, not alone for the church but for their Government as well.

I am supporting this bill because I believe it means much good for the United States. Brazil is the largest country in South America and the most important, politically and economically. It has an area about the same as our own country. Its population is about 30,500,000 and it is a country with great possibilities for themselves and our own people as well. Our Constitution is the basis for their fundamental law and they have always been our friends. Soon after we entered the World War Brazil declared war on Germany and sent battleships to Europe. They are great believers in the Monroe doctrine and appreciate our assistance to establish their own form of government. We can not afford to offend this great country when they have gone out of their way to cultivate our friendship. Our export trade with Brazil is growing all the time, and for the years from 1911 to 1920 is as follows:

1911	$28, 853, 819
1912	40, 591, 519
1913	39, 901, 203
1914	23, 275, 894
1915	33, 952, 551
1916	47, 669, 050
1917	66, 157, 952
1918	57, 391, 417
1919	114, 696, 309
1920	156, 740, 365

The principal articles of export from the United States to Brazil for the calendar year 1920 are as follows:

Agricultural implements	$1, 268, 357
Brass plates, sheets, etc	696, 320
Corn, corn meal, flour, and cereal preparations	76, 086
Wheat and wheat flour	16, 597, 974

Copper	1, 747, 972
Manufactures of cotton	5, 082, 705

Manufactures of wool	437, 271
Iron and steel	43, 378, 131

The Committee on Industrial Arts and Expositions has conducted hearings, and the amended bill was reported out unanimously. We heard the author of the bill [Mr. LINEBERGER], who has visited extensively in the countries of South and Central America. We also heard other men who had an extensive acquaintance in that country, as well as a representative of the Department of State of our own country. The committee carefully considered the bill and thought it should pass as amended. At the end of section 2 the committee inserted in the original bill the following:

Provided, That the executive department of the Government may designate officials or employees of their respective departments for service in connection with said commission, but no such official or employee so designated shall receive a salary in excess of the amount which he has been receiving in the department where employed, plus such reasonable, additional allowance for expenses not now authorized by law as may be deemed proper by the Secretary of State in view of the fact that service is to be performed in a foreign country: Provided further, That no person appointed or employed by virtue of the provisions of this act shall receive a greater salary than $15,000 per annum, and not more than one person shall receive a salary in excess of $10,000 per annum, and not more than three persons shall receive salaries in excess of $7,500 per annum.

The committee also inserted a provision at the end of section 9 as follows:

Provided, That no indebtedness shall be incurred hereunder in excess of said amount herein authorized to be appropriated. This is notice to the departments that Congress expects all expenses of this exposition to be paid from this appropriation and will not stand for a deficiency appropriation.

Mr. Chairman, I am not for the passage of this bill simply for the reason that the Department of State and the President want it enacted, but, like the other members of the committee, I think that it would be very unwise at this time for the bill to be defeated. We all have our own opinions, and I give every person this right as I exercise myself at all time. I find no fault with any person who thinks he should not support this bill just because the committee recommended the same. I am always willing and glad to cooperate with the President and the departments in the enactment of good and useful measures. I think that a failure to pass this bill would be a false economy. Its passage means much to our Government, our people, and will be worth many times the cost. When we first met to consider the bill some of us thought that $1,000,000 was too much and that we should get along with a less amount, but if we were going to make an appropriation for this exposition we did not want the amount stinted. The original bill left the fixing of the salaries of the commissioners to the Secretary of State. We thought the amounts should be fixed in the bill. I believe the committee realizes the fact that the commissioner general will naturally be required to spend a lot of money from his own pocket. He will be a special representative of the Department of State of this Republic and will be received as such in the Republic of Brazil. The salary will run but a short time.

At the Louisiana Purchase Exposition the Republic of Brazil spent $600,000, and she has appropriated something like $2,500,000 to be represented in the United States at our various expositions. She did this for the purpose of cultivating closer relations with us, to bind the ties of friendship more closely, and for the further purpose of advertising her products and increasing her trade.

This bill will do much good in this country in addition to strengthening our relations with Brazil. Most of the money appropriated will be spent in this country, and we certainly need more in the country at this time. It will assist in creating a market for our products, will help to furnish labor for some of our people as well as aiding the work of the factory and the shop. The bill authorizes the Secretary of Agriculture to collect and prepare suitable specimens of the agricultural and forestal products of the several States of the Union for exhibition at the exposition. This will show the people of Brazil our leading agricultural products and will stimulate the market there for these products. The Secretary of the Interior is authorized to collect and prepare an exhibit of the mining industry of the United States, and that will advertise the products of our mines. The other great nations of the world will be there with suitable exhibits, and we should be surpassed by none, especially at a time when there is a great race for the markets of South America as well as a greater cultivation of their friendship.

Yes, Mr. Chairman, I am for economy, but will not vote to stint appropriations that will assist greatly in developing our trade. I believe in liberal appropriations for the Departments of Agriculture and Commerce, as I do for good roads. Who would oppose an appropriation for good roads on account of economy?

The Department of Agriculture is the department of the farmers and producers of the country. Some time ago we passed the budget bill and made an appropriation of $225,000 for the purpose of administering the law. It carried a large appropriation, but we thought it best for the Government and also thought that much money would be saved by the enactment of the law and a proper administration of the same. That bill was not a political measure, and on the final vote 344 Members voted for the bill, 9 against its passage, and 76 not voting. I do not believe any Member of Congress would have voted for the budget bill just for the purpose of giving some politician a job, but I believe they voted for the bill as a measure of economy.

The first bill I introduced when this session of Congress convened April 11 was the farmers' warehouse bill, which carried an appropriation of $100,000,000. Farming is the basic industry in this Republic, and when it is benefited all the people feel the results. Much can be done to stimulate agriculture. Mr. Chairman, we can live without factories and even without railroads, but we can not survive without the necessities of life, which come from the farm. We could well afford to clip $100,000,000 from that $500,000,000 appropriation to the railroads, which passed the House a short time ago, and use that amount for the purpose of building these warehouses I mention and authorize and direct the Federal reserve banking board to loan money on the warehouse receipts. Some Members might vote against such a bill by reason of economy, but I will always vote for the interests of agriculture as I see the right. While this warehouse bill carries an appropriation of $100,000,000, it is indorsed by more than 125 farmer organizations in my State of Oklahoma, by the president of the Farmers' Union in Oklahoma, and also by the president of the union in the State of Arkansas. It also has the indorsement of many professional men who see the need of something to be done for this greatest of all enterprises. Some measures should not be opposed on the grounds of economy, and the bill now under consideration is one of that nature. While I can not oppose this bill from the standpoint of economy, neither will I oppose it because the administration, which is different politically from the party to which I belong, desires its passage. When the administration is right, then I will support its measures and always hope for success to be the crowning achievement in public as well as private life. This is not a political question, but one for the judgment of the House and the individual Members.

This measure if enacted into law will do a great deal for agriculture and the business interests of the country, and we must at all times look after our interests in foreign countries. With our foreign relations reestablished, the channels of commerce opened abroad, and the freight rates reduced to a reasonable basis, we will then see a new era of prosperity. Mr. Chairman, permit me here to digress for a moment to say that the most pressing need in this country at this time is a reduction in our freight rates. It is impossible for business to rehabilitate with the excessive freight rates now in force. When the railroads charge more for freight than the selling price of the shipment amounts to, then something is wrong. The Interstate Commerce Commission should reduce the rates, and reduce them now. If the commission refuses to act, then Congress should take charge of the matter at once. The Interstate Commerce Commission is a creature of Congress and subject to its orders. Gentlemen of the committee, Congress should see that something is done and not delay. It lies within the power of Congress. If freight rates were reduced to a reasonable extent we would see the products of the farm moving, the railroads would be loaded with freight, the factory and shop would begin to hum with work and activity, work would be ready for the unemployed, and prosperity and happiness would again reign in this land. The farmers, laborers, business people, and all the public would realize that Congress is a potent body, able to function and to control to the fullest extent the creatures of its powers. [Applause.]

Mr. LANHAM. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. PARKS].

Mr. PARKS of Arkansas. Mr. Chairman, I desire to use the few minutes allotted me to voice my protest against the unnecessary expenditure of $1,000,000 for an exhibit at the international centennial celebration to be held at Rio de Janeiro some time in 1922.

I recognize that the quickest way to become unpopular in this House is to oppose the appropriation of the public money. However much I am opposed to this measure, and how thorough is my conviction that it is wrong to spend $1,000,000 in this way, still when I sit under the spell of the delightful oratory of the lovable gentleman from Texas [Mr. LANHAM] I feel like the king of old when he said "Almost thou persuadest me." But when I recall the watchword of America, and the battle cry of the world is "economy," I can not give my consent to the passage of this bill that will waste $1,000,000 of the country's money on a frolic in South America.

It is significant that the President of the United States is moved to ask Congress to spend this money and is supported in his request by the United States Chamber of Commerce, and I call your attention to the fact that this United States Chamber of Commerce is the same organization that arrogated to itself the right of leadership in bitter opposition to a bill providing for adjusted compensation for ex-service men, and while both the President and the Chamber of Commerce balked at spending money to the end that recognition of the services of our soldiers might be brought about, still they both urge Congress to appropriate $1,000,000 for a useless purpose.

The principal argument urged in favor of the passage of this bill is that we may advertise our timber, agricultural, fisheries, and mining interests. In fact, whatever offense is committed in the waste of the public money is always laid at the feet of the farmer.

It is a well known fact that our forests have become so depleted that the situation is alarming and we are now compelled to go to Canada to get timber to supply the paper manufacturers and other users of timber. Then why advertise it?

Is it to make the demand for coal greater that the price may be higher to the consumer that we want to advertise our minerals?

Do we desire to make an exhibit there that will make the demand for fish greater when recently the testimony given before one of the committees of this House showed that the depletion in the supply of our fish, both shell and finny, is so great that the Government must take measures immediately, not only to protect the available supply, but to supplement it by restocking the waters to preserve a valuable article of food?

The Democrats of this House might with some consistency, though without justification, support this measure, but surely no Republican can advocate advertising our resources and inviting the trade of any foreign country, and be consistent. When we spend a million dollars of the people's money inviting Brazil to buy our products they can not forget the fact that the Republicans of this House have recently passed a tariff bill that if enacted into law will exclude from our markets the products of the outside world. In one breath we invite Brazil to buy from us, and in the next breath we say to them that we will not buy from her. One minute we hand to Brazil a million-dollar invitation to come and buy of us, and the next we build a tariff wall around this country that forbids them to sell to us.

The gentleman from Michigan [Mr. FORDNEY] recently boasted from the floor of this House that he cared nothing for the foreign market—that he desired only to keep the home market, and if that be true then why should we spend a million dollars to advertise our products in South America in a bid for foreign markets? The truth about the whole matter is that the question of advertising is secondary. If we really wanted to advertise our products, and if we desired to show the rest of the world that we desired friendly relations with them, the best way to do it would be to enact such low tariff legislation that the markets of the world would be open to the American buyer as well as to the American seller.

Mr. BLAND of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PARKS of Arkansas. With pleasure.

Mr. BLAND of Indiana. The gentleman knows that most of the products produced by Brazil we can not produce and most of them are on the free list, and also he knows the fact that that country gives a 20 per cent preferential tariff on the things that we ship them. Does the gentleman not think that we ought to cultivate that friendly feeling?

Mr. PARKS of Arkansas. And because of that 20 per cent preferential tariff you want to go into the pockets of the American people and take $1,000,000 to be spent down there, mostly in high salaries.

I want to call the attention of the gentleman who has just preceded me, who comes from the great Empire State of the South—Texas—to the fact that in supporting this bill he advocates the payment of salaries of $15,000 and $10,000 and $7,500 per annum to those who shall be selected to represent us at this centennial celebration, while the governor of his great State serves for a salary of $4,000 a year; the governor and the chief justice of my State are willing to serve for $4,000 a year and stand the expense of a campaign; the judges of the Federal court, the United States Senators and Congressmen draw no more salary for their services than the cheapest man to be hired at this exposition. The Chief Justice of the Supreme Court of the United States and the members of the President's Cabinet receive a salary of $12,000 a year only and deem it sufficient. But when the Congress of the United States creates an office to be filled by appointment it provides for a salary of $15,000 per annum.

A few days ago a gentleman stood here and asked, "What is a million dollars?" and that seems to be the spirit that pervades the atmosphere of this House when we begin to spend the people's money. It is true a million dollars is nothing to you gentlemen who have grown accustomed to spending a billion dollars without batting an eye, but to the overburdened taxpayer of this country a million dollars is worth saving.

This Congress was called together in extraordinary session to provide some relief from the iniquitous war-time tax measure under which we are now living. For eight months we have been here doing worse than nothing, creating jobs at enormous salaries and adding to the burden of the people, and yet no measure has been passed for the relief of the taxpayer. We are participating in a saturnalia of spending, and this Congress will go down in history as the greatest spenders ever assembled under the dome of the Capitol.

I sat appalled and was one of 15 who voted against an appropriation of half a billion dollars to build the greatest Navy that ever floated upon the sea, and that at a time of profound peace and when every other great nation of the world was crushed by an indebtedness and by the devastation of a terrible war that made it impossible for them to engage in another one for a generation to come. Not satisfied with that, you turned again to the Treasury and took $75,000,000 and gave it to the Shipping Board, that had already spent more than $3,000,000,000 of the people's money, with little to show for it. And you gentlemen on the other side of the aisle, with an overwhelming majority, claiming to have been elected on a platform of economy, created jobs in this Shipping Board, to be filled by appointment, with salaries of $35,000 per annum.

You did this in the face of the testimony of the chairman of the Shipping Board that he did not know whether the Shipping Board would ever be profitable or not. I say to you, Mr. Chairman, that if we must blindly appropriate, not millions but billions of dollars for the maintenance of the Shipping Board, that we had better take these ships out to sea and sink them and go out of the shipping business forever.

I might in normal times make no complaint about the spending of a million dollars for a "show" in Brazil, but we must remember that we owe over $25,000,000,000 that the American people must pay—that the ultimate consumer must pay. With this gigantic debt hanging over us like a pall, I marvel that men who come here from the people are willing to fritter away a million dollars of the people's money on a social function in South America under the plea of international courtesy.

Surely after we engaged in a war for the sole purpose of keeping the torch of civilization burning in the rest of the world, when we have given to the world's cause our boys and our billions, when we have said to the rest of the world through the Monroe doctrine that we are willing to give our men and our resources in order to keep inviolate the boundaries of the South American countries, it is not now necessary to give a million dollars to convince them of our friendship. It has been urged here that this must be done in order to continue on friendly terms with Brazil. Mr. Chairman, if a million dollars is the price of Brazil's friendship, I want to say to you that I am quite willing that Brazil may be dropped from our calling list. If America has not already given enough to the world to insure us the friendship of all nations, then we are not able to do it by the spending of more money.

No man can say that this extravagance will bring to the people generally any return in dollars and cents. Of course when we have taxed our people to build a half million dollar house on land that we must lease at a high price, we will have a splendid palace in which to house and exhibit the products of the automobile manufacturers, the products of the International Harvester Co., the packers, and other multimillionaire manufacturers who may desire to exhibit their wares at the expense of the taxpayer; but I am certain there will not be a corresponding return to the taxpayer.

And again, Mr. Chairman, I am inclined to think that when we levy a tax for any purpose we should have constitutional sanction for it. Nowhere in that sacred instrument do we find that Congress is authorized to levy a tax to bring in a fund to be spent on a "party" in Brazil or elsewhere; or that we can spend $15,000 per annum for the salary of a commissioner to hobnob with the nabobs of Brazil in the name of the people. But what is to be expected of this "economical" Congress which, with a blare of trumpets, marches forth in a pretended defense of the rights of the taxpayer, holding aloft with one hand a banner inscribed "economy" and with the other reaching down into the Treasury of the United States and taking out $500,000,000 of the people's money and turning it over to the railroads of the country—and this, too, at a time when millions of men were unemployed, when hunger and want stalked abroad like grim specters, when the laborers of every class were deeply concerned about the continued high cost of living, when the taxpayers from every section of the United States were lifting their voices in unison to Congress in an appeal for relief? You are answering their cries to-day by placing upon their backs the additional burden of a million-dollar donation to Brazil.

There is an old, old adage that if you save the pennies the dollars will take care of themselves, and I say to this House if you will save the millions the billions will take care of themselves. It is easy to spend somebody else's money, but if you gentlemen had seen the heroic struggle the average man in my State has made to bear his part of the burdens placed upon him by this terrible war; if you had gone into his home with him and enjoyed his hospitality; if you had seen him as he was compelled to send his children into the field to work instead of into the schoolroom to be prepared for the battle of life; if you had seen him deny his family many of the comforts of life that he might meet the demands and discharge the obligations that have been put upon him by those who are authorized to levy the national tax and spend the Nation's money as I have, his plea for economy and for relief would strike a responsive chord in every breast here, and this "show" in South America would be forgotten.

It may be, Mr. Chairman, that I have not caught step in the march to the Treasury and wasting the people's money has not yet become a habit with me, or it may be that I can not appreciate the grandeur and the splendor that this million dollars may bring, but until the voice of the impoverished, struggling taxpayer ceases to ring in my ear in protest; until the picture of the heroic sacrifice of a splendid people struggling to discharge a war debt and to provide for those dependent upon them is blotted from my memory I shall continue to lift my voice in protest against wasting the people's money in any such manner.

Mr. BLAND of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. HILL].

Mr. HILL. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, the great port of Baltimore, largely located in the third congressional district which I represent, is vitally interested in the South American and especially in the Brazilian trade. Baltimore City is now spending $50,000,000 of its own money in the development of its docks and shipping facilities. I have consistently voted for strict national economy, and I am against all needless expenditure, but the fostering of foreign trade was a chief purpose of the Constitution of the United States. To-day we need certain expenditures to foster our trade, and such expenditures are proper national economy. Trade revival is vital to-day.

Baltimore City will hold next summer a trade exposition itself, and it has a great and growing trade with Brazil. I am for this bill and I feel it a duty to my district to work and vote for it.

I am greatly influenced by what Secretary Hughes wrote the President. Among other things, he said:

> I am inclined to the view that in these days of commercial rivalry, when American products are seeking foreign markets and foreign Governments are zealous and active in promoting the export trade of their nationals, every opportunity should be availed of to secure to American industrial interests equal opportunity with the industrial interests of other countries to bring their products to the knowledge of foreign buyers and to obtain the advantages which may accrue from competition in this way with their foreign rivals.
> Moreover, on the invitation of the Government of the United States, Brazil has liberally participated in the large expositions held in the United States, notably at Philadelphia, Chicago, St. Louis, and San Francisco.

Again, to the gentleman from California [Mr. LINEBERGER] Secretary Hughes wrote:

> I request, therefore, that a resolution be passed authorizing the United States Government to participate in the International Centennial Exposition to be opened in Rio de Janeiro, Brazil, on September 7, 1922, by exhibits to be displayed by various departments and branches of the Government; authorizing the appointment of a special commission to consist of a commissioner general and five commissioners, to have charge of arrangements for the participation of this Government and to represent at the exposition; and an appropriation to meet the expenses of the commission and of the United States Government's participation of not less than $1,000,000.

The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. BLAND] in the committee report says:

> The exhibit of Brazil at St. Louis Exposition cost $600,000 to make and the deficiency appropriation was made of several thousand dollars to finish the work. The Brazilian building at the St. Louis Exposition was esteemed by many visitors as the finest building on the ground. The highest compliment ever paid the United States of America by a foreign country was when Brazil took down her building at St. Louis and removed it to Brazil, there reerected it on the most prominent site in Rio de Janeiro, named it the Monroe Palace, and dedicated it to the Monroe doctrine.

So, gentlemen of the committee, I hope the bill will pass.

Mr. Chairman, it is interesting to hear statements in respect to economy, but this is a case of spending 5 cents to make $1.

I yield back the remainder of my time.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Maryland has expired.

Mr. LANHAM. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. WINGO].

Mr. WINGO. Mr. Chairman, I am a member of the committee that reported this bill, and I am glad to say that we reported it unanimously. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. LANHAM], who is the ranking Democrat on the committee, discussed the matter with his fellow Democrats, I thought, in the proper spirit. We recognize that each administration has certain obligations that it has to meet; and we, as Democrats, take the position, which is an old historical position with the Democratic Party, that when it comes to matters of foreign affairs we let politics cease. If any Democrats have any doubt as to the wisdom of this then I say to them, try to put yourselves in the attitude of President Harding and Secretary Hughes. This invitation was extended to us, and we can not measure a question of this kind by dollars and cents any more than you can measure the social obligations of everyday life, the people you are thrown with, and their invitations by dollars and cents. There are two considerations now that make me in favor of this bill. We forget the partisan part of it, because I shall be frank and say that as a Democrat I adhere to the traditions of my party to always stand for that which is constructive. I do not want my party to sit like a feisty dog at the side of the road barking at everything that passes by. I want it to have some constructive reason for everything that it does.

There are two considerations that move me and the other Democratic members of the committee to support the demand of the administration for this measure. One is sentimental and the other is a cold-blooded selfish one. From a sentimental standpoint, every man who has studied history and knows something about human nature knows that it is exceedingly wise in a free Government to foster a spirit of reverence for and a spirit of celebration of events that are historical in their nature, and to reciprocate in the celebration of those historical events.

When the centenary of the American Government was celebrated in Philadelphia, this great sister Republic of South America was not merely content to make a great exhibit there and send their commissioners there, but she paid us the compliment of sending the head of that great nation to meet the head of our Nation in the celebration of that historic event. Now, when they have reached the centennial celebration in Brazil, certainly the least that this great sister Republic can do is to first accept her invitation and provide for a proper representation down there and for a proper exhibit. To do less than that would be to fail in the ordinary courtesies which should control the relations of nations, and we would show a disrespect, a lack of comprehension of the courtesy that she showed us when she attended our centennial celebration. I do not care to put my Nation in that attitude.

Then when you come down to the selfish consideration, the future is not altogether settled, so far as international politics are concerned. I believe, and it is a cardinal doctrine of the foreign policy of America, in the Monroe doctrine, which has to do with South America. We all know that there have been certain efforts made by our competitors, to use a mild term, to stir up a feeling of suspicion amongst the South American Governments with respect to the Monroe doctrine. We all know that the line of development, economical and political, for the United States in the years that lie before us is to the south, in that great undeveloped continent of South America, and we all know that we are facing problems, whether we want to or not, and that interwoven with the future political complications of these great nations are South American politics.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Arkansas has expired.

Mr. WINGO. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman grant me five minutes more?

Mr. LANHAM. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes additional to the gentleman from Arkansas.

Mr. WINGO. Now, as a selfish proposition we are interested in maintaining the closest political relations with South America. Is there any man so little versed in the pending political complications of the earth who would challenge that statement? This is the key to South American politics; it is the great Republic of Brazil; it is the Empire of South America; it is the imperial State in that group of States; and, gentlemen, it would be an unwise policy for this Government deliberately to close the door in the face of the political key to the South American political situation for the purpose of economizing to the extent of a million dollars. Are you going to do that? I want to say to you that I was not willing, either as a representative of my people or as a representative of my party on committee, and least of all as an American citizen, to put myself in that attitude. Oh, you say, I care nothing about future political complications in which are involved the destinies of the United States; I care nothing about that except to build battleships, to build munition factories upon one hand representing one school of thought or else have a league of nations or an international association representing the other school of thought.

There is a further cold-blooded, selfish argument, and that is that this Nation has reached the point where it is going to realize the changed world's economic condition, and the increased rate of production which we discovered we were capable of in the exigencies and necessities of this late war. We have an overflow that is different from the problem that confronts a great many of the other nations. A great many of the other nations say, Where can we find territory for our overflowing population? That is the cardinal motive that is back of the Japanese foreign policy; that is the problem that confronts other nations. But it is just the opposite with us—not where we can find an outlet of an overflowing and overcongested population, oh, no; but where can we find an outlet for the surplus products of farm and factory upon which depend the economic happiness and prosperity of the whole American people? Whether you take the cotton mills of the eastern seaboard, whether you take the manufactures of Pennsylvania, whether you take the cotton fields of Texas and Arkansas or the wheat fields of Iowa and Kansas, or the wonderful fruits of California and Florida, you have got to find an outlet for the surplus products of the farm and the factory. Down yonder to the south there is our natural, congenial, most profitable market. For God's sake, let us not blind our eyes with a theory of petty economy to the wonderful business possibilities of developing and cultivating that great market that lies down there. And it is ours if we but recognize the Latin sentiment, recognize their peculiar thoughts, customs, and ideas. There is a market there that will bring to the American taxpayer in profit and money a thousand times the paltry million that you spend there. That is the attitude, gentlemen, of one who thinks in a constructive way of the future of this great country. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has again expired.

Mr. BLAND of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from California [Mr. LINEBERGER].

Mr. LANHAM. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman also five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman is recognized for 10 minutes.

Mr. LINEBERGER. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, after the full and comprehensive manner in which this bill has been discussed, not only by those who are in favor of it but also on the part of the apparently small minority who are opposed to it, there is very little that I can add in the way of argument. In résumé of the capable arguments already presented by my colleagues in favor of the bill, however, there are certain points which I would like again to bring to the attention of the House. The letter of the President of the United States under date of June 27, 1921, quoted on pages 1 and 2 of the report of the committee, I think should go into the RECORD. That letter is as follows, and speaks for itself:

TO THE SENATE AND HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES:

I transmit herewith for the consideration of Congress a report from the Secretary of State concerning the desirability of the Government of the United States participating in an international centennial exposition which is to open in Rio de Janeiro, Brazil, on September 7, 1922.

To the recommendations of this report I give my hearty approval. I trust the Congress will view the matter favorably and will make timely provisions to enable the United States suitably to participate in the exposition.

WARREN G. HARDING.

THE WHITE HOUSE, June 27, 1921.

Gentlemen of the committee, this puts before you in a very clear and succinct manner the attitude of the Chief Executive of the Nation. As has been said by those who have preceded me, this in no sense is a partisan question. The Presidents of the United States from time immemorial, charged, as they are, with the looking after of our domestic as well as our foreign affairs, have traditionally taken the position that in order to further our commercial and political influences in the nations of the world, particularly in those nations of South America who have adhered historically to the doctrine which has been mentioned here to-day—the Monroe doctrine—it is necessary that we recognize the rules of international comity and participate from time to time in expositions of this character. As I say, the traditional policy of the Executives of the United States, backed by the legislative body of the Government, is to participate in expositions such as this. It is my great pleasure to have spent 10 years of my life below the Rio Grande living in and traveling in Latin American countries, and I feel I know something of the psychology and temperament of the Latin American people, something of their spirit to emulate us and advance along commercial and political lines as established by this country.

The Brazilian people particularly have been our friends down through the years. As has been mentioned here to-day they sent their Emperor, Don Pedro the First, to the Centennial Exposition at Philadelphia in 1876 to represent them there, and they have from time to time taken part in every subsequent exposition of importance in this country since that time, having spent from three to five million dollars in erecting buildings, in transporting exhibits, and in adequate representation. Comity, courtesy, and reciprocity constitute the triumvirate of reasons which should stimulate us to take part in this exposition. Now, there are distinguished gentlemen here who have taken the opposite side of the question, men who no doubt are analysts of world affairs, gentlemen who will not for one minute dispute the fact that it is necessary for the United States for reasons of sentimental, commercial, and political considerations, both now and in the future, to take part in world affairs, and to participate properly from time to time in expositions of this character. Those gentlemen, sincere though they may be, I feel are acting under a misapprehension. I do not wish to mention anything or to even suggest an attitude which would rise to plague these gentlemen, or some of them at least, on account of their attitude on this bill. But from the records I find that the sum of $400,000 was appropriated in the no-distant past to the Provincetown and Tercentenary Expositions at Plymouth. I only regret I was not a Member of this House at that time in order that I might have given my vote to such a propositon. As a red-blooded American I approve of it. But strange to say, as was stated many years ago in this House in reply to the great economist Holman, then a Member, who objected to certain appropriations for matters of this kind, he was reminded, as I now remind my friend from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH], "that the watchdog's bay grows faint as he nears home." [Laughter and applause.] I do not believe that this House should consider this matter from any standpoint other than a national standpoint. It is certainly not partisan, and should not under any circumstances whatsoever be considered from a provincial standpoint.

The President of the United States undoubtedly would be greatly disappointed, the American people would be greatly disappointed, and, most of all, our own interests would suffer the greatest detriment should this bill as recommended by the House committee not be passed. It is a matter not only of sentiment but of business—cold-blooded business, if you please—because if we do not do our part, do not authorize a sufficient appropriation to cover the expenses of adequate representation there, it will be held against us by the Brazilians and provide a powerful weapon of criticism for our competitors.

I understand that other great powers are to participate, namely, England and France among others. England, so I am reliably informed, is to spend 200,000 pounds sterling upon this exposition. Only yesterday we were discussing the vital question of the refunding of our national debt, and what I am about to say I do not say in depreciation of our friend and recent ally, Great Britain, but despite the fact that the great nation to which I refer owes us billions of dollars to-day, she still sees fit—and I think it a proper action from her viewpoint—to spend £200,000, or $1,000,000 approximately, in order to participate in this exposition, and no doubt the results which she expects to achieve will operate to our detriment financially as well as politically if we do not take part in the exposition on a scale equally commensurate with our resources and prestige as a great Nation.

Mr. Chairman, I yield back the balance of my time. [Applause.]

Mr. LANHAM. Mr. Chairman, I yield the remainder of my time to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. JONES].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. JONES] is recognized for 13 minutes. [Applause.]

Mr. JONES of Texas. Mr. Chairman, during the past few years we have been regaled with numerous discussions of the merits of nitrate plants in general and of one in particular. These speeches have ranged from panegyrics to lamming criticisms. In between we have had some very learned and informing discussions of the subject. Not knowing much about the arc, the Haber, or the cyanamic process, I have listened to the debates with a great deal of interest. I would listen to one side and come to the conclusion that the safety of the Nation depended upon Muscle Shoals and that the seat of the farmers' hopes was located on the banks of the Tennessee River. Then some opponent would so juggle the technical and scientific facts as to make it appear that the whole scheme was one of public waste and extravagance.

One of the most persistent critics of the entire Tennessee River or Muscle Shoals project has been the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. LONGWORTH]. He has been bitter, vitriolic, bellicose, and belligerent. On September 14, 1917, in speaking on the subject in this House, he used the following language:

The project involved the most uncalled-for and indefensible waste of the public money that I have ever known since I became a Member of Congress. (Sept. 14, 1917.)

That kind of language was calculated to make one think that the gentleman was very much in earnest and that safeguarding the Public Treasury was his supreme and first concern.

Again, on April 4, 1918, the gentleman made another speech, from which I take the following:

I myself have come to hate the words "Muscle Shoals" almost as much as I hate the word "camouflage," though I am bound to confess there is in certain phases of this proposition a distinct relationship between the two terms. The conditions are that the more or less patriotic landowners in the vicinity of Muscle Shoals are trying to hold up the Government. Not satisfied with the fact that something over $125,000,000 is proposed to be expended in that locality, they are engaged now in profiteering, and if there is any meaner kind of profiteering than holding up this Government in the purchase of land around military posts I have yet to find it. (Apr. 4, 1918.)

That language does not indicate that the gentleman had changed his mind. In fact, one would gather that he felt that if he could just save the United States from the danger of this awful enterprise his happiness would be complete, and if he could just lift from the shoulders of the Nation the grinding load of Muscle Shoals his place in the sun would be earned. But again he had something to say on February 25, 1921, from which I quote as follows:

> Now, it does not make any difference whether they expend $10,000,000 for the dam or $12,500,000 to equip the plant. The two things are the same. They are both entering wedges for the expenditure of one-quarter of a billion dollars of the people's money to furnish cheap water power for a few select individuals. That is all this thing amounts to. [Applause.] (Feb. 25, 1921.)
> I will do everything in my power decently to help the South, but I balk at doing it indecently. (Feb. 25, 1921.)

In the meantime, with some misgivings, I had supported the project; but after hearing this last philippic I could almost imagine myself floating down the Tennessee River a political shipwreck, without chart or compass, hopeless and helpless, all because of that vote.

But on July 2, like a bolt from the clear sky, that manufacturer of flivvers, that genius of finance, that organizer par excellence, Henry Ford, made the Government a proposition that he would take the whole thing off the Government's hands by paying, during a period of 100 years, the sum of $214,000,000, which included an annual rental of $1,200,000 for the entire hundred years. When I heard——

Mr. CLARKE of New York. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JONES of Texas. I will.

Mr. CLARKE of New York. Do I understand you intend to connect up Muscle Shoals with the Rio de Janeiro exposition?

Mr. JONES of Texas. Not in the least. But we heard so much of the discussion concerning Rio de Janeiro I thought a little surcease from it would constitute relief. I do not wonder that some people do not like to listen to a discussion of Mr. Ford's proposition, but I am sure the gentleman from New York does not come within that classification.

When I heard of this offer I thought here is a chance for the Government to get rid of this perennial contest and to finally settle one big issue. The one man among the opponents who had fought this proposition from the beginning, who proudly boasted of the fact that he had fought every appropriation in connection with it for a period of 10 years, and who I thought would rush to the floor with a maddening speech, urging that the proposition be accepted before the ink was cold, was the gentleman from Ohio. During all these years he had had one nervous rigor after another when commenting on the awful burden which had been placed upon the United States Treasury, and when he contemplated the increased expenditures of the future he grew purple with rage. Time after time he had frantically protested that the whole proposition would be a bundle of junk on the hands of the Government and that it would be a millstone about the neck of this growing Republic.

Mr. LINEBERGER. I am very much interested in the gentleman's talk, and I would like to know to what gentleman from Ohio he refers?

Mr. JONES of Texas. The gentleman from Ohio, Mr. LONGWORTH. I thought everyone knew he had been combating this enterprise. In the complex business of this House there are not many things that are certain, but one thing seemed as certain as the sunrise, and that was that one of the flaming advocates of ridding the Government of this whole proposition would be the gentleman from Ohio, but for some reason he has been strangely silent. During the long weeks that have widened into months not one word has escaped his eloquent lips. When one recalls the bitter words he used from time to time with reference to this project, the natural thing to expect was that he would jump at an opportunity to rid the Government of even a small part of the expenditure or even at an opportunity to throw away what had been appropriated heretofore if the prospective appropriations could be eliminated. Yet here was a chance for the Government to get back everything with a guarantee for the future. The ordinary thing to expect not only from him but from all of the opponents of the proposal would have been an urgent insistence that the proposition be immediately accepted. But the outburst of oratory has not occurred; the flaming advocate has not spoken; the eloquent tongue has been silent. Oh, consistency, thy name is not Nicholas!

One must search elsewhere for a reason for the sudden cooling of the ardor of these gentlemen. Surely it can not be the financial side of the proposition, for here is a man who is financially responsible, who has the habit of putting things over, and who makes the Government an offer that almost staggers the imagination. Then what is the reason? Can it be that the little phrase that is couched in the body of the contract by which the company undertakes to guarantee that it will sell fertilizer to the farmer at such a price as to give assurance that the company will not make more than a profit of 8 per cent on the investment, frightens those who have been selling fertilizer to the farmers?

Surely it could not be this, and yet not one other institution engaged in this line of business has ever offered to make such a limitation. Mr. Washburn, the president of the American Cyanamid Co., is authority for the statement that if Mr. Ford's proposal is accepted it will probably mean that the farmer will get his fertilizer hereafter for about one-half what he is paying at the present time. If that be true, not only would the Government be benefited by the acceptance of the proposition but the producers of the country's basic wealth would be favored. Under any circumstances the operation of this property by the Ford Co. could not increase the cost to the farmer. So, since the Government is so handsomely protected by the offer, why not do something that at least gives promise of reducing the expenses of producing the elemental wealth of the Nation?

For many years it has been the custom of men in public life and the habit of political parties to throw bouquets at the farmer. They have proudly referred to him as the backbone of the country, as the stay of the Nation, the hope of the Republic. Here is a chance and an opportunity to make good on these protestations, for Mr. Ford's offer contemplates evidently not only the permanent operation of this plant but the establishment of other kindred industries which will further develop and enhance and enrich the undeveloped resources of a large part of the United States.

Not only is this true, but there is embodied in the contract also a stipulation that in the event of war the plant is to be turned over to the Government. Now one of the lessons that we learned in the war that has just closed is that chemistry plays a large part in the carrying on of a modern war. We spend great sums of money on the Army and the Navy, which do not produce anything except protection to the country. They are not intended to be money-making propositions. But here is a project that a man who is a successful business man suggests, in connection with which he makes a tempting offer to the effect that he will maintain the plant in perfect condition so that in the event of war the plant will be ready to manufacture a vital war necessity. In the meantime he offers to maintain the plant in full operation and without any expense to the United States Government.

I can see no real reason for a delay, at least of action on this proposition. In the nature of things it could not be expected to stay open indefinitely. In fact, the offer asks that early action be taken. This is the first proposition that I know of where the Government has a chance to come out in one of its institutions, and at the same time to benefit a large number of citizens of this country.

There are those who balk when it comes to enacting legislation that has for its primary purpose the furtherance of the interest of agriculture. There are those who smile knowingly and even cynically when anyone assumes to speak in behalf of the producers of the basic wealth of the Nation. But I want to say to you that all the boasted industrial wealth of the United States, all the wheeling spindles of the factories that sing by the streams of this broad, big country, all the skyscrapers that mark the prosperity of the Nation are alike dependent upon the ultimate success of the producer. If he fails all must suffer. If he goes down your industrial smokestacks will rust in idleness; the bats will occupy your factories and gloom will settle over the commerce of the Nation. The prosperity of the farmers and the manufacturers are inextricably interwoven with the success of the Nation. If the producer prospers the entire country will ultimately flourish and success will crown the efforts of those who are industrious. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Texas has expired.

Mr. BLAND of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. FAIRFIELD].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Indiana is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. FAIRFIELD. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, Brazil has already spent in the aggregate $3,000,000 in expositions that have been given by the United States Government. The comity of nations would require that we make some appropriation for the purposes of the exposition to be held in Rio de Janeiro. I think that no man would say that it would be good economy to deny a recognition of a request by the Brazilian Government. The only problem is as to whether the appropriation shall be held so close in amount that it will barely come under what may be denominated as respectable, or whether you are going beyond, that we shall make an investment in Brazil in making an appropriation that will adequately represent the important commercial relationship which we do sustain and which may be largely increased. It is not primarily an expense; it is an investment, and I would be glad if the appropriation were large enough, so that when the people of the various cities of Brazil come to Rio de Janeiro their imagination would be struck by the character of the buildings, by the character of the commission, by the largeness of the representation of our business men, until they would actually feel that the great Republic of the north recognized them as equal and worthy of every attention that we could pay them. It is a matter of good, hard business sense when we go beyond the limit of what mere decency would require.

I had occasion just recently to have in my home as a guest one of the commanders of the American Navy who had recently been in South America and in one of those little countries down in Central America which had been celebrating its independence. His ship had been ordered there to represent the Government. Those people in the smaller country felt that this Government was not adequately represented. They were sensitive, and Brazil will be sensitive when its representatives realize that, after having expended $3,000,000 on expositions in this country, the American Congress would not appropriate $1,000,000 to meet them on an equal plane. I think there is no reason indeed, gentlemen, why this bill ought not to pass. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Indiana has expired.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I yield back one minute remaining to me to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. BLAND].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Indiana is recognized for one minute.

Mr. BLAND of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, I merely wanted to correct one or two statements that have been made in this debate. The gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. STAFFORD] made the statement that the President is not in favor of this resolution, or, rather, that there is nothing in the hearing that would indicate that he is in favor of it. I am sure the gentleman will correct that statement after looking over the RECORD, because clearly the President and the Secretary of State favor the passage of this measure, and have said so in language that can not admit of misunderstanding. The unanimous approval of the committee has been given to this bill; and surely if there were any serious objections to it some member of the committee would have withheld his support.

With reference to the $1,000,000 appropriation, gentlemen, I want to say that the Committee on Appropriations will pass upon this authorization, because this bill will not appropriate; it merely authorizes. The Committee on Appropriations will have the power to make it less but not more than $1,000,000. I am sure that the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. STAFFORD], who, with the exception of one other Member, is up to this time the only one who has shown hostility to the bill, would not have it understood that it is cut and dried that there will be a $500,000 steel structure erected down there. There is nothing in the hearing to indicate that that is what they are going to do. There was a suggestion in the hearing that it cost $500,000 to build the building at Paris. It has been suggested in the hearing, I think, and also in my statement here, that if we build a steel structure with a concrete foundation we can sell it and get something for it after we get through with it, and that overtures have been made to this Government along that line. That, however, is a question for the commission to determine; and I am sure that if you will pay the right kind of men sufficient salaries you can get men who can cause to be built down there a structure to the advantage of the United States. This committee has deemed it advisable not to pay excessive salaries. Something has been said here about the salary of the governor of Texas being only $4,000. This service down there is for two or three months in the fall of the year, which is their spring. A man has to quit his business and go down there. It takes 17 days to travel to Rio de Janeiro and 17 days to return. Would you ask a poor man capable of being a commissioner to go for two months for less than one-sixth of $7,500? It is most absurd to talk about breaking this Nation financially with such expenditures as this. The salaries last for only a short time.

Mr. JOHNSON of Mississippi. How much are the salaries?

Mr. BLAND of Indiana. The salary of the commissioner general, according to the amendment that the committee proposes, would be between $10,000 and $15,000, and the amount is left up to the Secretary of State within those limits. If you gentlemen are fortunate enough to know the Secretary of State, you will probably share the idea with me that nobody is going to get by with any very large salary.

Mr. JOHNSON of Mississippi. I have a very high regard for the Secretary of State.

Mr. BLAND of Indiana. The expenditure of this money is left up to him entirely.

Mr. LAYTON. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. BLAND of Indiana. I yield to the gentleman from Delaware.

Mr. LAYTON. As a matter of fact, in addition to the length of time that the commissioner may have to be present down there, will it not take really great business ability and sagacity and a great part of the time for a year in advance in order to assemble an exhibit commensurate with the dignity and resources of this country?

Mr. BLAND of Indiana. The commissioner, whether he is appointed in advance or not, will have the advantage of the assistance of the department heads, especially of the Department of Agriculture and the Departments of Commerce and Interior, as well as the other departments that expect to make an exhibit on behalf of this Government. I will say along that line that this bill authorizes the department heads to assign men on their regular salaries to this duty of getting up these exhibits, and I am sure that the talent already in the employ of the Government will be taken advantage of as much as possible.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired. All time has expired, and the Clerk will read the bill for amendment under the five-minute rule.

Mr. BLAND of Indiana. I ask unanimous consent that the committee amendment be read in lieu of the Senate bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Indiana asks unanimous consent that the committee amendment be read in lieu of the original bill. Is there objection?

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, reserving the right to object, let us see if we can have a full understanding about it. Does the gentleman desire the amendment to be read as though it were the original?

Mr. BLAND of Indiana. It is my idea that the committee amendment should be read instead of the Senate bill, because the committee recommended that the Senate bill be stricken out and the amendment substituted.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. The thought that lies back of the question which I am asking the gentleman relates to the parliamentary situation. I think myself the amendment might very properly be read as though it were the original bill and be open to amendment as though it were the original bill. As the matter now stands, if I understand the parliamentary situation correctly, there are some amendments to be offered. At least the committee has one amendment.

Mr. BLAND of Indiana. The committee has one amendment.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Of course that would be an amendment in the second degree, and any amendment to the committee amendment would be an amendment in the third degree and therefore not in order. I would like to see the bill read as though it were the original, and open to amendment as though it were the original bill.

Mr. BLAND of Indiana. Does the gentleman suggest that I change the form of my request to include the words that it be open to amendment the same as though it was the original Senate bill?

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. I think that would be better.

Mr. BLAND of Indiana. I make that change in my request.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Indiana asks unanimous consent that the amendment to the bill of the Senate be read as an original bill and open to amendment as the original bill would otherwise be. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read the committee amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, etc., That said invitation is accepted.

Mr. LANHAM. Mr. Chairman, I recall that the question was raised by the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. PADGETT] that in the event of the passage of this measure the preamble, the whereas clause, should appear as a part of the resolution. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry, as to the manner in which the preamble, which states the purpose of this exposition, can be incorporated in the measure as finally passed.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state that it is his information that the preamble is usually amended only after the completion of the reading of the bill.

Mr. STAFFORD. It may or may not be stricken out.

Mr. BLAND of Indiana. I think it would be proper to submit a request for unanimous consent that it be made a part of the resolution.

Mr. LANHAM. I should like to present that request.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, no one can forecast what the body of the resolution will be until after the amending stage is past, and that is the reason for the rule which is cited by the Chair for postponing action on the preamble until the passage of the measure itself.

Mr. LANHAM. Then I will reserve my request and make it later.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will continue the reading.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 2. That the President is hereby authorized to appoint a commissioner general and five commissioners to represent the United States in the proposed exposition, the amount of whose compensation shall be determined by the Secretary of State. The said commissioner general shall, under the direction of the Secretary of State, make all needful rules and regulations in reference to the contributions from this country and to control the expenditure incident to the installation and exhibit thereof, the pay of the commissioner general, commissioners, officials, and employees, and the preparation of the reports of the exposition, and the general results thereof; and he shall make all arrangements necessary for the preparation, transportation, installation, display, and proper care of the exhibits of the Government of the United States, with the cooperation and assistance of the various executive departments, institutions, and branches of the Government that may participate in the exposition, as well as to furnish such information service to private exhibitors and prospective exhibitors as he may deem necessary and feasible: Provided, That the executive departments of the Government may designate officials or employees of their respective departments for service in connection with said commission, but no such official or employee so designated shall receive a salary in excess of the amount which he has been receiving in the department where employed, plus such reasonable additional allowance for expenses not now authorized by law as may be deemed proper by the Secretary of State, in view of the fact that such service is to be performed in a foreign country: Provided further, That no person appointed or employed by virtue of the provisions of this act shall receive a greater salary than $15,000 per annum, and not more than one person shall receive a salary in excess of $10,000 per annum, and not more than three persons shall receive salaries in excess of $7,500 per annum.

Mr. BLAND of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 5, line 15, after the word "State" insert: "Provided, That two of the said commissioners to be designated by the President shall serve without compensation or allowance for expenses."

Mr. BLAND of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, I can not say that that is a committee amendment although those members of the committee with whom I have talked favor it. This amendment has been suggested to me by an amendment of the Senate striking out two of the commissioners. Now, these two commissioners are quite important, especially in Latin America, from a social standpoint. I am sure there can be obtained without salary men who are willing to serve. I am sure there are Americans there in Brazil who would be willing to serve, and men here who would be willing to serve without a salary, and it clearly meets the objection as to expenses. I believe the adoption of the amendment will put us in better shape, and I would like to see it adopted.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Indiana.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I want to ask the gentleman from Indiana a question. How many of these officers are to receive a salary of $15,000?

Mr. BLAND of Indiana. It says——

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. Oh, I know what it says, I want to know how many will receive $15,000?

Mr. BLAND of Indiana. If the gentleman has read it intelligently, he will see that no one can receive over $15,000, and only one who can receive between $10,000 and $15,000.

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. How many can receive $10,000?

Mr. BLAND of Indiana. Not more than three shall receive a salary in excess of $7,500.

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. And that three includes the other two?

Mr. BLAND of Indiana. The other one. I think a fair interpretation is that one salary is between $10,000 and $15,000, and three between $7,500 and $10,000.

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. The amount is left to the discretion of the Secretary of State?

Mr. BLAND of Indiana. Yes; we say the other two shall serve without pay, even expenses.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the incorrect spelling of the word "United" in line 13 will be corrected.

There was no objection.

Mr. WATSON. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last two words for the purpose of asking the chairman a question. How long are the salaries to be paid?

Mr. BLAND of Indiana. The best information we can get is that the exposition will start on September 22 and last during the spring months, through September and October and up to a little while in November—probably only two months. Most of the employees would only serve two months and get a proportionate part of the year's salary.

Mr. WATSON. They would not be paid one year's salary?

Mr. BLAND of Indiana. No; I think you could leave that to the Secretary of State.

Mr. WATSON. We are providing to give the employees so much per annum, and if they worked 13 months, would they get an additional year's salary?

Mr. BLAND of Indiana. There would be nothing for them to do that long.

Mr. WATSON. Is the gentleman sure of that?

Mr. BLAND of Indiana. Yes.

Mr. WATSON. Then it should be so provided in the bill.

Mr. BLAND of Indiana. We can not state the time that the exposition shall end.

Mr. WATSON. There should be a provision that the employees should not receive another year's salary.

Mr. BLAND of Indiana. The gentleman's alarm is unwarranted; it could not extend more than a year.

Mr. WATSON. I think it ought to be limited in the bill so that we would be on the safe side.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 5. That the Secretary of Agriculture is hereby authorized to collect and prepare suitable specimens of the agricultural and forestal productions of the several States of the Union for exhibition at the exposition, and accompany the same with a report respecting such production, to be printed in the English, Spanish, and Portuguese languages, the expense of the same to be paid out of the appropriation hereinafter provided for.

Mr. FISH. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. Mr. Chairman, it seems to me that this is most meritorious legislation, to participate in the centenary of the Republic of Brazil. Owing to the conditions that arose from the war our relations with Europe have been emphasized to the disadvantage of our time-honored friendship for our sister Republics on the American continent. I think it is an opportune time for us to cultivate the friendship of Brazil and the other great South American countries. The United States gained nothing out of the war, we asked for no indemnity or reparations, and we asked for no territory. On the other hand, England and France secured large additional domains. Should we not at this time look after our own interests by cultivating the good will of the South American Republics? Why should we not all combine and ask the European nations to withdraw from their possessions in the Caribbean Sea? The Monroe doctrine is safeguarded and protected to-day in South America because Brazil and Argentina and Chile are able by their own individual efforts to drive any foreign force out of South America. Is it not time for us to extend the Monroe doctrine? We should have put in a provision yesterday in the refunding bill by which the commission could have liquidated a part of the foreign loans by taking over the West Indies. These islands, stretching from Florida to the northern coast of South America, are all sightly within our sphere of influence, yet a large part of them fly the British flag. Is it not time to consider our own interests which are paramount in the West Indies both geographically and commercially?

The islands, such as Porto Rico and Cuba, which came under our influence at the end of the Spanish War have flourished, whereas the European islands have languished. The control of these islands in the West Indies is a constant source of annoyance and irritation in our diplomatic relations with South America. In order to show our good faith to the South and Central American Republics we should buy up British Honduras, British, French, and Dutch Guiana, and either give them self-determination or turn them over to the neighboring Republics. Such action would allay forever any fear that these Republics might have of encroachment by the United States Government in South or Central America.

While Lloyd-George is opposing the establishment of an Irish republic on the ground that it might provide a base for lurking submarines, it is well for us to consider the same possibilities for the protection of the Panama Canal. I have no fear of an armed conflict with Great Britain, as she has too much to lose and nothing to gain. Canada is the best insurance policy for the maintenance of friendly relations between the two great English-speaking nations. I take this occasion to ask your consideration to help build up our friendship with the South American Republics, for the simple purpose of extending the Monroe doctrine, so all of this hemisphere will belong to the American people, and I see in the not far distant future a Pan American combination of Canada, the United States, Brazil, Argentina, and Chile to make the American hemisphere safe for Americans by seeking the withdrawal of all foreign influences and control over the West Indies and territory in South and Central America.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 8. That in order to defray the necessary expenses above authorized, including the salaries of commissioners and employees, the cost of preparing the various Government exhibits, transportation, installation, display, and return of exhibits, construction and equipment of building, and acquisition, preparation, and maintenance of site and grounds, the sum of $1,000,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, is hereby authorized to be appropriated, out of any moneys in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to be immediately available for use by the commissioner general for the purposes of this resolution, and to remain available until expended or no longer required, all expenditures out of said appropriation being made subject to approval by the Secretary of State: Provided, That no indebtedness shall be incurred hereunder in excess of the amount herein authorized to be appropriated.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment to strike out, in line 19, page 8, the sum of $1,000,000 and substitute in lieu thereof the sum of $500,000.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wisconsin offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. STAFFORD: Page 8, line 19, strike out the figures "$1,000,000" and insert in lieu thereof the figures "$500,000."

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, not once during the entire debate has there been advanced anything that justifies the authorization of $1,000,000 unless it is predicated upon the policy of our Government spending $500,000 for a building, $100,000 for a monument, and $300,000 for the social expenses of numerous clerks. The argument has been advanced that the cost to-day of building is greater than when we voted $500,000 for the building at Paris, and $500,000 for the building at San Francisco. I direct the attention of the committee to a fact that has not been referred to before. This money is going to be expended in Brazil and at the present rate of exchange, which is less than one-half against Brazil, the $500,000 in American money to-day is equal to $1,000,000 in Brazilian money. I have before me a copy of the Philadelphia Public Ledger of yesterday, the financial and commercial news of which I am in the habit of reading, and I call attention to the rate of exchange so far as Brazil is concerned:

Brazil: Par, 32.45 cents, per paper milreis. Demand, 13.37, 12.87, 13.87.

But without that, leaving out of consideration the fact that the rate of exchange is against Brazil at the rate of more than two to one, which means that $500,000 appropriated by this Government will mean an expenditure of money equal to $1,000,000 in Brazil, still there has been no showing made here that in this exposition to last seven weeks we should go to the extreme of spending $1,000,000—$2,000,000 in Brazilian money, unless it be for the salaries that may be expended because of this limited exposition.

I am in favor of accepting the invitation of Brazil. I want some sort of representation there by representatives becoming to the greatness of this country, but I am opposed in these days to voting $100,000 for a monument, a million dollars in Brazilian money for the construction of a building, to be turned over after a seven weeks' exposition to private institutions for the emolument of persons on whose land it is to be erected.

I think we would be doing much if we voted an authorization of $500,000. Peru, to whose centennial exposition we authorized a delegation, under an appropriation of $40,000, as I remember it, to represent our Government, was entitled to as much consideration as Brazil, and we are going far in establishing this precedent when we authorize $500,000.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Wisconsin has expired.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for two minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. STAFFORD. When other South American countries celebrate their centennial of independence we will be obliged to go to the same extent probably for similar expositions.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STAFFORD. Yes.

Mr. WALSH. Has the gentleman any information as to what the situation is with reference to unemployment in Brazil?

Mr. STAFFORD. The hearings show that conditions are rather similar to those in the United States—in fact, unemployment the world over is general.

Mr. BLAND of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman point out in the hearings where that comes in with respect to labor being out of employment?

Mr. STAFFORD. I gained that impression from reading the hearings.

Mr. BLAND of Indiana. I would like to have the gentleman point me out that particular feature and other features that he has several times referred to.

Mr. STAFFORD. Does the gentleman want me to point out about the $100,000 monument, or that this building is to be erected on private property, or that the owners refuse to allow the building to be erected unless they put up a permanent building with steel construction?

Mr. BLAND of Indiana. Yes; if the gentleman will point out a statement of that kind.

Mr. STAFFORD. That is the statement of the commercial attaché. The only estimate presented to the committee is based on the statement of the commercial attaché, and he points out how he arrives at the $1,000,000 of expenditure, and that includes the various items that I have referred to.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Wisconsin has again expired.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman, I am in favor of taking proper steps to maintain friendly relations with all nations, but from reading the communications of the State Department and the hearings this exposition which is to be held is to be in the nature of a commercial enterprise. It is hoped that perhaps it may result in stimulation of trade between this country and Brazil. If that is its purpose, then I believe that the sum proposed by the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. STAFFORD] will be ample to carry out the provisions of this piece of legislation. I think we ought to consider, with the state of unemployment in this country to-day, with the threatened transportation strike, with the great uncertainties as to what the taxation legislation is to be, whether we can cavalierly appropriate $1,000,000 for the purpose of an exposition to be held in South America, a large portion of that sum to be used for the construction of a building.

Reference was made by the gentleman from California [Mr. LINEBERGER], our gallant soldier, to an appropriation made some time ago for the observance of the three hundredth anniversary of the landing of the Pilgrims at Plymouth and Provincetown.

Mr. BLAND of Indiana. How much was appropriated?

Mr. WALSH. Four hundred thousand dollars.

Mr. BLAND. Was that in the gentleman's district?

Mr. WALSH. Yes; that was appropriated and expended in the gentleman's district; and if people believe that because an appropriation of $400,000 is expended in a person's district that therefore the Member representing that district should be bound in the future to vote appropriations for all sorts of projects thereafter, I feel that gentlemen holding that position are eminently qualified to hold the position of chairman of the Committee on Industrial Arts and Expositions.

Mr. MONDELL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WALSH. If gentlemen can not see the difference between appropriating money for the perpetuation of memorials, for restoring Plymouth Rock, and appropriating a million dollars with a $17,500 salary for some gentleman who appeared before the committee and announced his candidacy for it——

Mr. BLAND of Indiana. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WALSH. I say a gentleman who can not see the distinction between those two projects is eminently qualified, if he can not get the chairmanship, at least to serve upon the committee.

Mr. BLAND of Indiana. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WALSH. I will yield.

Mr. BLAND of Indiana. I do not know what committee the gentleman is chairman of, but I know the gentleman was sufficiently influential to get $400,000 for his district——

Mr. WALSH. And that is the plan the gentleman from Indiana followed——

Mr. BLAND of Indiana. And if he saw proper——

Mr. WALSH (continuing). The old log rolling——

Mr. BLAND of Indiana. I have not finished the question.

Mr. WALSH. The gentleman was not asking a question.

Mr. BLAND of Indiana. I am trying to base a premise for the question.

Mr. WALSH. If the gentleman will ask the question, I will yield.

Mr. BLAND of Indiana. Does the gentleman judge the size of an appropriation necessary for the Brazilian exposition from the fact that there was spent $400,000 on a little side show up in the gentleman's district?

Mr. WALSH. I do not, and I absolutely deny it is a little side show, and any gentleman who has no more reverence for Plymouth Rock and what was established there than to denounce the three hundredth anniversary as a side show——

Mr. MONDELL. Will the gentleman yield in the midst of this personal altercation?

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. STAFFORD. I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman's time be extended for three minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Wisconsin? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. WALSH. I will yield to the gentleman from Wyoming.

Mr. MONDELL. Sacred as are the memories of Plymouth Rock, and they are sacred, does not the gentleman think that now and again it is a pretty good thing to lift our eyes from these local objects, sacred and important as they are, and survey the world?

Mr. WALSH. Yes.
Mr. MONDELL. And view——
Mr. WALSH. Yes.
Mr. MONDELL. And view our obligations as a great people to another great people?
Mr. WALSH. Oh, yes.
Mr. MONDELL. Who have always been our friends and who have always been our visitors and contributors every time we have held an exposition in these United States, a nation that has been peculiarly our friend at all times among the nations of South America. I am sorry to have taken so much of the gentleman's three minutes.
Mr. WALSH. I appreciate the sentiment and argument of the gentleman from Wyoming, but, Mr. Chairman, any nation which bases its friendly relations and attitude toward the United States upon the sum of money we take out of our Treasury to be expended within its borders to help out its citizens, to encourage its trade, to stimulate its industry, I submit comes with very poor grace at this particular time when we are staggering under a tremendous burden of debt, when we are cutting down in our executive departments to the very bone, when we have gone forth throughout the country, the party of which the gentleman from Wyoming is one of its distinguished leaders here upon the floor, with a pledge to economy, and when we find from four to six million men out of employment at this very hour, I think we can say to our friends in the Brazilian Government, "We love and respect you; we esteem you highly, but under existing conditions we feel that if we eliminate some of these high salaries and these expensive buildings one half million dollars will be ample to show our respect for you and to reciprocate your action in years gone by."
The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has again expired.
Mr. UNDERHILL. Mr. Chairman, as I understand from debate, the object, or one of the objects of this measure, is to aid and stimulate trade, and if this is the object of the bill $1,000,000 is not sufficient, but is a wasteful extravagance, because until you change our present tax laws that bear so heavily upon the manufacturer and producer and until you repeal the seaman's act, neither $1,000,000 nor $100,000,000 can get the trade of Brazil or the other South American Republics. If, on the other hand, you want to establish good will and friendly relations surely $500,000 is sufficient. I would rather vote against any appropriation, but there is some merit in showing friendly relations for a South American country that has been generous in the past in participating in our affairs here.
So, in spite of the fact that I am pledged to economy I am willing to vote for the $500,000 to establish friendly relations, but not willing to waste a million dollars for the purpose of establishing trade relations that can not be established under our present laws and conditions.
Mr. LINEBERGER. Does the gentleman recognize the fact that Brazil appropriated $600,000 at the beginning of the World War in order to participate in the San Francisco Exposition, when the dollar was worth practically twice as much as it is now, and when the future of the world was practically in flux?
Mr. UNDERHILL. I understand that at that time the dollar would purchase twice as much as at present, and $600,000 is only about half of what we propose to spend at this time. That is the reason why I am willing to vote for the amendment of the gentleman, and the only reason. But I am not in favor of uselessly throwing away money when we have the present tax laws and the present inequitable and unjust seamen's laws which operate against all our manufactories and all our exporters.
Mr. CURRY. Mr. Chairman, Brazil is one of the greatest countries in the world. It has an area 250,000 square miles larger than the area of the United States, eliminating Alaska and our island possessions. At the present time it has a population of about 25,000,000 people. About 100 years ago the United States of America had a little over 10,000,000 population. In 100 years we have added 100,000,000 to our population. What has been done in the United States in the last 100 years will be duplicated in Brazil during the next 100 years. Thanks to the Monroe doctrine, under the protection of the United States, Brazil has developed, she has a splendid country, wonderfully fertile and rich in mineral and forest resources; a splendid citizenry, and as good a Government as we have. She has always appropriated large amounts to participate in expositions held in the United States. She appropriated $600,000 for the Panama-Pacific Exposition, held at San Francisco. She erected one of the most magnificent buildings at that exposition, and when the exposition closed turned that building over to the city, and it now uses it.
